Any commercial intercourse, direct or indirect, with *the enemy, is illegal, and [213 cause of condemnation; its illegality does not depend on contract. The intervention of a neutral port makes no difference. (8 T. R., 555, Potts v. Bell et al; 4 Rob., 68, 69, 83, 84, The Jonge Pieter; 1 Rob., 165, 196, The Hoop; Chitty's law of nations, 13, 14, 15).

When the Aurora was taken, she was out of the course to St. Barts, and very far to the leeward of that island. These circumstances afford a strong suspicion that her destination was to some other port.

The return cargo was British produce, and, prima facie, British property; if it was not, it is on the claimants to show it.

It appears that the captain was kept ignorant of the real destination of the Aurora, and that the supercargo, during his examination in preparatoria, was guilty of prevarication. These circumstances alone are good cause of condemnation. (Chitty's law of nations, 314).

As to what has been said with regard to the intention not being carried into effect, we contend that it was carried into effect to every legal purpose. An overt act was sufficient to constitute the offense; and sailing with the license was such an overt act.

Pinkney, on the same side.

The rule that trade with the enemy is illegal, results necessarily from the declaration of war, and is included in it. There was no necessity of any subsequent law to enforce the rule.

It has been said that no judicial decision on this subject is to be found of an earlier date than 1747. It is true Sir William Scott, in his enumeration of cases where this question was agitated, has gone no farther back than that date; but Sir John Nicholls, in his argument in the case of Potts v. Bell, has cited cases from Sir Edward Simpson's MS. reports in the admiralty, where this principle was decided to be correct as early as 1704 and 1707; and it is to be presumed that those *decisions were [214 founded upon former cases. (See also 1 Vez., 317, Henkle v. The Royal Ex. Ins. Co. in 1749.)

The general rule is above all impeachment.

This case may be considered, as it regards,

1st. The license alone.

2d. The license as connected with the transaction itself.

First, then, we contend that no American citizen, in a time of war, has a right voluntarily to place himself under the protection of the enemy. War exists between the nations in their political capacity, and between the individuals of each nation respectively. The power of making peace follows the power of making war. Individuals cannot lawfully make peace, even for themselves. But the acceptance of a license from the enemy is making a peace with him so far as it goes; it is a partial truce—a partial cessation of hostilities. Transactions of this kind are productive of great evil. The American citizen who accepts a license from the enemy, does that which is highly injurious to the interests of his country. The indulgence of the enemy imposes on him an obligation to act as a neutral, contrary to his duty as a citizen; it is an individual bribe—it has a tendency to poison the whole virtue and patriotism of the country; to undermine the government; to alienate the affections of the citizens, and to place the nation in the power of the enemy.

The circumstance, that acts of Congress have been passed prohibiting trade with the enemy, the use of his licenses, &c., has been urged by the claimants, as evidence that such communication with the enemy was not unlawful prior to the passage of those acts. But we contend that it was unlawful under a well-established rule of the law of nations; and that if these acts have not repealed that rule, they cannot aid the claimants in the present case. Sir Wm. Scott's observations in the case of the Hoffning, are in point. (2 Rob., 137, 165.)

But we have a special answer to the argu- 215 ment of the *claimants. The act of July 6 goes upon the presumption that the intercourse with the enemy which it prohibits, was before unlawful—it does not profess to create a new offense.

Considering, then, this point as settled, the argument that the act of 6th July prohibits the use of licenses to trade with British ports only, falls to the ground.

The case of ransom has been said to militate with the argument we have employed in support of the illegality of sailing under the protection of the enemy. But the cases are widely different. In a case of ransom, the captured vessel is compelled to make an agreement with the enemy—she is under the necessity of accepting their protection—here the transaction was perfectly voluntary.

The rule of 1756, declaring illegal the coasting trade permitted by the enemy in time of war, which was prohibited by him in time of peace, is founded upon the same general principle. If, then, the permission only of the enemy gives a hostile character to vessels sailing under that permission, a fortiori, they acquire a hostile character by sailing under the protection of the enemy.

But suppose the claimants in this case did not mean to aid the British, but merely to benefit themselves at the expense of their country and their fellow-citizens—still the object of the license and the obvious consequence of the voyage, was the supply of the British West Indies. This the claimants must have known. They knew, also, that the pressure of the West Indies was one of the means which the United States were using to coerce the enemy; yet they become the agents of the British to prevent this pressure. If a neutral carry despatches for one of the belligerent powers, it affords just cause of condemnation to the other. How much stronger is the case of a citizen of one of the belligerent nations furnishing the other with supplies.

It has been said that here was only an intent to commit an illegal act (supposing the act con- 216 templated to *be illegal), that there was no corpus delicti. But we contend that the very act of sailing with a view to execute the intention constitutes the offense. Such is the law in case of blockade: if a vessel sails for a blockaded port, knowing it to be blockaded, she thereby acquires a hostile character.

We might here contend that the real destination of the Aurora was not to St. Barts, but to a British port; for it appears that, when captured, she was 160 miles to the leeward of that island. But it is unnecessary to say anything on this point, as the principle is the same, and the vessel equally liable to condemnation, whether her destination were to a British port or to St. Barts. In the latter case, the cargo, it was well known, would be obtained by the enemy from the Swedes; so that it was, in effect, the same thing as if it had been carried direct to the enemy.

Dexter, in reply.

It is the universality of the rule in question we mean to controvert; we deny that there is such a general rule. It is not to be found in Puffendorf, Grotius, Vattel, or any of the other jurists excepting Bynkershoek, whose rules of war are written in blood; and even he has qualified the rule; he says himself that the rule prohibiting all commercial intercourse is done away by the laws of commerce. Valin only shows that a particular intercourse is forbidden by the law of France; and, in noticing British insurance, he does not condemn the French for procuring it. The case of Potts v. Bell proves that the doctrine in question has but recently been introduced. It is, however, in that case admitted with the exception of those cases where the royal license has been obtained; but this exception must be taken as part of the rule itself. The general principle without the exception would be ruinous to the nation. The inconveniences which would arise from it are incalculable. In 1747, Lord Mansfield and Sir Dudley Ryder were of a different opinion as to the policy of the rule, and as to the principle of law.

In Henkle v. the Royal Ex. As. Co. Lord Hardwicke said: "It might be going too far to "say that all trading *with an enemy is [217 "unlawful; for the general doctrine would go "a great way even where only English goods "were exported, and none of the enemy's im- "ported, which may be very beneficial."

In this country there has been no decision to establish the rule; and if we take the British rule, we must take it with the power of dispensation; but the President has no such power; the sovereignty has been said to reside in the people; but the remedy by application to Congress would be too slow and uncertain. We must conclude, therefore, that in this country no such rule exists.

It has, nevertheless, been contended by the counsel for the captors, that the rule not only exists, but that it is universal. Is a man, then, bound to abandon all his property which may happen to be in the enemy's country at the breaking out of a war? Such would be the consequence of taking the rule without any exception. Some cases of intercourse with the enemy, it is true, are so palpably illegal as to admit of no doubt on the subject; such as all traitorous intercourse, and perhaps a direct trade; so, also, if the intercourse be in consequence of a new enterprise undertaken since the commencement of hostilities; but many cases must necessarily occur, on the breaking out of a war, which ought certainly to form exceptions. Such is the doctrine in England, where the excepted cases are provided for by the royal license permitting intercourse with the enemy, under certain circumstances and with certain restrictions. In a country, then, where licenses cannot be obtained, all cases where they would be granted if a power of granting them existed, must be cases of judicial exception to the general rule. Many occasions may and frequently do occur, during war, on which such intercourse with the enemy would be highly expedient in a political view—occasions where the public good requires an exception; and those, too, cases neither of necessity nor humanity, which must always be excepted.

It is not necessary to inquire whether the mere acceptance of a license is ground of condemnation; it is the sailing under a license 218] which constitutes the offense; but *in our case there was no sailing under the license. The license authorized a voyage to a British, Portuguese or Spanish port. The voyage in the present case was to a port belonging to the Swedes. The letter of Allen, the consul, which has been said to authorize a voyage to a Swedish port also, is entitled to no regard. Admiral Sawyer's letter was the only protection. All the acts of Allen, except certifying that letter, were unauthorized and unofficial; they were no protection to the Aurora. Allen's letter shows, on the face of it, that the voyage to St. Barts was not covered by the license; it merely expresses an opinion that that voyage would answer the purposes contemplated by the British government as well as a voyage to a British port.

It has been said that the real destination of the Aurora was to a British port; and in support of the position, the circumstance of her being considerably to the leeward of St. Barts, when captured, has been urged in proof; but the argument deserves little consideration; it is a very common thing to fall to the leeward. Besides, it appears that the Aurora had been beating to the windward three days before she was captured, although when she first made the land there were numerous British ports under her lee.

It has also been argued on the part of the captors, that a transshipment from St. Barts to an enemy port was intended; but there is no evidence even of this; nor was there any motive for such transshipment. The cargo would meet with as ready a sale at St. Barts as at a British island. The superior advantage of taking in a return cargo at the former place has been already noticed.

But it is said that it was equally criminal to carry this cargo to St. Barts as to a port of the enemy, because the Swedes would probably dispose of it to the British. This argument, also, we conceive to be wholly without foundation. No decision to that effect has ever been pronounced. The case of the island of St. Eustatius in the last war, goes to prove the reverse of this doctrine.

Nothing, therefore, as we conceive, having been proved, on the part of the captors, suffi- 219] cient to subject the *property in question to condemnation, we trust that the court, on the consideration of the whole case, will decree restitution to the claimants.

Monday, March 7th. Absent—TODD, J.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The ship Aurora and cargo, owned by the claimants, who are American citizens, and documented as American property, were captured, on the 26th of November, 1812, by the private armed ship Governor Tompkins, on an ostensible destination for St. Bartholomews. From the documents on board and the preparatory examinations, it appears that the ship sailed from Newburyport to Norfolk, in ballast, took in her present cargo, consisting of bread, flour, corn, &c., at the latter place, and sailed from thence on the voyage on which she was captured, on or about the 12th of November, 1812. The cargo was consigned to the supercargo of the ship; and the destination thereof upon the ship's papers, supported by the preparatory examinations, was St. Bartholomews, for which island the ship obtained her clearance. At the time of capture, she was to the leeward of that island; and certain passports or protections from the agents of the British government were found on board, which are familiarly known by the title of British licenses; which documents are as follows.[1]

Two questions have been made at bar. 1. Whether the acceptance and use of an enemy's license or passport of protection, on a voyage performed in furtherance of the enemy's avowed objects, be illegal, so as to affect the property with confiscation. 2. If so, whether there is anything in the present case to exempt it from the general principle.

The first point having just been decided in the affirmative, in the Julia, it only remains to inquire whether there be anything in this case to exempt it from the general principle.

In the opinion of a majority of the court, it is not easy to discriminate between these cases. Both of the vessels *had licenses or pass- [220 ports of the same character, and substantially for the same purpose, except only that the object of the Julia was to supply the allied armies in Portugal, and the original intention of the Aurora was to go to the British West Indies. It is by no means clear that this destination was ever changed; but admitting that, from an apprehension of seizure in case of her returning to the United States after touching at a British port, she, in fact, sailed on a voyage to St. Bartholomews, this can make no substantial difference in her favor. Her object in going there was equally criminal, and subserved the views of the enemy nearly if not quite as well as if her cargo had been landed in a British island; of the real design of the voyage there can remain no doubt; for it abundantly appears, from the license itself, that the professed object of Admiral Sawyer at least, in granting it, was to obtain a supply of provisions for the enemy; and the court will not easily lend its ear to a suggestion, that notwithstanding the Aurora was found with a British protection on board, of so obnoxious a character, yet her owners intended to deceive the enemy, either by going to a port not mentioned in it, or by disposing of her cargo in a way that would not have promoted his views. Without meaning to say that such conduct may under no circumstances whatever be explained, the court thinks that there is no proof, in this case, to show that it was not the intention of the claimants to carry into effect the original understanding between them and Mr. Allen. For although the destination to St. Bartholomews be conceded, it is evident that Mr. Allen, who acted as British consul, supposed the views of Admiral Sawyer might be answered as well in that as in any other way; nor is it clear, as was said at bar, that the documents which were received from Mr. Allen, which varied more in form than in substance from the Admiral's passport, would not have protected her against British capture, on a voyage to that island. The protection of Admiral Sawyer extended to unarmed American vessels laden with dry provisions, and bona fide bound to British, Portuguese or Spanish ports. The only modification, or extension, introduced by Mr. Allen, was a permission to go to a Swedish island, equally neutral with Spain and Portugal, in the vicinity of the British possessions. Whether all or any of these papers would have saved the Aurora from confiscation in a British court of admir-221*] alty, this court is not bound *to assert; it is sufficient if that were the reasonable expectation of the parties, as it certainly was, and it is more than probable that such expectation would have been realized, considering the very important advantage which the enemy was to derive from them. In case of capture, there can be no doubt that the claimants would have interposed these very papers, which are now supposed to have emanated from unauthorized agents, and probably with success, as a shield against forfeiture. Why, then, should they be permitted to allege here, that they would have been ineffectual for that purpose?

1.—See the statement at the beginning of the report of this case.

It is also insisted, that, in this case, no illicit intercourse had actually taken place; that the whole offense, if any, consisted in intention; and that if a capture had not intervened, there was still a locus penitentiæ, and no one can say that even a project of going to St. Bartholomews might not have been abandoned. In this reasoning the court does not concur; but is of opinion that the moment the Aurora started on the voyage for St. Bartholomews, with the license in question and a cargo of provisions, she rendered herself liable to capture by the public and private armed ships of the United States, who were not bound to lay by and see how she would conduct herself during the voyage, the consequence of which would be that no right of capture would exist until all chance of making it were at an end.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ADVENTURE, ———, MASTER.

The case of a vessel and cargo, belonging to a citizen of one belligerent nation, captured on the high seas by a cruiser of the other belligerent, given to a neutral, and by him brought into a port and libeled in a court of his own country, between which and the nation to which the vessel originally belonged war breaks out before final adjudication, is to be considered as a case of salvage. One moiety adjudged to the libelants and the other moiety to remain subject to the future order of the court from which the appeal was brought up; and to be restored to the original owner after the termination of the war, unless legislative provision should previously be made for the confiscation of enemy's property found in the country at the declaration of war.

The act of bringing in the cargo, though consisting of articles the importation of which was prohibited by law, was not considered, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, as subjecting the property to forfeiture.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia.

The facts of the case, as stated by JOHNSON, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, were as follow:

The libelants were the master and crew of the American brig Three Friends. On the 14th November, 1811, whilst on their voyage from Salem to the Brazils, *with a val- [*222 uable cargo on board, they were captured by the Nymphe and Medusa, French frigates, and by them the brig was plundered and burnt. On the 21st, the frigates captured the Adventure, a British ship laden with British goods; and, after taking out a part of the cargo, made a present of the residue to the libelants. The fact of the gift is established by a writing under the hand of the captain of the Medusa, commander of the squadron, in which he says: "Je donne au capitaine," in the language of an unqualified donation. On the 23d November they left the squadron, and arrived at Norfolk on the 1st of February, 1812, after a long and boisterous voyage in a large ship navigated by a very inadequate crew. On her arrival in the United States, she was libeled by the captain and crew as their property acquired under the donation of the French captor; and the United States interposed a claim for the forfeiture incurred under the non-importation act. At the time of her arrival peace existed between this country and Great Britain: but on the 18th of June following, and pending this suit, war was declared.

Pinkney, for the libelants,

Said it was not his intention, at this time, to inquire whether or not this be a case for condemnation under the non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809; he did not mean to deny that it is not. Waiving that question, therefore, for the present, he contended that the property in controversy is either a droit of admiralty subject to salvage, or that it is to be considered as derelict. But no evidence has been produced in support of the latter supposition. It must therefore be considered as a case of the former description, and a case, too, of the most meritorious character.

If this be conceded, the next question is, what rate of salvage shall be allowed. The English rule on this subject is fixed only in the case of recapture by the government ships and privateers. The salvage allotted to the first is at the rate of one-eighth of the beneficial interest in the whole recaptured property; to the last, one-sixth. In all other cases, the judge of the court is at liberty to order such salvage as he *shall deem reasonable. Sometimes [*223 the whole property saved is allowed—sometimes the moiety only, and sometimes less. The present case is one of extraordinary merit.

In the court below, two points were made in behalf of the United States:

1. That this was a case of forfeiture under the non-intercourse act of 1st of March, 1809; and if not, then,

2. That it was a case of salvage, and the rate to be allotted discretionary with the court.

JOHNSON, J., here suggested a doubt whether it was not a case under the non-intercourse act; and asked whether the United States could rightfully seize the property in question as a droit of admiralty, in port, or any other British property on the land. He also observed that there might be some difficulty with regard to the allotment of salvage, should this prove to be a case of that kind.

Harper, for the libelants.

On a capture of a vessel, the right of the captors is only inceptive. In order to complete that right, it is necessary to prosecute it to the condemnation of the vessel in a court of competent jurisdiction. In the present case, the French captors transferred their right, whatever it was, to the American master and crew. Could they lawfully do this? The decision of the question depends upon the doctrine relative to the transfer of a chose in action. We contend that they could; and that the transferees were consequently entitled, as captors, to prosecute the original capture.

But if the libelants are not entitled as captors, then it is a question whether it be a case under the non-intercourse act, or a case of salvage.

In order to bring it within the meaning of the non-intercourse act, it must be shown that there was an intention to import for sale or use —that there was a voluntary importation, and that the importation was from a foreign port or place. But here there was no such intention; 224] *here was no voluntary importation; and no importation, as we conceive, from any foreign port or place within the meaning of the act; here was no intention to infract any law whatsoever; it was a case of clear necessity; the master and crew were obliged to bring in the ship to save their own lives.

But it may perhaps be said that though it was necessary to bring in the ship, it was not necessary to bring in the cargo. What, then, was to be done with it? Was it to be thrown into the sea? The British owner was not divested of his right. Such an act, therefore, would have been inconsistent with the neutral character which it was the duty of all Americans to preserve towards Great Britain, with whom we were then at peace. We conceive that the course pursued by the libelants was unexceptionable. They proceeded openly to the United States, and, immediately on their arrival, delivered up the property to be disposed of according to law. There is no appearance, throughout the whole transaction of the smallest intention to violate any law whatever.

It must, therefore, be considered as a case of salvage; and had the relations between Great Britain and the United States continued as they were at the time of the importation, the residue of the property in question, after deducting the salvage, must have been restored to the British owner.

But the declaration of war has altered the nature of the case. The ship and cargo have now become enemy property, and, as such, are claimed by the American government, subject, however, to the right of the libelants.

What salvage is to be allotted to us, the court will decide. Our case is certainly one of great merit; we were, for more than two months, exposed to the perils and hardships of a long and boisterous voyage; and that, too, in a large ship to the management of which the small crew on board was by no means adequate. Less than half the amount of the property would not, we conceive, compensate us for the trouble and danger we have incurred.

Pinkney* observed that he had not [*225 considered this as a case coming within the meaning of the non-intercourse act, and had therefore waived the discussion of that point; he still doubted whether there were sufficient grounds to support it. The law only prohibits importations from a foreign port or place. In cases of transshipment, it may perhaps be said that the property transshipped is imported from a foreign place; but here was no transshipment, no change of vessel; here, the property is imported from the high seas, which can hardly be considered as coming within the description of a foreign port or place. He did not mean, he said, to enter into a formal argument. He would, however, observe that, in his opinion, the captors, in the present case, could not complete their right to the property in question by means of a neutral master and crew, even if the British owner was divested of his right.

Rush, Attorney-General, conceived that the high seas might be considered as a foreign place; that the cargoes of whale ships from the Pacific, such as oil, whalebone, blubber, &c., which originate from the sea, might be considered as within the meaning of the non-intercourse act. He suggested that the word place, in the act, was probably used in contradistinction to port.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. In the Circuit Court the high seas were considered as common to all nations, and, of course, foreign to none.

Pinkney said this was a case of very considerable difficulty. How is the property to be disposed of? It cannot be decreed to the United States, for it is not a case under the non-intercourse act, nor was the seizure jure belli. A prize court had no jurisdiction, for the seizure was in time of peace, for a supposed violation of the non-intercourse law, and after the property was landed. It cannot be decreed wholly to the libelants, because it must be considered as a case of salvage. Nor can it be restored to the original owner, because he is an alien enemy.

Monday, March 7th. Absent—TODD, J.

STORY, J., did not sit in this cause, some distant relative of his having an interest in it.

*JOHNSON, J., after stating the facts [226 of the case, as before mentioned, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The very peculiar circumstances of this case require the application of a variety of principles; and the court has not been aided in its inquiries by that elaborate discussion which such novel cases generally elicit. But they are relieved by the reflection, that the principles to which they must resort in forming their judgment are well established, and lead satisfactorily to a conclusion.

The most natural mode of acquiring a definite idea of the rights of the libelants in the subject matter, will be, to follow it through the successive changes of circumstances by which the nature and exteut of the rights of the parties were affected—the capture, the donation, the arrival in the United States, and the state of war.

As between the belligerents, the capture undoubtedly produces a complete devesture of property. Nothing remains to the original proprietor but a mere scintilla juris, the spes recuperandi. The modern and enlightened practice of nations has subjected all such captures to the scrutiny of judicial tribuuals, as the only practical means of furnishing documentary evidence to accompany ships that have been captured, for the purpose of proving that the seizure was the act of sovereign authority, and not mere individual outrage. In the case of a purchase made by a neutral, Great Britain demands the production of such documentary evidence, issuing from a court of competent authority, as will dispossess the purchaser of a ship originally British. (The Fladoyen, 1 Rob., 114, 135). Upon the donation, therefore, whatever right might, in the abstract, have existed in the captor, the donee could acquire no more than what was consistent with his neutral character to take. He could be in no better situation than a prize-master navigating the prize, in pursuance of orders from his commander. The vessel remained liable to British capture on the whole voyage. And, on her arrival in a neutral territory, the donee sunk into a mere bailee for the British claimant, with those rights over the thing 227] *in possession which the civil law gave for care and labor bestowed upon it.

The question, then, occurs, is this a case of salvage?

On the negative of the proposition it is contended, that it is a case of forfeiture, and therefore not a case of salvage as against the United States—that it was an unneutral act to assist the enemy in bringing the vessel infra presidia, or into any situation where the rights of recapture would cease, and therefore not a case of salvage as against the British claimant.

But the court entertain an opinion unfavorable to both these objections.

This could never have been a case within the view of the legislature, when passing the non-importatiou act. The ship was the plank on which the shipwrecked mariner reached the shore; and although it may be urged that bringing in the cargo was not necessarily connected with their own return to their country, yet, upon reflection, it will be found, that this also can be excused upon very fair principles. It was their duty to adhere strictly to their neutral character; but to have cast into the sea the cargo, the property of a belligerent, would have been to do him an injury by taking away that chance of recovery subject to which they took it into their possession. Besides, bringing it into the United States, did not necessarily presuppose a violation of the non-importation laws. If it came within the description of property cast casually on our shores, as we are of opinion it did, legal provision exists for disposing of it in such a mauner as would comport with the policy of our laws. At last, they could but deliver it up to the hands of the government, to be reshipped by the British claimant, or otherwise appropriated under the sanction of judicial process. And such was the course that they pursued. Far from attempting any violatiou of the laws of the country, upon their arrival here they deliver it up to the custody of the laws, and leave it to be disposed of under judicial sanction. The case has no one feature of an illegal importation, and cannot possibly have imputed to it the violation of law.

*As to the question arising on the in- [228
terest of the British claimant, it would, at this time, be a sufficient answer, that they who have no rights in this court cannot urge a violation of their rights against the claim of the libelants. But there is still a much more satisfactory answer. To have attempted to carry the vessel infra presidia of the enemy, would, unless it could have been excused on the grouud of necessity, have been an unneutral act. But when every exertion is made to bring it to a place of safety, in which the original right of the captured would revive and might be asserted, instead of aiding his enemy, it is doing an act exclusively resulting to the benefit of the English claimant.

It being determined to be a case of salvage, the next question is, as to the amount to be allowed. On this subject there is no precise rule; nor is it, in its nature, reducible to rule. For it must, in every case, depend upon peculiar circumstances, such as peril incurred, labor sustained, value decreed, &c., all of which must be estimated and weighed by the court that awards the salvage. As far as our inquiries extend, when a proportion of the thing saved has been awarded, a half has been the maximum, and an eighth the minimum; below that, it is usual to adjudge a compensation in numero. In some cases, indeed, more than a half may have been awarded; but they will be found to be cases of very extraordinary merit, or on articles of very small amount. In the present case, the account sales of the cargo was near $16,000; and we are of opinion that the one-half of that sum will be an adequate compensation:

The next question arises on the application of the residue. On this point, the court is led to a conclusion by the following considerations:

At the arrival of the vessel in the United States, the original British owner would, unquestionably, have been entitled to the balance. The state of war, however, at present, prevents his interposing a claim in the courts of this country. But as this property was found within the United States at the declaration of war, it must stand on the same footing with other British property similarly situated. Although property of that description is liable to be disposed of by the legislative *power of [229 the country, yet, until some act is passed upon the subject, it is still under the protection of the law, and may be claimed after the termination of war, if not previously confiscated. We will, therefore, make such order respecting it as will preserve it, subject to the will of the court, to be disposed of as future circumstauces shall render proper.

As to the mode of distributing the amount of the salvage, the court have concluded to adopt an arbitrary distribution; because there exists no positive rule on that subject. They would have adopted the rules of the prize act relative to cases of salvage, had the circumstances of the case admitted of its application.

This court orders and decrees, that the decree of the Circuit Court of Virginia, in this case, be reversed; that the costs and charges be paid out of the proceeds of the sale; that the one-half of the balance be adjudged to the libelants, to be divided into thirteen and a half parts, three of which shall be paid to the captain, two to the supercargo, two to the chief mate, one and a half to the second mate, and one to each of the seamen. And that the balance be deposited in the bank of Virginia, to remain subject to the future order of the Circuit Court.

JOHN GREEN
v.
JOHN LITER AND OTHERS.

The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction in writs of right, where the property demanded exceeds $500 in value; and if, upon the trial the demandant recover less, he is not to be allowed his costs; but, at the discretion of the court, may be adjudged to pay costs.

At common law, a writ of right will not lie, except against the tenant of the freehold demanded. If there are several tenants claiming several parcels of land by distinct titles, they cannot lawfully be joined in one writ; and if they are, they may plead in abatement of the writ. If the demandant demands against any tenant more land than he holds, he may plead non-tenure as to the parcel not holden; but the writ shall abate only as to the parcel whereof non-tenure is pleaded and admitted or proved.

Under the act of Kentucky, to amend process in chancery and common law, the party may recover, although he prove only part of the claim in his declaration; but it does not enable him to join parties in an action, who could not be joined at the common law. The act of Virginia of 1786, reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right, did not vary the rights or legal predicament of the parties, as they existed at the common law. It did not therefore change the nature and effect of the pleadings; and notwithstanding that act, the tenant shall still have the full benefit of the ordinary pleas in abatement. The clause of the act which provides that the tenant at the trial may, on the general issue, give in evidence any matter which might have been specially pleaded, is confined to matters in bar. Under the act of Virginia of 1786, the tenant may, at his election, plead any special matter in bar in a writ of right, or give it in evidence on the mise joined. The act is not compulsive, but cumulative. The act of Virginia of 1786, did not change the nature of the inquiry as to the titles of the parties to a writ of right. In order to support a writ of right, it is not necessary to prove an actual entry under title, or actual taking of esplees. A constructive seizin in deed is sufficient.

Under the land law of Virginia, the whole legal estate and seizin of the commonwealth pass to the patentee, upon the issuing of his patent, in as full and beneficial a manner (subject only to the rights of the commonwealth), as the commonwealth itself held them.

A conveyance of wild and vacant lands gives a constructive seizin thereof, in deed, to the grantee, and attaches to him all the legal remedies incident to the estate. A fortiori, this principle applies to a patent.

In Kentucky, a patent is the completion of the legal title; and it is the legal title only that can come in controversy in a writ of right.

A better subsisting adverse title in a third person, is no defense in a writ of right.

If tenants claiming different parcels of land by distinct titles, omit to plead that matter in abatement, and join the mise, it is an admission that they are joint tenants of the whole; and the verdict, if for the demandant for any parcel of the land, may be general, that he hath more mere right to hold the same than the tenants; and if of any parcel for the tenants, that they have more mere right to hold the same than the demandant.

If a man enter into lands, having title, his seizin is not bounded by his actual occupancy, but is held to be co-extensive with his title. But if a man enter without title, his seizin is confined to his possession by metes and bounds.

An entry into a parcel which is vacant, will not give seizin of a parcel which is in an adverse seizin; but an entry into the last parcel, in the name of the whole, will enure as an entry into the vacant parcel.

Under a conveyance, taking effect under the statute of uses, the bargainee has a complete seizin in deed without actual entry or livery of seizin.

THIS was a writ of right brought by Green, the demandant, against the tenants, to recover seizin of a large tract of land lying in Kentucky, and set forth in the count. The writ of right was sued out under the act of the Virginia Assembly, entitled "an act for reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right."

At the trial in the Circuit Court for the Kentucky District, several questions arose upon which the court was divided; whereupon those questions were certified for the opinion of the Supreme Court. They are as follows:

*1st. Has the Circuit Court of the [*230 United States jurisdiction in a writ of right, where the land claimed by the demandant is above the value of $500, but the tenement held by the tenant is of less value than $500?

2d. Can the demandant join in the writ and count several tenants claiming under several distinct, separate and independent original titles, all of which interfere with the land of the demandant? If he can, must he demand of them the tenements they severally hold, or may he demand a tenement to the extent of his own title? If it comprises a part not claimed or held by any of the said tenants, may he demand, in his count against the several tenants, his own tenement, or must he demand of each tenant the tenement he severally holds?

3d. Can the tenant, under the act of the Virginia Assembly for reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right, plead in abatement either the plea of non-tenure, joint tenancy, sole tenancy, several tenancy, or never tenant of the freehold, or any of them, or other pleas in abatement necessary to his case; or is he compellable to join in the mise in the form prescribed by the said act? If he can, when or at what stage of the proceedings? If he cannot, may he give it in evidence on the mise joined?

4th. May the tenant, under the said act, plead specially any matter of bar, or must he join the mise, without other plea, in the form prescribed by the said act?

5th. Can a demandant who has regularly obtained a patent from the land-office of the state of Virginia for the land in contest, under the act of the Virginia Legislature, passed in the year 1779, commonly styled the land law, maintain a writ of right, under such patent, against a person claiming and holding possession under a younger patent from the said state, without having first taken the actual possession of the land, under his patent, held by the tenant? If he can maintain a writ of right without such proof in the general, can he do it where his right of entry is barred by an actual adverse possession of twenty years?

6th. Is the eldest patent, obtained as afore-
231*] said, for *the land in controversy, sufficient proof of the best mere right; or can the demandant be put on the proof that, in the incipiency, and in the different steps necessary to complete his title, he has complied with the requisites prescribed by the acts, the one entitled "an act for adjusting and settling the titles of claimants to unpatented lands under the present and former government, previous to the establishment of the commonwealth land-office," and the other, "an act for establishing a land-office and ascertaining the terms and manner of grauting waste and unappropriated lands," and the subsequent laws of Virginia on the same subject, in force at the time of the erection of the District of Kentucky into a separate state?

7th. If the demandant is not compellable to show anything beyond his patent, can the tenant holding the younger patent be permitted to impeach the demandant's pateut, to show the incipiency and completion of his own title, and the relative merits of his own and the demandant's title?

8th. Can the defendant defend himself by showing an older and better existing title than the demandant's, in a third person?

9th. Where several tenants, claiming in severalty, are joined in a writ of right, should the finding of the jury be several of the mere right between the demandant and each tenant, or may it be a general findiug that the demandant hath the most mere right?

10th. The commonwealth having first made and granted a patent to the demandant, and afterwards, by her patent, granted a part of the same land to the defendants, who entered and obtained the first possession, the demandant afterwards entered and took possession, under his first grant, of that part of his laud not within the patent of the first grantee—who has the best mere right to the land, where the patents conflict, outside of the actual close of the last grantee?

11th. Will an entry upon part, and taking the esplees under the elder graut from the commonwealth, and making claim to the whole land included within the bounds of the elder grant, authorize the demandant to maintaiu his 232*] *writ of right against the tenants holding the previous possession under a youuger patent interfering with the elder grant?

Wickliffe, for the demandant.

The court below being divided in opinion upon the several questions already stated, they have been adjourned to this court. The questions themselves sufficiently show the controversy. And the several points will be examined as they present themselves on the record.

With regard to the first, we contend that the Circuit Court has jurisdiction in the case therein stated; and that the defendant's only remedy, in such case, under the act of Congress, is, that he shall be excused from paying costs, and that he may, at the discretion of the court, be allowed his costs. In support of this point we rely on the judicial act of 1789. (Laws U. S., vol. 1, p. 47, 1 Sess., 1 Cong., eh. 20, § 11 and 20.)

2d. Upon the second question, we contend, in behalf of the demandant, that under the act of assembly of Virg. (Rev. Co. P. P., 34), if his tenement is an entire one, and interfered with by divers tenants, he can only demand his tenement as it is, and cannot know how the adverse claimants bound or abut their claims or possession; and that as all claim and obstruet him in the use and possession, he has a right to sue all. We contend, further, that although the demandant claim more than the tenants or either of them hold, still he may recover as much as is withheld from him by the tenant or tenants. To support this positiou we rely upon the act of assembly of Virginia of 1792, ch. 125, which is in force in Kentucky and is the same in substance with the act of 25 Edw. 3, ch. 16, which enacts "that by the exception of non-tenure of parcel no writ shall be abated but for quantity of the non-tenure which is alleged;" and the act of assembly of Kentucky, entitled "an act to amend proceedings in chancery and common law;" the latter of which acts expressly provides, that if the plaintiff at law shall prove part of his demand or claim set up in his declaration, he shall not be non-suited, but shall have judgment for what he proves. (Sec, also, Boothe on real action, p. 2.)

*3d. On the third question, we insist,[*233 that, under a sound construction of the act of assembly of Virgiuia of 1786 (Revised Code, vol. 1, p. 33, ch. 27), no matter in abatement which does not affect the right can be pleaded. But if it can be pleaded, yet, under the acts of assembly of Kentucky, and the rules of the Circuit Court of the District of Keutucky, it ought to be pleaded during the appearance term, and be supported by oath. It is further insisted that only such matters as assume the character of abatement at common law, and which effect the mere right, such as non-tenure, can be given in evidence on the mise joined. A contrary construction of the act would lead to the worst of consequences. If, upon the mise joined, all matter in abatement might be giveu in evidence, a man might lose his valuable inheritance by the defendant proving on the trial that he claimed and held as joiut tenant, and not as sole tenant. It would also involve the monstrous absurdity of making the jury the sole and exclusive judges of the demandant's count and pleading.

4th. The fourth proposition seems to be abstract and indefinite. If the matter in bar affects the mere right, and goes to show substantially that the demandant has no claim in fee-simple, it is submitted to the court to say, whether, under a just construction of the act, he can plead it. But as the act allows him to give such bar in evidence on the general issue, it is within the sound discretion of the inferior court, to permit the defendant to plead the special matter, or give it in evidence on the general issue; and that must depend upon the time when the application is made. On this point, the case of Resler v. Sheehee (1 Cranch, 110), and the case of Fox and White, in the Court of Appeals in Kentucky, are relied upon. It is further submitted, whether the mere etiquette of pleading and the time when that pleading shall be filed, is not a matter of practice only, and proper to be left to the circuit courts to settle under their own rules or the statutes and practice in Kentucky.

5th. The fifth question seems to be a more important one; and it would have been, perhaps, more regular to have placed that before the other questions, inasmuch as a decision upon that, affirmatively, would preclude the necessity of deciding several of the others.

234*] *Upon this question we contend that the demandant can, upon his patent, maintain his writ of right; and that actual possession is not necessary. To maintain this point it is not at all material to prove that by the king's letters patent, granting titles to land in England, a writ of right could be maintained. It is believed that no case has occurred where that point has been directly decided. But titles in England are conditional, not absolute. Since the time of William the Conqueror, all grants of land have been made on feudal principles; and a patent in England is not of itself a right, but an authority to the grantee to take a right; that right rests upon conditions; and one of those conditions is entering and taking possession of the land. In the grant there are two parties supposed, the king and grantee; and the grantee becomes bound to the king when he accepts the estate, and not till then; the ultimate property remains with the king; and upon the tenant's entering, he becomes seized of the use only; and hence exists the reason, in the English books, of requiring the demandant, in the most solemn trial of a right to real estate, to show and prove the highest title the subject ever had, the dominium utile, or usufruct of the property; for if neither he nor his ancestor had entered and been seized of the use, (the dominium directum remaining in the king) they never had a fee-simple estate; the feudal grant not being an estate in fee, but a right to enter and take one; and if that right was never exercised, the estate was never taken. (See 2 Bl. Com., 46, 104, 105, 107, 108.) It appears, also, further, from Boothe, and Fitz. (Nat. Brev. tit. writ of right, letter F.), that the demandant had not only to set out when he was seized, but by what service he held the land.

It is important to state the kind of title made by letters patent such as those under which the demandant claims. In 1777, the legislature of Virginia abolished all servile and feudal tenures; and in 1779, passed her land law, under which we derive title. In one section of that act, the form of an allodial grant is given; and, by way of closing every doubt as to the title, the register was directed to indorse that the patentee had title. Having provided, in that section, for the complete investment of an absolute and unconditional title under that act, and actuated by a laudable desire to place all 235*] *her citizens upon the same tenure, in the 19th section of the same act she declares, "that "all reservations and conditions in the patents "or grants of land from the crown of England "or of Great Britain, under the former govern- "ment, are hereby declared to be null and "void; and that all lands thereby respective- "ly granted shall be held in absolute and un- "conditional property, to all intents and pur- "poses whatsoever, in the same manner with "lands hereafter to be granted by the common- "wealth, by virtue of this act." And by a subsequent section of the same act, all laws requiring the seating or possession of land to vest title, are expressly repealed. It will be perceived that the legislature not only gave the form of a patent such as never had been issued before in that state, but provided that an indorsement should appear on the back of the letters patent, that the grantee had title, no such indorsement ever having been made or allowed during the regal government. But lest the titles might, in some manner, be tinctured with the learning of the feudal law, they explicity declare that the estate shall be held in absolute and unconditional property. It might here be asked, can any man say that the patent of the commonwealth, issued in strict pursuance of this act, does not convey a fee-simple estate, without any condition being performed by the patentee? To us it seems that this is a point too clear for doubt.

The attention of the court is next called to the act of 1786. That act, in its title and context, professes to be an act to reform the method of proceeding in writs of right; and expressly provides, that it shall be lawful for a person claiming a fee-simple title to sue forth the præcipe quod reddat, &c. This act gives the writ. If the demandant has a fee-simple estate (and the only question which can be involved is, has the demandant, by these letters patent, a fee-simple estate), a further argument is drawn from the fact of passing the act itself. The necessity of this reform had become obvious to the legislature and the people of Virginia, from the great and radical change of the land titles created by the act of 1779. That act had repealed all laws which required claimers of land to settle them; had repealed and abolished every service and tenure by which lands in that state had been theretofore held. Of course the form of the count at common law was totally defective and improper; *because that [236 contained not only the charge of actual seizin, but the time when, and by what kind of service the lands were held. The common law titles having ceased, the remedy ceased also; it then well became the legislature to give a statutory remedy suited to the statutory and then existing state of titles; and thus you find a form of præcipe and count given, precisely correspondent with the title. The act of 1779 abolished all the feudal tenures, and dispensed with actual possession; and the old allegations of possession and the kind of tenure, are omitted. This omission means something; and why did it take place if not for the causes now assigned? (See, on the foregoing points, Cruise on Real Estates, 12; Co. Litt., folio 48; Ch. Rev., 61.)

The form of the writ and count is very obviously taken from the British forms; and is not only the act of a legislature famed for its wisdom and learning, but report makes this form the peculiar work of a committee of the first lawyers then of the Virginia bar. To ascribe such unmeaning omissions to such men and to such a body, is wholly inadmissible.

But surely, on common law principles, it cannot be fairly contended that the demandant shall prove actual possession. The statute has given him his count or declaration. That count will, it is believed, be sufficient for him after verdict; and if a man proves everything he has alleged upon a good declaration, we understand the common law to be, that he shall have a verdict. If you require of the demandant to prove more than his count contains, where will you stop? If you say that after he proves and exhibits a fee-simple title, he shall also prove possession, why not say that he must prove by what tenure he holds, and whatever else he was bound to prove at common law; and which were equally indispensable to be proved before this statute? The case of Clay v. White (1 Munford, 162) will be relied on to prove that the patentee is, to every legal purpose, possessed of land, in Virginia, by his letters patent. Upon this point, the attention of the court is further called to the state of the country at the date of the Virginia land law. It was in the midst of a war with Great Britain; when sound policy required that many of the grantees who were engaged in the war (the officers and 237] *soldiers) should remain in it during its continuance; and that those not engaged should, to a certain extent, be drawn into its armies. In fact, this very land-office was opened with the twofold view of raising men and money to carry on the war. It is therefore asked, if the objects of the legislature would not have been defeated if the very bounty offered for the public service, and which might be the price of the blood of the father to the children, should depend upon seating and possessing the land? For if the doctrine obtain, that actual possession is necessary to a perfect title, or to give a fee-simple estate, it is incontrovertible (by the rules of the common law) that the death of the grantee before entry prevents the estate from descending; that the grantee cannot sell nor devise a mere right of entry; and that, by the bare attempt to do the one or the other, he works a forfeiture. (See Co. Litt., 214, 266, and Noy's Maxims, 84.) It is believed that one-third of the best lands in Kentucky are held by devise, purchase, or descent, without the original grantee ever having been possessed. With what astonishment will the Virginian or Kentuckian learn, for the first time, the monstrous doctrine that destroys every estate of the kind. Again, with the exception of four small forts or stations, the whole territory which now forms the state of Kentucky was, at the date of the law, a wilderness, in the possession and under the power of the Indians. In fact, a considerable part granted out by the state, below the Tennessee, is yet held, and may be held for a century, by the Indians. And can it be supposed that Virginia could have intended, when she invited the soldier and the capitalist to embark their fortunes in the war, and offered as a reward these lands, to have imposed the necessity of actual settlement and taking the esplees as a prerequisite to title? What are the esplees of a wilderness under the dominion of the tomahawk and the scalping knife? Are they the game or the wild acorns? If we be correct in supposing that the commonwealth vests in the demandant, in this case, a fee-simple estate, and legally possesses him of that estate, it follows that nothing less than an adverse possession of thirty years can bar him; and that twenty years is not a sufficient bar. In support of the foregoing observations, see Ch. Rev., p. 97; Id., p. 98, sec. 6; 1 Rev., Code of Vir. Laws, p. 33; 238] Id., p. —, Noy's Maxims, *160; Co. Litt., 48, note; Boothe., 112; Id., 98; Harding's (Kentucky) Reports, 162, Bradford v. Patterson; Sneed's Reports, 237, Brown v. Quarles; Co. Litt., 57; Fitz. N. B., 506, note; Rev. Code, ch. 114.

6th. On the sixth question proposed, we contend that the first patent conveys the legal estate in fee; that the incipiency of title was a matter between the commonwealth and the patentee; and, when settled with the commonwealth, and the title made perfect, that it does not lie in contest between the demandant and defendant. We contend, also, that, in a trial at law, of a mere legal right, the defendant cannot set up an equity against the elder grant. This point was settled by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in the old case of Brown v. Quarles, and has ever since been considered the law of that state.

8th. On the eighth question, we contend that the mise is joined upon the mere right between the demandant and defendant; and that the jury is to inquire whether the demandant hath more right, &c., or the defendant, &c., and that it will be absurd to inquire whether the demandant or someone else hath the most mere right.

9th. On the ninth, it may be observed that it must depend upon the manner in which the mise is joined. If the tenants jointly and severally join the mise upon the whole land claimed by the demandant in his count, then a general finding will be proper. But if they severally plead as to part, and disclaim or plead nontenure as to the rest, then the finding should be several, and respond to each issue.

10th. On the tenth, we contend that an entry into part in the name of the whole, and claiming the whole, will, on common law authority, sustain the writ and count as to all claiming under a younger and inferior right, that have not had thirty years' adverse possession; and, of course, that the land in the demandant's patent and outside of the close of the defendant, belongs to the demandant.

11th. The observations upon the tenth question will apply to this also.

Hughes, contra. [239

The fifth question being the most important, and that to which the demandant's counsel has principally directed his attention in the course of his argument, I shall confine my observations also, chiefly to that point.

The Virginia act of assembly of 19th December, 1792, which declares that "actual possession need not be proved to maintain a writ of right," was passed after the separation of Kentucky from Virginia; and consequently is not in force in the former state.

At common law, a writ of right cannot be maintained without proof of seizin in the demandant, and actual taking of esplees within the time of limitation; which, in England, is thirty years on a man's own seizin, and fifty on the seizin of his ancestors; and such was the law of Virginia until the year 1786, when the act for reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right was passed. But this act merely changed the mode of trial, not the substance of proof. It did not dispense with proof of the demandant's seizin; and, consequently, the law on that subject remains the same as before the passage of the act of 1786. (Vid. Boothe, 85, 111, 112; Co. Litt., 281, 393, 294; 2 Saund., 45, 46; Bac. Abr. tit. Limitation of Actions, B.; 4 Rep., 8, Bevill's case; Old Laws of Virginia, 147.)

From the case of Tisson v. Clarke (3 Wils., 419), it appears, that if the tenant did not pay his demi-mark, and deny the seizin of the demandant, such seizin was taken for confessed. Hence the defendant was put to prove his title, contrary to the general rule. (Vid. the case of Tisson v. Clarke, 3 Wils., 419; Id. 541; Co. Lit. § 514; Boothe, 113.) But the legislature of Virginia, by omitting to require the allegation of seizin, made it necessary that the demandant should prove it. If it had been alleged, and not denied, such proof, on the part of the demandant, would not have been necessary.

Although, according to the decision of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in the case of Innis et al. v. Crawford (M. S. report), the patent conveys a fee-simple estate, yet the patentee must so use it as not to lose his estate, 240]*and in such a manner as to prevent the operation of the statute of limitations. A patentee may lose his right by not entering in due time; and, in such case, having nothing superior to a right of entry, he cannot maintain a writ of right. At the time of the separation of Kentucky from Virginia, the statute of limitations of Virginia was, verbatim, the same as the statute of 32d of Henry VIII., c. 2, on which it has been decided that seizin was necessary within fifty years. (Vid. the M. S. report of the case of Sprigs v. Griffith, decided in Kentucky; also, the M. S. report of the case of Speed v. Buford, decided in the Court of Appeals of the same state, in May, 1813.)

But admit that a patent is equivalent to livery in law; we contend that livery in fact is necessary; and so must the case of White v. Clay (in 1 Munf., 162), be understood. (Co. Lit., 240, b.; Id. 111; Shep. Touch., 209, 223.)

The reason of the law requiring proof of actual possession is obvious. Such proof was required in order to secure the peaceable occupancy of the land to the rightful proprietor. Investiture and seizin were invented for the purpose of putting an end to litigation. They were notorious acts in the country, performed in the presence of the vicinage; and where there had been such actual seizin and investiture, the law, after the right of entry was gone, gave the demandant the writ of right to revive his former possession. (2 Bl. Com., 311, 312, Shep. Touch., 209.)

It is true that, according to the old law, a charter of feoffment, without actual livery, only gave an estate at will; and the statute of uses transfers the possession in law to the use; but no change was made thereby in the law respecting writs of right, which requires proof of actual possession.

With regard to the other questions adjourned, the counsel for the tenants contended,

As to the 1st and 2d points, that the demandant could not join, in the writ and count, several tenants claiming under several distinct, separate and independant original titles; and that, as they could not be joined, the Circuit 241] Court had no jurisdiction; inasmuch *as no one of the tenements in question was of the value of $500.

As to the 3d point, that non-tenure, no seizin, &c., might be pleaded under the act of Virginia, of 1786.

The 4th point he submitted.

On the 6th and 7th, he contended that the patent was not conclusive evidence in a writ of right.

On the 8th, he supported the affirmative of the question.

The 9th, he said respected matter of form merely.

As to the 10th, he insisted, that when a man takes possession, he takes possession to the extent of his claim.

The 11th, he said was answered by the observations on the 1st point.

Wickliffe, in reply,

Contended, that the Kentucky cases cited by the tenant's counsel, not being final and absolute, were not authority; that the Court of Appeals of Kentucky was, in fact, waiting for the decision of this court in these cases. But admitting them to be authority, still there was error in the finding of the jury; they had found a special verdict, which, by the common law, they could not do; they ought to have decided the mere right, and nothing more.

In the case of a grant from the crown of the same land to two different persons, if the last grantee enter, the former may maintain trespass.

In the case of Innis v. Crawford, the court, in effect, said, that the patent gave seizin; because they dated the disseizin by the tenant, from the date of his entry; but if the demandant was not seized, he could not have been disseized.

*The Court of Appeals of Virginia, [242 at different times have decided differently on the same law; but the courts of Kentucky have always decided that when the reason of the English law ceased in consequence of the different circumstances of the country, the law itself ceased.

Friday, March 11th. Present—All the Judges.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a writ of right brought by the demandant against the tenants, to recover seizin of a large tract of land set forth in the count. At the trial in the Circuit Court for Kentucky District, several questions arose upon which the court were divided; and these questions are now certified for the opinion of this court.

As to the first question, we are satisfied that the Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the cause. Taking the 11th and 20th sections of the judicial act of 1789, ch. 20, in connection, it is clear that the jurisdiction attaches where the property demanded exceeds $500 in value; and if, upon the trial, the demandant recover less, he is not allowed his costs; but, at the discretion of the court, may be adjudged to pay costs.

As to the second question, we are of opinion that, at common law, a writ of right will not lie, except against the tenant of the freehold demanded. If there are several tenants claiming several parcels of land by distinct titles, they cannot lawfully be joined in one writ; and if they are, they may plead in abatement of the writ. If the demandant demands against any tenant more land than he holds, he may plead non-tenure as to the parcel not holden; and this plea, by the ancient common law, would have abated the whole writ. But the statute 25 Edw. 3, (St. 5, ch, 16), which may be considered as a part of our common law, having been in force at the emigration of our ancestors, cured the defect, and declared that the writ should abate only as to the parcel whereof non-tenure was pleaded, and admitted or proved. In fact the act of Virginia of 1792, ch. 125, which is in force in Kentucky, enacts substantially the same provision as the statute of Edward.

243*] *But it is supposed, in argument, that the act of Kentucky, to amend proceedings in chancery and common law, which provides that if the plaintiff at law shall prove part of his demand or claim set up in his declaration, he shall not be non-suited, but shall have judgment for what he proves, entitles the demaudaut in this case to join parties who hold in severalty by distinct titles.

To this doctrine the court cannot accede. At common law, in many iustances, if the party demanded in his writ more than he proved was his right, he lost his action by the falsity of his writ. It was to cure this ancient evil that the act of Kentucky was made. It enables the party to recover, although he should prove only part of the claim in his declaration. But it does not intend to enable him to join parties in an action who could not be joiued at the commou law. It could no more entitle a demandant in a real action to recover against several teuants claiming by distinct and separate titles, than it could entitle a plaintiff to maintain a joiut action of assumpsit, where the contracts were several and independent. Infinite inconvenience and mischief would result from such a coustruction; and we should not incline to adopt it unless it were unavoidable.

As to the third question. It is clear, at the common law, that non-tenure, joint tenure, sole tenure and several tenure, were good pleas in abatement to a writ of right. But they could only be pleaded in abatement; for the tenant, by joining the mise, or pleading in bar, admitted himself tenant of the freehold. Such pleading in bar was an admission that he had a capacity to defend the suit; and he was estopped, by his own act, from denying it. The act of Virginia of 1786, ch. 27, reforming the proceedings on writs of right, was not intended to vary the rights or legal predicament of the parties. It did not, therefore, intend to change the nature and effect of the pleadings; and notwithstanding that act, the tenant shall still have the full benefit of the ordinary pleas in abatement. It is true that the act provides that the tenant, at the trial, may, on the general issue, give in evidence any matter which might have been specially pleaded. But this provision is manifestly confined to matters in bar. It would be absurd to suppose that the legislature meant to 244] give to a mere *exception in abatement the full effect of a perfect bar on the merits; which would be the case if such an exception would authorize a verdict for the tenant on issue joined on the mere right. The time and manner of filing the pleadings must, of course, be left to the established practice and rules in the Circuit Court.

As to the fourth point, we are of opinion that, under the act of Virginia of 1786 the tenant may, at his election, plead any special matter in bar, in a writ of right, or give it in evidence on the mise joined. The act is not deemed compulsive, but cumulative.

The fifth question is that which has been deemed most important; and to this the counsel on each side have directed their efforts with great ability.

It is clear, by the whole current of authority, that actual seizin, or seizin in deed, is, at the common law, necessary to maintain a writ of right. Nor is this peculiar to actions ou the mere right. It equally applies to writs of entry; and the language of the count in both cases is, that the demandant, or his ancestor, was, within the time of limitation, seized in his demesne as of fee, &c., taking the esplees, &c. It is highly probable that the foundation of this rule was laid in the earliest rudiments of titles at the common law. It is well known that, in ancient times, no deed or charter was necessary to couvey a fee-simple. The title, the full and perfect dominion, was conveyed by a mere livery of seizin in the presence of the vicinage. It was the notoriety of this ccremony, performed in the presence of his peers, that gave the tenant his feudal investiture of the inheritance. Deeds and charters of feoffment were of a later age, and were held not to convey the estate itself, but only to evidence the nature of the conveyance. The solemn act of livery of seizin was absolutely necessary to produce a perfect title, or as Fleta calls it, juris et seisinæ conjunctio. But, whatever may be its origin, the rule as to the actual seizin has long since become an inflexible doctrine of the common law.

It has been argued that the act of Virginia of 1786, ch. 27, meant in this respect to change the doctrine of the commou law, because that act has given the form of *the count in [245 a writ of right, and omits any allegation of seizin and taking esplees. There is certainly some counteuance in the act for the argument. But, on mature consideration, we are of opinion that it cannot prevail. The form of joining the mise in a writ of right, is also given in the same act; and that form includes the same inquiry, viz., "which hath the greater, right" as the forms at common law. It would seem to follow that the legislature did not mean to change the nature of the facts which were to be inquired into, but only to provide a more summary mode of proceeding. The clause in the same act allowing any special matter to be given in evidence on the mise joined, may also be called in aid of this construction. That clause certainly shows that it was not intended to relieve the demandant from the effect of auy existing bar; and want of seizin was, at the common law, a fatal bar. The statute of limitations of Virginia, of 19th December, 1792, ch. 77, which, as to this point, is a revisal of the old statute, limits a writ of right upon ancestra lseizin to 50 years, and upon the demandant's own seizin to 30 years next before the teste of the writ. It is therefore incumbent on the demandant to prove a seizin within the time of limitation; otherwise he is without remedy; and if so, it must be involved in the issue joined on the mere right. We are therefore of opinion that the act of 1786 did not mean to change the uature of the inquiry as to the titles of the parties, but merely to remedy some of the inconveniences in the modes of proceeding.

If, then, an actual seizin or seizin in deed be necessary to be proved, it becomes material to inquire what constitutes such a seizin. It has been supposed, in argument, that an actual entry under title and perception of esplees were necessary to be proved in order to show an actual seizin. But this is far from being true, even at the common law. There are cases in which there is a constructive seizin in deed, which is sufficient for all the purposes of action in legal intendment. In Hargrave's note (3 Co. Litt., 39 a), it is said that an entry is not always necessary to give a seizin in deed; for if the land be in lease for years, curtesy may be without entry or even receipt of rent. The same is the doctrine as to seizin in a case of possessio fratris. So, if a grantee or heir of several parcels of land in the same county enter into 246*] one parcel *in the name of the whole, where there is no conflicting possession, the law adjudges him in the actual seizin of the whole. (Litt., s. 417, 418.) In like manner, if a man have a title of entry into lands, but dare not enter for fear of bodily harm, and he approach as near the land as he dare, and claim the land as his own he hath presently, by such claim, a possession and seizin in the lands, as well as if he had entered in deed. (Litt., s. 419.) And livery within the view of the land will, under circumstances, give the feoffee a seizin in deed as effectually as an actual entry. There are, therefore, cases in which the law gives the party a constructive seizin in deed. They are founded upon this plain reason, that either the claim is made sufficiently notorious by an actual entry into part, of which the vicinage can take notice, or the party has done all that, under the circumstances of the case, he was bound to do. Lex non cogit seu ad vana aut impossibilia. The same is the result of conveyances deriving their effect under the statute of uses; for there, without actual entry or livery of seizin, the bargainee has a complete seizin in deed. (Com. Dig., uses [B. 1] [I.]; Cro. Eliz., 46; 1 Cruise Dig., 12; Shep. Touch., 223, &c.; Harg. Co. Litt., 271, note.) And the Kentucky act respecting conveyances, which is, in substance, like the statute of uses, gives to private deeds the same legal effect.

It has, however, been supposed, in argument, that not only an actual seizin or complete investiture of the land, but also a perception of the profits, or, as it is technically called, a taking of the esplees, is absolutely necessary to support a writ of right. It cannot, however, be admitted that the taking of the esplees is a traversable averment in the count. It is but evidence of the seizin; and the seizin in deed once established, either by a pedis positio, or by construction of law, the taking of the esplees is a necessary inference of law. If, therefore, a seizin be established, although the lands be leased for a term of years, and thereby the profits belong to the tenant, still the legal intendment is that the esplees follow the seizin. And so it would be although a mere trespasser, without claiming title, should actually take the profits during the time of the seizin alleged and proved. And, indeed, of certain real property, as a barren rock, a complete seizin may exist without the existence of esplees.

247*] *The result of this reasoning is, that wherever there exists the union of title and seizin in deed, either by actual entry and livery of seizin, or by intendment of law, as by conveyances under the statute of uses, or in the other instances which have been before stated, there the esplees are knit to the title, so as to enable the party to maintain a writ of right. And it will be found extremely difficult to maintain that a deed, which, by the lex loci, conveys a perfect title to waste and vacant lands, without further ceremony, will not yet enable the grantee to support that title by giving him the highest remedy applicable to it, without an actual entry.

Let us now consider how far a perfect title to waste and vacant lands can be considered as having passed by a patent under the land law of Virginia of 1779, ch. 13. It is argued that such a patent conveys only a right or title of entry, which, until consummated by actual possession, gives the patentee no actual investiture or seizin of the land; and it is likened to the case of a patent from the crown. Some countenance is lent by authority to this position, so far as respects patents from the crown; but a careful examination will be found by no means to establish its correctness. No livery of seizin is necessary to perfect a title by letters patent. The grantee, in such case, takes by matter of record; and the law deems the grant of record of equal notoriety with an actual tradition of the land in the view of the vicinage. The contrary is the fact as to feoffments. The deed is inoperative without livery of seizin. This difference alone would seem to carry a pretty strong implication that actual seizin passed by operation of law, on a patent from the crown; for it is the union of a right and seizin that constitutes a perfect title; and when once the law has declared a title perfect, it must include everything necessary to produce that effect. Accordingly we find it expressly held in Barwick's case (5 Co., 94), that letters patent under the great seal do amount to a livery in law. What is a livery in law but such an act as in legal contemplation amounts to a delivery of seizin? If, for instance, a feoffment include divers parcels of land in the same county, livery of seizin of one parcel, in the name of the whole, is livery of all not in an adverse seizin. This, therefore, as to all the parcels except that whereof livery is actually made, is but a livery in law; and yet to all [
248 intents and purposes it is as effectual as livery in deed. And it was upon the footing of this doctrine that, in Barwick's case, the court held that the conveyance of a freehold by letters patent to commence in futuro, was void as much as if the conveyance had been by feoffment; because in neither case could there be a present livery of the future freehold estate. The livery must operate at the time when it is made, or not at all. It is not, therefore, admitted by this court that letters patent of the crown do not convey a perfect title, where there is no interfering possession.

But even admitting it were otherwise, still we think a patent under the land law of Virginia must be considered as a statute grant, which is to have all the legal effects attached to it which the legislature intended. It cannot be doubted that the legislature were competent to give their patentees a perfect title and possession without actual entry. Have they so done? We think that it is impossible, looking to the language of their acts, or the state of the country, to doubt that the whole legal estate and seizin of the commonwealth in the lands passed to the patentee, upon the issuing of his patent, in as full an extent and beneficial a manner (subject only to the rights of the commonwealth) as the commonwealth itself held them. At the time of the passing of the act of 1779 Kentucky was a wilderness. It was the haunt of savages and beasts of prey. Actual entry or possession was impracticable; and, if practicable, it could answer no beneficial purpose. It could create no notoriety; it could be evidence to no vicinage of a change of the property. An entry therefore would have been a vain and useless and perilous act; and if there ever was a case in which the maxim would apply that the law does not oblige to vain or impossible things, we think it is such a one as the present. There is no pretense that the legislature have expressly made an entry a prerequisite to the completion of the title. Such a prerequisite, if it exist at all, must arise from mere implication only, and under circumstances which would render it nugatory or absurd. We do not, therefore, feel at liberty to insert in the operation of the grant a limitation which the law has not of itself interposed.

249*] *And this leads us to say, that even if, at common law, an actual pedis positio, followed up by an actual perception of the profits, were necessary to maintain a writ of right, which we do not admit, the doctrine would be inapplicable to the waste and vacant lands of our country. The common law itself in many cases dispenses with such a rule; and the reason of the rule itself ceases when applied to a mere wilderness. The object of the law in requiring actual seizin was to evince notoriety of title to the neighborhood, and the consequent burthens of feudal duties. In the simplicity of ancient times there were no means of ascertaining titles but by the visible seizin; and, indeed, there was no other mode, between subjects, of passing title, but livery of the land itself by the symbolical delivery of turf and twig. The moment that a tenant was thus seized, he had a perfect investiture; and, if ousted, could maintain his action in the realty, although he had not been long enough in possession even to touch the esplees. The very object of the rule, therefore, was notoriety, to prevent frauds upon the lord and upon the other tenants. But in a mere uncultivated country, in wild and impenetrable woods, in the sullen and solitary haunts of beasts of prey, what notoriety could an entry, a gathering of a twig or an acorn convey to civilized man at the distance of hundreds of miles? The reason of the rule could not apply to such a state of things; and cessante ratione, cessat ipsa lex. We are entirely satisfied that a conveyance of wild or vacant lands gives a constructive seizin thereof, in deed, to the grantee, and attaches to him all the legal remedies incident to the estate. A fortiori, this principle applies to a patent; since, at the common law, it imports a livery in law. Upon any other construction, infinite mischiefs would result. Titles by descent and devise, and purchase, where the party from whom the title was derived was never in actual seizin, would, upon principles of the common law, be utterly lost.

As to the sixth question. We are of opinion that in Kentucky a patent is the completion of the legal title of the parties; and it is the legal title only that can come in controversy in a writ of right. The previous stages of title are merely equitable, which a court of chancery may enforce, but a court of common law will not entertain. In this opinion we adopt the principles which the *courts of [250 Kentucky have been understood uniformly to sanction. And this opinion is also an answer to the seventh question.

As to the eighth question. We are of opinion that a better subsisting adverse title in a third person is no defense in a writ of right. That writ brings into controversy only the mere rights of the parties to the suit.

As to the ninth question. We have already expressed our opinion that tenants claiming different parcels of land by distinct titles cannot be joined in a writ of right. If, however, they omit to plead in abatement and join the mise, it is an admission that they are joint tenants of the whole; and the verdict, if for the demandant for any parcel of the land, may be general, that he hath more mere right to hold the same than the tenants; and if of any parcel for the tenants, that they have more mere right to hold the same than the demandant.

As to the tenth question. The general rule is, that if a man enter into lands, having title, his seizin is not bounded by his actual occupancy, but is held to be co-extensive with his title. But if a man enter without title, his seizin is confined to his possession by metes and bounds. In the case put by the court below, the first patentee had the better legal title; and his seizin presently, by virtue of his patent, gave him the best mere right to the whole land, upon the principles which we have already stated. A fortiori, he must have the best mere right to the land not included in the actual close of the second patentee. For, by construction of law, he has the eldest seizin as well as the eldest patent.

As to the eleventh point: We are of opinion that if a man having title to land enter into a part in the name of the whole, he is, upon common law principles, adjudged in seizin of the whole, notwithstanding an adverse seizin thereof. But if the land be in the seizin of several tenants claiming different parcels thereof in severalty, an entry into the parcel held by one tenant will not give seizin of the parcels held by the other tenants; but there must be an entry into each. (Co. Litt., 252, b.) By parity of reason, an entry into a parcel which is vacant will not give seizin of a parcel which is in an adverse seizin. But an entry into the last parcel, in the name of the whole, will enure as an entry *into the vacant parcel. It [251 does not appear, in the question put by the court below, into which parcel the entry is supposed to be made.

Such are the unanimous opinions of this court, which are to be certified to the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

CARTER'S HEIRS
v.
CUTTING AND WIFE.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

An appeal lies to this court from the sentence of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia affirming the sentence of the Orphan's Court of Alexandria county, which dismissed a petition to revoke the probate of a will.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

E. I. Lee, for the Appellants.

Taylor, for the Appellees.

March 11th. STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The appellants, who are heirs at law of Sally Carter, deceased, petitioned the Orphan's Court of the county of Alexandria to revoke and repeal the probate of a will of the said Sally Carter procured by the respondents, upon the ground that the said will was admitted to probate without notice to the appellants, and that the supposed testatrix was an inhabitant of and resident in Virginia at the time of her death, and left no assets, real or personal, or debts in the county of Alexandria. The Orphan's Court, without issuing a summons to the respondents, dismissed the petition, and upon an appeal this dismissal was confirmed by the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

Two objections have been taken to the sustaining of the appeal to this court. 1. That by the act of Congress of 27th February, 1801, (ch. 86, s. 12, vol. 5, p. 272), it is enacted that on 252] appeals from the Orphan's *Court to the Circuit Court, the latter "shall therein have all the powers of the chancellor" of the state of Maryland; and by the laws of Maryland the decree of the chancellor in a like case would be final. 2. That the decree of dismissal is not any final judgment, order, or decree of the Circuit Court wherein the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds one hundred dollars.

The majority of the court cannot yield assent to the validity of either of these objections. As to the first, we are of opinion that the conclusiveness of its sentence forms no part of the essence of the powers of the court. Its powers to act are as ample, independent of their final quality, as with it. Besides, the act of February 27, 1801, (§ 8, vol. 5, p. 270), has expressly allowed an appeal from "all final judgments, orders and decrees of the Circuit Courts" where the matter in dispute exceeds the limited value, and there is nothing in the context to narrow the ordinary import of the language. We cannot admit that construction to be a sound one, which seeks by remote inferences to withdraw a case from the general provisions of a statute, which is clearly within its words and perfectly consistent with its intent. The case of Young v. The Bank of Alexandria (4 Cranch, 384), is, in our judgment, decisive against this objection.

As to the second objection, it is conceded by both parties that the estate devised to the respondent, Sally C. Cutting, is worth several thousand dollars. If, then, the probate of the will had any legal operation and was not merely void, the controversy as to the validity of that probate was a matter in dispute equal to the value of the estate devised away from the heirs. It cannot be doubted that the Orphan's Court had jurisdiction to allow probate of wills made by persons in foreign states; and that probate, once allowed, operated as a sentence affirming the validity of such wills between the parties so far as the lex loci could give them operation. It is understood that a will regularly proved in another state in strict conformity with the laws of that state, acquires, if it possess the other legal requisites, a binding efficacy in Virginia, so that it may be admitted to record there. The estate devised is understood to be situated *in Virginia, and the [253 title of the heirs thereto would consequently be affected by the probate in this district. The probate then not being merely void, but affecting the title to lands exceeding one hundred dollars in value, is a matter in controversy beyond that value within the purview of the act of 1801.

The decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the petition is reversed, and the cause is to be remanded to that court with directions to proceed to a hearing upon the merits.

THE VENUS, RAE, MASTER.

If a citizen of the United States establishes his domicile in a foreign country between which and the United States hostilities afterwards break out, any property shipped by such citizen before knowledge of the war, and captured by an American cruiser after the declaration of war, must be condemned as lawful prize.

Upon a shipment of goods to be sold, on joint account of the consignee and shipper, or of the latter alone at the option of the consignee, the right of property does not vest in the consignee until he has made his election under the option given him.

If two partners own jointly a commercial house in New York, and one of them obtains an American register for a ship by swearing that he, together with his partner, of the city of New York, merchant, are the only owners of the vessel for which the register is obtained, when in fact his partner is domiciled in England, the vessel is liable to forfeiture under the act of Congress of December 31st, 1792. (Laws U. S., vol. 2, p. 133.)

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The following were the facts of the case, as stated by WASHINGTON, J., in delivering the opinion of the court:

This is the case of a vessel which sailed from Great Britain, with a cargo belonging to the respective claimants, as was contended, before the declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain was or could have been known by the shippers. She sailed from Liverpool on the 4th of July, 1812, under a British license, for the port of New York, and was captured on the 6th of August, 1812, by the American privateer Dolphin, and sent into the District of Massachusetts, where the vessel and cargo were libeled in the District Court.

The ship, 100 casks of white lead, 150 crates of earthen ware, 35 cases and 3 casks of copper, 9 pieces of cotton bagging, and a quantity of coal, were claimed by Lenox and Maitland.

198 packages of merchandise and 25 pieces of cotton bagging were claimed by Jonathan Amory, as the joint property of James Lenox, 254] William Maitland and Alexander *McGregor; not distinguishing the proportious of each; but the 25 pieces of cotton bagging were afterwards claimed for McGregor as his sole property, and also 5 trunks of merchandise.

21 trunks of merchandise were claimed by James Magee, of New York, as the joint property of himself aud John S. Jones, residing in Great Britain.

The District Court, on the preparatory evidence, decreed restitution to Magee and Jones, and also to Lenox and Maitland, except as to the 100 casks of white lead; as to which, and as to the claim of McGregor, further proof was ordered.

From this decree, so far as it ordered restitution of the merchandise to Magee and Jones, and to Maitland, and of the ship to Lenox and Maitland, the captors appealed to the Circuit Court, where the decree was affirmed pro forma, and an appeal was taken to this court.

In April, 1813, the cause was heard on further proof in the District Court; and in August the claim of McGregor was rejected, as well as that of Lenox and Maitland to the white lead. But at another day, on a further hearing, the court ordered restitution to McGregor of one-fourth of the property claimed by him, and condemned the other three-fourths as belonging to his partners, being British subjects. Both parties appealed, as did also Leuox and Maitland in relation to the white lead. A pro forma decree of affirmance was made, from which an appeal was takeu to this court.

Maitland, M'Gregor and Jones were native British subjects, who came to the United States many years prior to the present war, and, after the regular period of residence, were admitted to the rights of naturalization. Some time after this, but long prior to the declaration of war, they returned to Great Britain, settled themselves there, and engaged in the trade of that country, where they were found carrying on their commercial business at the time these shipments were made, and at the time of the 255] capture. Maitland is yet *in Great Britain, but has, since he heard of the capture, expressed his anxiety to return to the Uuited States; but has been prevented from doing so by various causes set forth in his affidavit. M'Gregor actually returned to the United States some time in May last; Jones is still in England.

Pitman, for the captors.

In relation to the several claims set up in this case, it will be contended, on the part of the captors, 1st. That they are to be determined, as it respects the capacity to claim, by the national character of the claimants at the time of the capture. If the claimants, at the time of capture, werc British subjects, the property is undoubtedly liable to condemnation.

It is admitted, on all hands, that the claimants, Maitland, M'Grcgor and Jones, had acquired a domicile in Great Britain at the time of the declaration of war; and were actually domiciled in that country at the time of the capture; they must, therefore, be considercd as British subjects in reference to the property claimed by them respectively. Nor will an iutention to return to the United States, if that intention be not manifcsted until after the capture, be of any avail; for it is a principle in prize law that the national character of property, during war, cannot be altered, in transitu, by any act of the party subsequent to the capture.

The following cases are considered as going to establish the foregoing positions: 1 Rob., 97, 115, The Herstelder; 1d., 90, 107, The Donchebaar Africaan; 5 Rob., 257, The Boedes Lust; 3 Rob., 17, 12, The Indian Chief; 1 Rob., 12, 14, Cases cited by Sir W. Scott in The Vigilantia; 2 Dallas, 42, Sloop Chester v. Brig Experiment; 3 Rob., 29, The Indian Chief; Livingston et al. v. The Maryland Ins. Co., decided in the Supreme Court of the United States at the last term. 3 Bos. and Pul., 207, case of The Franklin cited in note; 3 Rob., 37, 38, The Citto; 5 Rob., 60, The Diana; 2 Rob., 265, 323, The Harmony; 5 Rob., 270, The Jonge Classina.

It appears that Maitland has, since he heard of the capture, expressed his anxiety to return to the United *States; and that M'Greg- [256 or did actually return. But we contend, upon the principle above stated, that neither the intention of Maitland, although formerly naturalized in this country, nor the actual return of M'Gregor, iuasmuch as they did not take placc till after the capture, can avail for the purposes of their respective claims.

And even if it should be proved that Maitland's intention to return existed previous to the capture, it would not avail him if nothing more than intention could be proved. The case of the President (5 Rob., 277), is in point. It is thcre decided that an intentiou to return is of no avail, unless that intention be evidenced by some overt act. Here no such overt act, on the part of Maitland, is proved. The following cases go to establish the same point: 3 Rob., 37, 38, The Citto; Curtisos' case, cited in 5 Rob., 65; The Diana, and in 3 Rob., 17, 12, The Indian Chief. As to M'Gregor, vid. 3 Rob., 264, 322, The Harmony.

M'Gregor's return to America, after capture of the vessel, will uot avail him unless hc can prove,

1st. That he had, previous to thc capture, set himself in motion to return.

2d. That he had done so with a bona fide intention of remaining in America.

3d. That he had no intentiou of returning to England.

(Vid. the case of the Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 17. 12.)

But the national character of these partics, Maitland, M'Gregor and Jones, does not depeud upon domicile. They wcre originally native subjccts of Great Britain; and, after being naturalized in this country, they returned to England, and resumed their native allegiance, in violation of their oath of naturalization. By this conduct wc contend that they lost the character of American citizens, and could not, flagrante bello, resume it for the mere purpose of protecting their property. In a court of the law of nations, as well as by the navigation laws of the United States, they cannot but be cousidered *as British subjects. Iu the [257 case of La Virginie (5 Rob., 98), Sir W. Scott said: "It is always to be remembered that the "native character easily reverts, and that it re"quires fewer circumstances to constitute domi-

"cile in the case of a native subject, than to "impress the national character on one who is "originally of another country."

It is not necessary to contend against the doctrine of expatriation. We do not deny the right. We contend only that in order to render his naturalization valid for the purposes in question, a man must expatriate himself bona fide—must remove from his original country and not return to it, animo manendi. In support of this doctrine, vid., the act of Congress of March 27, 1804; laws of U. S., vol. 7, p. 146; also act of 31st December, 1792, § 2; Laws U. S., vol. 2, p. 132; 3 Dallas, 153, Talbot v. Janson.

The British doctrine on this subject is well known. "Once a British subject, always a British subject," is an established rule in English law. Great Britain respects the naturalization laws of the United States only for commercial purposes. If one of her subjects be naturalized in this country, and afterwards return to a British territory, she considers him as still, to all intents and purposes, a British subject. She does not even require him to abjure his adopted allegiance.

It is to be presumed that Maitland, M'Gregor and Jones knew the laws of their own country; yet, with this knowledge they returned to England; and that, as it appears from their subsequent conduct, not for a temporary purpose merely, but animo manendi. They have established there a house of trade. They have placed themselves and their property under the protection of Great Britain, and cannot now, with any show of reason, claim protection from the United States, although the United States may still claim something from them. (2 Cranch, 120, Murray v. Schooner Charming Betsy.)

It is evident, from all the circumstances of the present case, that Maitland did not intend to return to the United States until he heard of 258] the capture of the vessel; *on the contrary, it appears that, with a full knowledge of the war, he made his election to remain in England.

When M'Gregor left England for the United States, he embarked as a British subject. His passport was from the privy council, and signed by Lord Sidmouth; whereas, American citizens obtained their passports from the alien office. He is still a partner in a house of trade in England—he is engaged in a British trade. It remains for these parties to explain their conduct. We have stated the facts, and the burden of proof now lies on the claimants. Such would be the rule even if they were neutrals. (3 Rob., 37, 38, The Citto; 4 Rob., 191, 232, The Dree Gebroeders; 1 Rob., 88, 104, The Bernon; 1 Rob., 12, 15, The Vigilantia; 3 Rob., 40, 41, The Portland; 5 Rob., 91, The Ocean; 2 Rob., 264, 322, The Harmony.)

In attempting to establish the national character of these claimants as American citizens, it was said in the court below that they held landed property in this country. This argument is overthrown by the decision in the case of the Dree Gebroeders cited above. (4 Rob., 194, 235.)

2. It appears that M'Gregor has fraudulently attempted to cover the whole property in question; his claim, therefore, being false in part, he cannot recover even his own share, although we should admit him to be an American citizen. The whole, therefore, is justly liable to condemnation. (2 Rob., 212, 257, The Susa; 1 Rob., 210, 250, The Odin; 2 Rob., 281, 343, The Rosalie and Betty; 3 Rob., 92, 109, The Graaf Bernstorf; 4 Rob., 65, 74, The Jonge Pieter.)

3. As to the claim of Lenox and Maitland to the ship, we contend, 1st. That under the act of Congress of March 27, 1804, (Laws U. S., vol. 7, p. 146), she cannot be considered as an American vessel. By that act it is declared "that no ship or vessel shall be entitled to be registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, or, if registered, to the benefits thereof, if owned in whole or in part by any person naturalized in the United States, and residing for more than one year in *the country [259 from which he originated, &c. But Maitland had been residing in England more than a year, and consequently was not entitled to an American register. 2d. That Lenox being found in violation of the law, as it respected the ship's register, he is not reetus in curia for the purpose of claiming the ship. (Vid. the cases cited in the Rapid, on this point, viz., 2 Rob., 72, 77, The Walsingham Packet; 5 Rob., 28, 32, The Cornelis and Maria; 6 Rob., 348, The Recovery.) 3d. That Lenox and Maitland having attempted to conceal enemies property (the 100 casks of white lead), and to withdraw the same from the belligerent rights of the United States by a fraudulent shipment and claim, their claims to the property captured therewith must be rejected, and the penalty of confiscation attaches to the same. This principle is intended to be applied to the claim of Maitland as well to the cargo as to the ship.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the lead belonged to some person or persons other than the claimants. The following facts are considered as conclusive on this point.

1. The original bill of parcels enclosed in a letter dated 3d July, 1812, from Wm. Maitland & Co. to Lenox and Maitland, is headed thus: "Thomas Holloway bought of Thomas Walker, Malby & Co., lead merchants," and is dated at Liverpool, June 2d, 1812.

2. In the bill of lading of the goods claimed as the property of Lenox and Maitland, in which the white lead is included, the freight and primage is cast upon the lead in the margin of the bill of lading, and not upon the crates, copper, bagging or coal.

3. To a letter from Maitland to Lenox of 22d August, 1812, found on board the Lady Gallatin, is annexed a list of goods shipped by Wm. Maitland & Co., by the Venus, on account of and consigned to Messrs. J. Lenox and Wm. Maitland. In this list all the goods claimed by Lenox and Maitland, and by Lenox, Maitland and M'Gregor, are enumerated, except the white lead.

4. Upon the order for further proof in the District *Court, no further proof was [260 offered respecting the lead. Maitland, in his affidavit made January 7th, 1813, in Liverpool, swears that the copper, crates, coals and bagging were purchased and shipped on board the Venus, on the sole account and risk of himself and Lenox; he also swears as to their joint property with M'Gregor, but says not a word about the lead.

From these circumstances we must conclude that the white lead was the property of Thomas Holloway, an acknowledged British subject; that it is therefore liable to condemnation, and subjects the property captured with it to the same fate.

4. In respect to the claim of Magee and Jones, we contend that at the time of capture the property belonged solely to Jones, a British merchant and subject, and is therefore to be condemned as enemy property.

In the bill of lading of these goods they are expressed to be shipped by M'Gregor & Co. unto and on account of James Magec & Co., of New York. The invoice is signed by Jones, at Manchester, and describes them as goods to be shipped on board the Venus, and to be consigned to James Magee & Co., of New York; but does not specify on whose account and risk. It is therefore to be considered as at the risk of Jones. (Vid., on this point, the case of The Marianna, 6 Rob., 27.)

In a letter from John S. Jones to James Magee & Co., dated at Manchester, 1st July, 1812, he says: "This serves to hand you invoice of 21 trunks prints per Venus, amount £1,323. 13*s.* 0d. subject to the same terms as the goods per Aristomenes; that is, to be sold on joint account or on mine at your option." Now, to effect a change of property, it is essential that there be a contract of sale agreed to by both parties. Here appears to have been no such contract. The property, therefore, at the time of capture, was exclusively in Jones.

If Jones had a right to stop these goods in transitu, so had the United States, who, by the laws of war, succeeded to his rights. 6 Rob., 127, The Constantia; The Copenhagen (1 Rob., 245, 291), is an analogous case.

261*] Stockton*, contra, for M'Gregor, contended,

1st. That M'Gregor, to the exclusion of his partners, Lenox and Maitland, was owner of one-half of 198 packages of Manchester goods, and one-half of 25 pieces of cotton bagging, and to the whole of five trunks of goods.

2d. That these good were not the goods of an enemy, and ought to be restored to M'Gregor as an American citizen.

In support of the first point he relied on the ship's papers, on certain letters of Maitland & Co., and of M'Gregor himself, on the affidavits of M'Gregor in the court below, &c. He contended that the testimony on this point, introduced since the evidence in præparatorio, was incompetent; but if competent, not important. The cause was heard in September, 1812, and further proof allowed for the claimants; but no such order on the part of the captors, nor any order to proceed by plea and proof. The cause stood, on their side, on the proof taken in præparatorio. The evidence introduced by them is upon simple affidavit. (1 Rob., 263, 313, The Adriana; Letter from Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl to Mr. Jay, 1 Rob., Amer. ed. p. 8.)

Second point. As to the national character of M'Gregor. He came to the United States a minor; was an established merchant in New York before 1795; he was then naturalized; he married in New York, and purchased a house there before his departure for England, which he still retains. He has also purchased large tracts of land in the states of New York and New Jersey, which he yet owns. He resided about twelve years in New York. His return to England was produced by temporary causes. In 1798 he returned thither on account of the sickness of his wife, who died in Scotland. His second return was for his own health. In 1805 he commenced business in Liverpool as an American merchant. His employment was that of an American merchant shipping goods from England, and receiving American produce to sell there on commission. His residence in England was in time of peace; it was lawful, and could in no manner impair his rights as a citizen *of the United States. He had no [262 intention to abandon his American rights, or to remain permanently in England; but intended to return to the United States whenever his duty should require him to return. Such a residence, in time of peace, could not stamp a hostile character upon him; and, at the breaking out of war, he was entitled to a reasonable time to depart from the British dominions, before he could forfeit his American character and become identified with the enemy. He did depart therefrom, and returned to the United States with his family within a year after the declaration of war. His having formed a connection in trade with British partners was a lawful act, which did not derogate from his American character, but extended and facilitated his business as an American merchant.

Congress did not mean to authorize the capture of property belonging to mere inhabitants of the hostile country. When the bill to authorize the President to issue letters of marque was brought into the senate of the United States, in June, 1812, it authorized him to issue them against all persons inhabiting in Great Britain or its territories or possessions; but was amended in the senate so as to authorize him to issue them only against the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the subjects thereof. (See the secret journal of the senate for June, 1812.)

Many cases have been cited by the counsel for the captors in his endeavor to prove this a case for condemnation. The answer to most of them is, that the controversy in those cases was between neutrals and belligerents; not between Great Britain and her subjects. The two cases are entirely different in principle. The connection between a citizen and his government depends on the municipal law of the land. The rights of a neutral depend upon the law of nations.

With regard to the doctrine of naturalization, it is well known that, by the law of England, a person naturalized by act of parliament is as much a subject, to all intents and purposes, as a native. (Co. Lit., 129, a; Bl. Com., B. 1, c. 10, p. 374.) M'Gregor, we have seen, was naturalized in the United States. But it is said that he has returned to his former allegiance, and thereby *lost his American char- [263 acter. This we deny. He returned to England in time of peace, by which we contend he neither forfeited nor abandoned his character as an American citizen. Our act of naturalization contains nothing to authorize the opinion that he did. Nor could he throw off his adopted allegiance if he would. If found in arms against us he would be punished as a traitor.

The act of March, 1804, which has been cited by the captors, merely declares that a naturalized citizen shall lose one particular privilege of his citizenship by residing for more than a year in the country from which he originated; from which the implication is clear, that he shall retain all his other privileges.

In the case of the Charming Betsy (2 Cranch, 64), and in the case of M'Ilvaine v. Coxe's lessee (decided in 4 Cranch, 211), the decision of this court was, that residence in a foreign country does not deprive an American citizen of his rights as such. It has been decided, also, that by such residence in time of peace, the national character is not changed upon the sudden breaking out of a war. Residence in time of peace is lawful; and if the person so residing return to his own country in a reasonable time after the breaking out of the war, he does not lose his original national character. (1 Bos. and Pul., 442, Marryat v. Wilson; Vattel, B. 1, c. 19, § 218, p. 169.) Sir W. Scott has never said that such a residence would, on the sudden breaking out of a war, give a hostile character to the resident; he has never gone so far as to condemn property situated like that now in question. (5 Rob., 90; The Oecan.)

Vattel (B. 3, c. 4, § 63, p. 477) says, that the sovereign declaring war is to allow those subjects of the enemy who are within his dominions at the time of the declaration a reasonable time for withdrawing with their effects; and certainly a nation ought not to grant less indulgence to its own citizens than the enemy allows them. I trust this court is not yet prepared to adopt, even with respect to neutrals, much less with regard to American citizens, the rigid rules of the British Court of Admiralty—a mere political court—a prerogative court regulated by the 264] King's orders in council, *designed to give Great Britain the sovereignity of the ocean, to subject the whole commerce of the world to her grasp, and to make the law of nations just what her policy would wish it to be.

It is doubtful whether the court ought to condemn, under the circumstances of the present case, although it should be proved that the property in question was enemy property.

The shipment, in the present case, was made on the faith of the representations of the American charge d'affaires, Mr. Russel; who had given it as his opinion that property shipped after the repeal of the British orders in council, and before knowledge of the war, would be admitted into the United States. Under these circumstances the conduct of the owners of this property was perfectly justifiable. It has been decided in a British court that property which comes into the possession of a nation under the public faith is not liable to forfeiture, and Congress has virtually acknowledged the same principle by passing the act of 27th February, 1813, remitting the forfeitures which had accrued under the non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809. (Laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 388.) Vid. Mr. Russel's statement in the report of the committee of Congress; journal of H. of Rep., and the case of the Althea, cartel, which was captured at Halifax as American property, and discharged by Judge Croke, because it came into the possession of the British under the public faith.

Pitman, as to the objection to the invocation of papers from other courts, cited the following authorities: 14th Interrogate, 1 Rob., Amer. ed., 323; 6 Rob., 351, The Romeo; 4 Rob., 170, 205, The Convenientia; 1 Rob., 27, 31, The Magnus; 2 Rob., 2. 3, The Eenrom; Id. 211, 254, The Susa; Id. 281, 343, The Rosalie and Betty. He observed that there was an order, in the Circuit Court, for further proof on the part of the captors, saving the question whether it were a case for further proof.

Harper, for Lenox & Maitland and Jones & Magee.

Lenox & Maitland claim,

*1st. The ship Venus. [265

2d. As their joint property, the white lead, crates, copper, cotton bagging and coal.

3d. One moiety of 198 packages of merchandise and cotton bagging, as the joint property of Lenox & Maitland and Alexander M'Gregor, and shipped by them.

Magee and Jones claim 21 trunks of prints, part of the cargo of the Venus, as their joint property.

Lenox and Maitland are natives of Scotland. They removed many years since to New York, where the former was naturalized on the 10th of November, 1794, and the latter on the 8th of July, 1804. They entered into partnership in trade in 1797, and established their house in New York, in which they were alone interested, under the name and firm of J. Lenox & W. Maitland; which has continued to the present time. For fourteen years they both resided, without interruption, in the city of New York, carrying on the business of their American house, as American citizens; and, as such, they hold valuable real estate in the city and in the state of New York, and also hold American registered ships. Lenox still resides in New York; but Maitland, in July, 1810, to promote the interest of their commercial establishment in New York, by attending the sales of the shipments to Europe and the returns to America, went to Liverpool, in England, where, in 1811, he took a house and counting-room and transacted business for the said concern, under the name and firm of W. Maitland & Co., consisting only of said Lenox and Maitland. He has long since given up his counting-room and attempted to dispose of his house; and is still in England, detained there by sickness. In July, 1812, and long before and at the time of the capture of the Venus by the Dolphin, Lenox & Maitland were the sole owners of the said ship under an American register. The Venus sailed from Liverpool for New York, on the 4th of July, 1812, with a cargo of British produce and manufactures, the proceeds of the funds of Lenox & Maitland, with instructions to wait off the Hook, to know if the goods could be landed. Proceeding *with [266 her cargo on this voyage, she was captured and libeled as has been before stated.

James Magee was naturalized 9th August, 1803, and has ever since resided and been established in New York.

John S. Jones was naturalized 10th December, 1795, and resided in New York thirteen years. In 1810, he went to Manchester, England, and arrangements were made for shipping goods to Magee, the partner in New York.

It has been contended, on the part of the captors, with regard to the ship, that, by the laws of the United States, she is not to be deemed an American ship, nor entitled to the benefits of an American register, on account of the residence of Maitland in Liverpool for more than a year.

Admitting, for the sake of argument, that this position is correct, still we contend that the ship is not forfeited. She has merely incurred the disability attached to a foreign ship. Her owners are still American citizens, but have lost the privilege of availing themselves of the register. It is contended, however, that this very disability which attaches to the ship, renders her belligerent property. This is truly a novel doctrine. There is no law by which it can be supported.

As to the right of Lenox to his share of the ship, there can be no reasonable doubt. He is certainly an American citizen and has done nothing to forfeit that character. He has been naturalized in this country, and has continued to reside here ever since. It is said, however, that he has made a false claim to the white lead. This point will be considered in the course of the argument.

Maitland, it is true, has been residing in England for a considerable time past; and it is upon this ground that the ship and cargo are claimed by the captors. They contend that his residence in England (although an American citizen) clothes him with a hostile character.

267*] *To this it may be answered, that the residence which imparts a hostile character must be residence connected with some act of commerce blended with the commercial transactions of the enemy. Mere residence does not give a hostile character, so long as the resident refrains from all voluntary acts tending to the aid and comfort of the enemy. If he engages in the enemy's commerce, he must, to be sure, be considered as an enemy; but even then, only to the extent of the commercial property engaged in the hostile trade, which may chance to be captured. A man in an enemy's country may send home books or furniture purchased before the war for his own use, and they will not be hostile property. There must be a trading with the enemy to constitute an offense. Trading is essential; time is not. A mere continuation in an enemy's country after the commencement of hostilities, without any act of trade, has never been decided to constitute a man an enemy. Sir W. Scott himself allows a person found in the enemy's country, a reasonable time to withdraw his effects, and even to trade with the enemy so far as it may be necessary for the removal of his property. (3 Rob., 17, 12, The Indian Chief; 4 Rob., 161, 195, Madonna delle Gracie; 1 Rob., 165, 196, The Hoop.)

But it is said, that though an illegal act should be proved to have been committed by Maitland, yet that Lenox has been guilty of making a false claim to part of the cargo, which act of Lenox has criminally affected the property of Maitland.

We answer, that the doctrine on the subject of covering enemy property applies only to neutrals; but Lenox was a citizen of the United States. Besides, it does not by any means appear, that, in making this claim, Lenox was influenced by a fraudulent motive. His conduct was, in all probability, owing to mistake. He had not seen the letters and papers proving the property claimed by him to belong to the enemy, and therefore cannot be supposed to have known that fact.

It is further urged by the captors, that a letter by the Lady Gallatin, of 22d August, 1812, shows that a purchase of 100 bags of cotton was made by Maitland, after knowledge of the war.

*To the admissibility of the invoked [268 papers, among which this letter is one, we have already objected, and must still insist upon the objection. Setting aside those papers, it does not appear that Maitland did purchase the cotton after knowledge of the war, and the presumption ought to be in his favor. But suppose this single purchase was made one day after war was known to exist (which is all the captors contended for), is this sufficient to fix a hostile character, especially under circumstances like those attending this transaction, when it was universally supposed that the repeal of the orders in council would have put an end to the war?

With regard to Jones, it has only been proved that he was residing in England a few months after the commencement of hostilities; but there is no evidence that he has not returned; nor is there any evidence of his having traded with the enemy. The burden of proof lies on the captors.

Dexter, in reply.

In cases like that now before the court, the advantage in obtaining evidence is clearly on the side of the claimants. They have in their power the knowledge of all the facts relative to the case. The evidence in præparatorio consists of the documents on board the ship, and the testimony of the crew. They may make out their own case. If the evidence in their favor be deficient, they may have an order for further proof, which does not give the captors any opportunity of introducing further evidence on their part. Under circumstances so manifestly advantageous, if the claimants do not fully prove their case, the presumption must be against them. Whether the claimants in the present case have satisfactorily done so, it is for the court to decide.

With regard to the question of domicile. Sir W. Scott has decided that the animus manendi is to be presumed under circumstances perfectly analogous to those of the present case. What are the facts with regard to the several parties whose claims are now disputed? M'Gregor, it appears, is a native of Scotland: he became a citizen of the United States by naturalization, in 1795, and resided at New York until 1802, except a temporary *visit to [269 his native country, for the health of his wife. In 1802 he left New York for his own health, and in 1804 established himself in a house of trade in Liverpool, England, in connection with James Dennistown, a British subject. Two other partners were afterwards admitted, both British subjects. M'Gregor was the only one of the partners who resided in Liverpool, and was the acting partner of the concern. He married a second wife in Great Britain, and had several children there, during his residence in Liverpool.

These facts are abundantly sufficient to establish his domicile.

The question, then, remains: did he take timely and sufficient steps, after knowledge of the war, to divest himself of his British character, and return to the United States? This does not appear. On the contrary, it appears from papers invoked and introduced into this cause, and it is not contradicted, that he continued his connection with his British partners ten months after the declaration of war, and, as acting partner of the house, made a shipment to Halifax. He has not, in any of his affidavits, declared that he did not continue his trade. The testimony on his part does not deny all secret trusts. He comes into court well informed of the suit, yet without the books, articles of partnership, original bills of parcels, and the other papers connected with the transactious under consideration.

It has been urged in his defense, that being a commission merchant, having the property of others in his hands, and being the only acting partner of the firm, he was justified in remaining in England till he could wind up his business. But this is no sufficient justification. The contracts of a citizen residing abroad, must be consistent with the interests of his country. If the good of his country requires his return, as in the event of war, it is his duty to leave his business in other hands. M'Gregor might have left his affairs to the care of his partners.

Most of the facts with regard to Maitland have been already stated. It may be added, however, that he continued to reside in England 270] and was transacting business *there as late as April, 1813; whereas, the war was known on the 24th or 26th of July, 1812. In his letter of the 22d of August, 1812, in which he informs his partner of a purchase of cotton wool he had just made, he says nothing of any intention of returning to the United States.

His continuance in England is defended on nearly the same grounds as that of M'Gregor; viz., his extensive mercantile concerns. Sickness was not alleged by him as an excuse, till 13th April, 1813.

As to the goods shipped by Jones, it has already been observed that, in his letter to Magee of 1st of July, 1812, he gives him his option either to be interested in them or not. Of course, at the time of the shipment, they were the sole property of Jones; and before the letter was received by Magee—before there was a possibility of his making an election—the goods were captured; but it is an acknowledged rule of prize law, that the character of goods cannot change in transitu; at the time of capture, therefore, they were the sole property of Jones, and must, we contend, be condemned in toto.

Besides the particular circumstances which have been urged in justification of the individuals concerned in this cause, a general defense has been set up, viz.: That though the property in question should be determined to be British, yet it came here under the faith of the nation; and is therefore entitled to protection. Vattel, it is said, lays down this doctrine. This is not denied. But did the property in controversy come into the country under the national faith? It was not here at the breaking out of hostilities. It was not brought into the country until after the declaration of war; and then it was brought in as a prize of war. Besides, if it was considered as protected on this principle, why was the attempt made to cover it under the name of M'Gregor? This has a suspicious appearance, and shows clearly that the claimants themselves placed little reliance on the circumstance which is now urged in their defense.

As to the objection to the admission of the invoked papers, it need only be observed that the counsel for the *claimants is under a [271 mistake on the subject. There was an order for further proof on the part of the captors; and under that order these papers were invoked.

The great question of law on the subject of domicile yet remains to be examined.

Three classes of residents are recognized by the law of nations.

1st. Mere residents.

2d. Domiciled residents.

3d. Natural born subjects.

Before entering upon the discussion of the main question, I would remark, with regard to some observations which have fallen from the counsel for the claimants respecting the severity of the rules adopted by the British Court of Admirality, that these rules have been applied by Sir W. Scott with equal rigor to British subjects as to neutrals; which is a sufficient answer to the allegation that they have been introduced merely to subserve the grasping policy of the British nation, and destroy all neutral commerce.

With regard, then, to the first class of residents. It is admitted that mere residence in a foreign country, for a particular temporary purpose, without engaging in the commerce of the country, is not sufficient to change the national character.

2d. Residence in a foreign country connected with the carrying on a general trade and mixing in the commercial affairs of the nation, constitutes domicile; thereby making a man, sub modo, a subject of that foreign country; and in case of war breaking out between his original and adopted country, if he continues, notwithstanding, to reside and trade in the latter, he is to be considered by his original country, as invested with a hostile character to all intents and purposes. He ought not, it will be admitted, to be considered in this light immediately on the declaration of war; he ought, perhaps to be allowed a reasonable time to make his election whether to remain *where he is or re- [272 turn to his own country. Respectable authorities, however, have said that, if required, he is bound to return. Sir W. Scott says he is bound immediately to put himself in motion to return.

3d. As to mere native subjects it is needless to make any remarks. The persons whose national character is now in question are natural born subjects of Great Britain, naturalized in the United States, and who afterwards returned to the country of their nativity. These persons, we contend, are, even without the intervention of a war, as much British subjects as if they had never been naturalized in another country. The British government had a right to prevent their return to the United States. In saying this, we would not be understood as admitting the legality of impressment; the cases are materially different.

The naturalization law of the United States requires permanent residence; and no longer than that residence continues can a man claim the privileges of naturalization. Before he can be admitted to those privileges, he must abjure all allegiance to the state of which he was before a citizen. By so doing, he binds himself not to return to that state. By returning he violates his oath; and can thereafter claim no protection from the country which he has thus abandoned. Abjuration does not absolve him from his former allegiance; he may incur new duties, but he cannot swear away his old obligations. It is for this court to explain the true meaning of the law of naturalization. It may, however, be observed, that neither the constitution nor the laws of the United States consider a naturalized citizen in the same light as a native. The laws of Great Britain, also, and indeed the laws of every country, make a distinction between the two. A native is considered as a citizen wherever he goes; but a person naturalized is no longer looked upon as a citizen than while he continues in his adopted country. No nation confers the privilege of naturalization without an equivalent. No nation extends its protection to naturalized subjects, if they return to their former country. And shall we be an exception? Shall we be the first to extend to naturalized foreigners this Quixotic protection?

273*] *The expression "ad fidem utriusque regis," from Calvin's case, has been mistranslated, "the faith of both kings." Had that been the meaning of the phrase it would have been utrumque regum, in the plural. The meaning is, that a man may be the subject of either power according to his residence. Were the doctrine, that he may be the subject of both, correct, he would have it in his power to enjoy the privileges of both governments, without being subject to the duties of either.

With regard to the false claim of Lenox. It is a rule of prize law, that a man who makes a false claim to protect enemy property, forfeits any property of his own that may be captured with it. This Lenox appears to have done with respect to the white lead. If he has, not only his own property is forfeited, but that of Maitland, his partner, must share the same fate. What has been said by the counsel for the claimants to exculpate Lenox is mere conjecture.

As to the ship. It is clear that the register was improperly obtained—not to say fraudulently. Maitland, by residing in England, was not entitled to an American register. Lenox, by concealing, when on oath, the fact of Maitland's residence in England, becomes particeps criminis, and if he mixes his interest with that of his partner, the same decree must be rendered as to the property of both.

Stockton, with regard to the withholding of papers with which M'Gregor was taxed by the counsel on the opposite side, stated that the decree of the court below was only rendered in October last, when M'Gregor had the first intimation that the papers were required; since which, there had not been time to obtain them.

Saturday, March 12th. Absent—LIVINGSTON, J.

WASHINGTON, J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the majority of the court as follows:

The claims of Maitland, M'Gregor & Jones are resisted, in toto, upon an objection to the national character of the claimants. The general question affecting *these parties [274 will, for the present, be postponed in order to dispose of particular objections which are made to all the claims, either in whole or in part, and which will depend on the particular circumstances applying to those cases.

1. The first claim that will be considered will be that of Lenox & Maitland to the 100 casks of white lead, which, it is contended, is the property of Thos. Holloway, an acknowledged British subject, but shipped in June, 1812, by Wm. Maitland & Co. (a house established in Liverpool, and composed of Wm. Maitland and James Lenox) to Lenox & Maitland, a house established at New York, and composed of the same parties. To establish the fact of property in Thos. Holloway, the captor relies upon the following evidence: The original bill of parcels, inclosed in a letter under date of the 3d of July, 1812, from Wm. Maitland & Co. to Lenox & Maitland, which is headed thus: "Thos. Holloway bought of Thomas Walker & Co., lead merchants," dated June 2d, 1812. In corroboration of this prima facie evidence of property in Holloway, the freight and primage of this lead is cast in the margin of the bill of lading, but not so upon the acknowledged property of Lenox and Maitland, the owners of the ship, and included in the same bill of lading; from which circumstance it is argued that this article did not belong to Lenox and Maitland; since, if it did, no freight could have been charged on it, any more than upon the other parts of the cargo claimed by them. In addition to this, in a list of goods shipped by Wm. Maitland & Co., by this vessel, on account of and consigned to Lenox & Maitland, and inclosed in a letter of the 22d August, 1812, from the former to the latter, by the Lady Gallatin, all the goods claimed by that house separately, and also by them and M'Gregor jointly, are enumerated, except this parcel of white lead. This evidence is certainly very strong to fix a hostile character on this property; and is rendered conclusive by the omission of Maitland, in his affidavit made under the order for further proof, to say anything in relation to the white lead, although he is very particular as to all the other property claimed by Lenox & Maitland, and by that house jointly with M'Gregor. This court is *therefore of opinion that the [275 court below did right in rejecting this claim.

2. The next claim to be considered is that of Magee & Jones to a part of the cargo on board of this vessel. Magee is a citizen of the United States, settled in New York, and connected with Jones in a house of trade. It is urged by the captors that the whole of this property ought to have been condemned as the sole property of Jones. The bill of lading of these goods expresses them to be shipped by M'Gregor & Co., unto and on account of James Magee & Co., of New York. The invoice is signed by Jones, at Manchester, in England, and describes them as goods to be shipped on board the Venus, and to be consigned to James Magee & Co., of New York; but it does not specify on whose account and risk. In a letter from Jones to Magee, dated the 1st of July, 1812, covering an invoice of these goods, he says "they are to be sold on joint account or on mine at your option." The whole question as to the exclusive property of Jones in these goods, is rested, by the captors, upon the above expressions giving an option to Magee to be jointly concerned or not in the shipment. The question of law is, in whom the right of property was at the time of capture. To effect a change of property as between seller and buyer, it is essential that there should be a contract of sale agreed to by both parties; and if the thing, agreed to be sold, is to be sent by the vendor to the vendee, it is necessary to the perfection of the contract that it should be delivered to the purchaser or to his agent, which the master, to many purposes, is considered to be. The only evidence of a contract, such as is now set up, appears in the affidavit of Magee; who states that, in 1810, he was in England, and agreed with Jones that the latter should ship goods on joint account, when the intercourse between the two countries should be opened; and that, in consequence of this agreement the present shipment was made. Now, admit that such an agreement was made, yet the delivery of the goods to the master of the vessel was not for the use of Magee & Jones, any more than it was for the use of the shipper solely; and, consequently, it amounted to nothing so as to divest the property out of the shipper, until Magee should elect to take them [*276] on joint account, or *to act as the agent of Jones. Until this election was made, the goods were at the risk of the shipper, which is conclusive as to the right of property.

3. The next claim is that of Lenox & Maitland to the ship. The facts in relation to this subject are, that James Lenox, as joint owner with W. Maitland of this ship, obtained, in November, 1811, a register for her, which was granted upon his oath that he, together with W. Maitland, of the city of New York, merchant, were the only owners. At this time Maitland was domiciled in Great Britain; and it is contended that the statement that Maitland was of New York was untrue, and subjected the vessel to forfeiture, under the act of Congress of the 31st of December, 1792; and that although no claim is interposed for the United States, still the forfeiture produced by the misconduct of Lenox is sufficient to turn him out of court, whatever disposition may ultimately be made of the property. The rule of the prize court is correctly stated in this argument; and the only question is, whether a forfeiture did accrue to the United States. The act of Congress directs that the owner who takes the oath, in case there are more than one owner, shall, in his oath, specify the names and places of abode of such owners, and that they are citizens of the United States, if such be the fact; and if one or more of them reside abroad, as a partner or partners in a copartnership consisting of citizens, and carrying on trade with the United States, that such is the case. The law then proceeds to declare, that if any of the matters of fact in the said oath alleged, within the knowledge of the party swearing, shall not be true, the ship shall be forfeited to the United States. It cannot be denied that, at the time this oath was taken, W. Maitland was a resident merchant of Great Britain, carrying on trade with the United States; a fact totally inconsistent with that alleged in the oath, that he was of the city of New York. It is probable, and the court is willing to believe, that this statement was innocently made, under a misconception of the real character which the foreign domicile of Maitland had impressed upon him. But, still the law required explicitness on this point, and marked the distinction between a person residing abroad and one residing within the United States. It must be admitted, in point of law, *that the fact sworn to [*277 by Lenox was not true; and the consequence is a forfeiture of the ship to the United States. The claim, therefore, of Lenox & Maitland to this vessel must be rejected. What order shall be made as to the ultimate disposition of the property, must depend upon the opinion which this court may give in some other cases touching this subject.

The great question involved in this, and many other of the prize cases which have been argued, is, whether the property of these claimants who were settled in Great Britain, and engaged in the commerce of that country, shipped before they had a knowledge of the war, but which was captured, after the declaration of war, by an American cruiser, ought to be condemned as lawful prize. It is contended by the captors that as these claimants had gained a domicile in Great Britain, and continued to enjoy it up to the time when war was declared, and when these captures were made, they must be considered as British subjects, in reference to this property, and, consequently, that it may legally be seized as prize of war, in like manner as if it had belonged to real British subjects. But if not so, it is then insisted that these claimants having, after their naturalization in the United States, returned to Great Britain, the country of their birth, and there resettled themselves, they became redintegrated British subjects, and ought to be considered by this court in the same light as if they had never emigrated. On the other side it is argued, that American citizens settled in the country of the enemy, as these persons were, at the time war was declared, were entitled to a reasonable time to elect, after they knew of the war, to remain there or to return to the United States; and that, until such election was, bona fide, made, the courts of this country are bound to consider them as American citizens, and their property shipped before they had an oportunity to make this election, as being protected against American capture.

There being no dispute as to the facts upon which the domicile of these claimants is asserted, the questions of law alone remain to be considered. They are two. First, By what means and to what extent a national character may be impressed upon a person, different from *that which permanent allegiance gives [*278 him? and secondly, What are the legal consequences to which this acquired character may expose him, in the event of a war taking place between the country of his residence and that of his birth, or in which he had been naturalized?

1. The writers upon the law of nations distinguish between a temporary residence in a foreign country, for a special purpose, and a residence accompanied with an intention to make it a permanent place of abode. The latter is styled by Vattel, domicile, which he defines to be, "a habitation fixed in any place, with an intention of always staying there." Such a person, says this author, becomes a member of the new society, at least as a permanent inhabitant, and is a kind of citizen of an inferior order from the native citizens; but is, nevertheless, united and subject to the society, without participating in all its advantages. This right of domicile, he continues, is not established, unless the person makes sufficiently known his intention of fixing there, either tacitly, or by an express declaration. (Vatt., p. 92, 93.) Grotius nowhere uses the word domicile, but he also distinguishes between those who stay in a foreign country by the necessity of their affairs, or from any other temporary cause, and those who reside there from a permanent cause. The former he denominates strangers, and the latter, subjects; and it will presently be seen, by a reference to some author, what different consequences these two characters draw after them.

The doctrine of the prize courts, as well as of the courts of common law, in England, which, it was hinted, if not asserted, in argument, had no authority of universal law to stand upon, is the same with what is stated by the above writers; except that it is less general, and confines the consequences resulting from this acquired character to the property of those persons engaged in the commerce of the country in which they reside.

It is decided by those courts, that whilst an Englishman, or a neutral, resides in a hostile country, he is a subject of that country, and 279] is to be considered (even *by his own or native country, in the former case) as having a hostile character impressed upon him.

In deciding whether a person has obtained the right of an acquired domicile, it is not to be expected that much, if any, assistance should be derived from mere elementary writers on the law of nations. They can only lay down the general principles of law; and it becomes the duty of courts to establish rules for the proper application of those principles. The question, whether the person to be affected by the right of domicile had sufficiently made known his intention of fixing himself permanently in the foreign country, must depend upon all the circumstances of the case. If he had made no express declaration on the subject, and his secret intention is to be discovered, his acts must be attended to, as affording the most satisfactory evidence of his intention. On this ground it is that the courts of England have decided that a person who removes to a foreign country, settles himself there, and engages in the trade of the country, furnishes, by these acts, such evidence of an intention permanently to reside there as to stamp him with the national character of the state where he resides. In questions on this subject, the chief point to be considered is the animus manendi; and courts are to devise such reasonable rules of evidence as may establish the fact of intention. If it sufficiently appear that the intention of removing was to make a permanent settlement, or for an indefinite time, the right of domicile is acquired by a residence even of a few days. This is one of the rules of the British courts, and it appears to be perfectly reasonable. Another is, that a neutral or subject, found residing in a foreign country is presumed to be there animo manendi; and if a state of war should bring his national character into question, it lies upon him to explain the circumstances of his residence. (The Bernon, 1 Rob., 86, 102.) As to some other rules of the prize courts of England, particularly those which fix a national character upon a person on the ground of constructive residence, or the peculiar nature of his trade, the court is not called upon to give an opinion at this time; because, in this case, it is admitted that the claimants had acquired a right of domicile in Great *Britain at the time of the break- [280 ing out of the war between that country and the United States.

2. The next question is, what are the consequences to which this acquired domicile may legally expose the person entitled to it, in the event of a war taking place between the government under which he resides and that to which he owes a permanent allegiance? A neutral in his situation, if he should engage in open hostilities with the other belligerent, would be considered and treated as an enemy. A citizen of the other belligerent could not be so considered, because he could not, by any act of hostility, render himself, strictly speaking, an enemy, contrary to his permanent allegiance. But although he cannot be considered an enemy, in the strict sense of the word, yet he is deemed such, with reference to the seizure of so much of his property concerned in the trade of the enemy, as is connected with his residence. It is found adhering to the enemy. He is himself adhering to the enemy, although not criminally so, unless he engages in acts of hostility against his native country, or, probably, refuses, when required by his country, to return. The same rule, as to property engaged in the commerce of the enemy, applies to neutrals; and for the same reason. The converse of this rule inevitably applies to the subject of a belligerent state domiciled in a neutral country; he is deemed a neutral by both belligerents, with reference to the trade which he carries on with the adverse belligerent, and with all the rest of the world.

But this national character which a man acquires by residence, may be thrown off at pleasure, by a return to his native country, or even by turning his back on the country in which he has resided, on his way to another. To use the language of Sir W. Scott, it is an adventitious character gained by residence, and which ceases by non-residence. It no longer adheres to the party from the moment he puts himself in motion, bona fide, to quit the country sine animo revertendi, 3 Rob., 17, 12, The Indian Chief. The reasonableness of this rule can hardly be disputed. Having once acquired a national character by residence in a foreign country, he ought to be bound by all the consequences of it, until he has thrown it off, either by an actual return to his *native coun- [281 try or to that where he was naturalized, or by commencing his removal, bona fide, and without an intention of returning. If anything short of actual removal be admitted to work a change in the national character acquired by residence, it seems perfectly reasonable that the evidence of a bona fide intention to remove should be such as to leave no doubt of its sincerity. Mere declarations of such an intention ought never to be relied upon, when contradicted, or at least rendered doubtful, by a continuance of that residence which impressed the character. They may have been made to deceive; or, if sincerely made, they may never be executed. Even the party himself ought not to be bound by them, because he may afterwards find reason to change his determination, and ought to be permitted to do so. But when he accompanies those declarations by acts which speak a language not to be mistaken, and can hardly fail to be consummated by actual removal, the strongest evidence is afforded which the nature of such a case can furnish. And is it not proper that the courts of a belligerent nation should deny to any person the right to use a character so equivocal as to put it in his power to claim which ever may best suit his purpose, when it is called in question? If his property be taken trading with the enemy, shall he be allowed to shield it from confiscation, by alleging that he had intended to remove from the country of the enemy to his own, then neutral, and, therefore, that, as a neutral, the trade was lawful? If war exist between the country of his residence and his native country, and his property be seized by the former, or by the latter, shall he be heard to say in the former case, that he was a domiciled subject of the country of the captor, and in the latter, that he was a native subject of the country of that captor also, because he had declared an intention to resume his native character; and thus to parry the belligerent rights of both? It is to guard against such inconsistencies, and against the frauds which such pretensions, if tolerated, would sanction, that the rule above mentioned has been adopted. Upon what sound principle can a distinction be framed between the case of a neutral and the subject of one belligerent domiciled in the country of the other at the breaking out of the war? The property of each, found engaged in the commerce of their adopt-282*] ed country, belonged to them, *before the war, in their character of subjects of that country, so long as they continued to retain their domicile; and when a state of war takes place between that country and any other, by which the two nations and all their subjects become enemies to each other, it follows that the property, which was once the property of a friend, belongs now, in reference to that property, to an enemy. This doctrine of the common law and prize courts of England is founded, like that mentioned under the first head, upon national law; and it is believed to be strongly supported by reason and justice. It is laid down by Grotius (p. 563), "that all "the subjects of the enemy who are such from "a permanent cause, that is to say, settled in "the country, are liable to the law of repris-"als, whether they be natives or foreigners; "but not so if they are only trading or sojourn-"ing for a little time." And why, it may be confidently asked, should not the property of such subjects be exposed to the law of reprisals and of war, so long as the owner retains his acquired domicile, or, in the words of Grotius, continues a permanent residence in the country of the enemy? They were before, and continue after the war, bound, by such residence, to the society of which they are members, subject to the laws of the state, and owing a qualified allegiance thereto; they are obliged to defend it (with an exception in favor of such a subject, in relation to his native country) in return for the protection it affords them, and the privileges which the laws bestow upon them as subjects. The property of such persons, equally with that of the native subjects in their totality, is to be considered as the goods of the nation, in regard to other states. It belongs, in some sort, to the state, from the right which she has over the goods of its citizens which make a part of the sum total of its riches, and augment its power. (Vatt. 147, and also B. 1, c. 14, § 182.) In reprisals, continues the same author, we seize on the property of the subject just as we would that of the sovereign; everything that belongs to the nation is subject to reprisals, wherever it can be seized, with the exception of a deposit entrusted to the public faith. (B. 2, c. 18, § 344.) Now, if a permanent residence constitutes the person a subject of the country where he is settled, so long as he continues to reside there, and subjects his property to the law of reprisals, as a part of the property of the *nation, it would seem [283 difficult to maintain that the same consequences would not follow in the case of an open and public war, whether between the adopted and native countries of persons so domiciled, or between the former and any other nation. If, then, nothing but an actual removal, or a bona fide beginning to remove, can change a national character acquired by domicile, and if, at the time of the inception of the voyage, as well as at the time of capture, the property belonged to such domiciled person in his character of a subject, what is there that does, or ought to exempt it from capture by the privateers of his native country, if, at the time of capture, he continues to reside in the country of the adverse belligerent? It is contended that a native or naturalized subject of one country, who is surprised in the country where he was domiciled by a declaration of war, ought to have time to make his election to continue there or to remove to the country to which he owes a permanent allegiance; and that, until such election is made, his property ought to be protected from capture by the cruisers of the latter. This doctrine is believed to be as unfounded in reason and justice, as it clearly is in law. In the first place, it is founded upon a presumption that the person will certainly remove before it can possibly be known whether he may elect to do so or not. It is said that this presumption ought to be made, because, upon receiving information of the war, it will be his duty to return home. This position is denied. It is his duty to commit no acts of hostility against his native country, and to return to her assistance when required to do so; nor will any just nation, regarding the mild principles of the law of nations, require him to take arms against his native country, or refuse her permission to him to withdraw whenever he wishes to do so, unless under peculiar circumstances, which, by such removal at a critical period, might endanger the public safety. The conventional law of nations is in conformity with these principles. It is not uncommon to stipulate in treaties that the subjects of each shall be allowed to remove with their property, or to remain unmolested. Such a stipulation does not coerce those subjects either to remove or to remain. They are left free to choose for themselves; and when they have made their election, they claim 284] the right of enjoying *it under the treaty. But until the election is made, their former character continues unchanged.

Until this election is made, if his property found upon the high seas, engaged in the commerce of his adopted country, should be permitted, by the cruisers of the other belligerent, to pass free, under the notion that he may elect to remove, upon notice of the war, and should arrive safe, what is to be done in case the owner of it should afterwards elect to remain where he is? or, if captured and brought immediately to adjudication, it must, upon this doctrine, be acquitted until the election to remain is made and known. In short, the point contended for would apply the doctrine of relation to cases where the party claiming the benefit of it may gain all, and can lose nothing. If he, after the capture, should find it his interest to remain where he is domiciled, his property embarked before his election was made, is safe; and if he finds it best to return, it is safe of course. It is safe whether he goes or stays. This doctrine, producing such contradictory consequences, is not only unsupported by any authority, but it would violate principles long and well established in the prize courts of England, and which ought not, without strong reasons which may render them inapplicable to this country, to be disregarded by this court. The rule there is, that the character of property, during war, cannot be changed in transitu, by any act of the party, subsequent to the capture. The rule indeed goes farther: as to the correctness of which in its greatest extension, no opinion need now be given; but it may safely be affirmed that this change cannot and ought not to be effected by an election of the owner and shipper of it made subsequent to the capture, and, more especially, after a knowedge of the capture is obtained by the owner. Observe the consequences which would result from it. The capture is made and known. The owner is allowed to deliberate whether it is his interest to remain a subject of his adopted, or of his native country. If the capture be made by the former, then he elects to be a subject of that country; if by the latter, then a subject of that. Can such a privileged situation be tolerated by either belligerent? Can any system of law be correct, which places an individual who adheres to one belligerent, and, 285] to the period of his election to *remove, contributes to increase her wealth, in so anomalous a situation as to be clothed with the privileges of a neutral, as to both belligerents? This notion about a temporary state of neutrality impressed upon a subject of one of the belligerents, and the consequent exemption of his property from capture by either, until he has had notice of the war and made his election, is altogether a novel theory, and seems, from the course of the argument, to owe its origin to a supposed hardship to which the contrary doctrine exposes him. But if the reasoning employed on this subject be correct, no such hardship can exist. For if, before the election is made, his property on the ocean is liable to capture by the cruisers of his native and deserted country, it is not only free from capture by those of his adopted country, but is under its protection. The privilege is supposed to be equal to the disadvantage, and is therefore just. The double privilege claimed seems too unreasonable to be granted.

It will be observed, that in the foregoing opinion respecting the nature and consequences of domicile, very few cases have been referred to. It was thought best not to interrupt the chain of argument by stopping to examine cases; but faithfully to present the essential principles to be extracted from those which were cited at the bar, or which have otherwise come under the view of the court, and which applied to the subject. With what success this has been executed, is not for me to decide. But there are two or three cases which seem to be so applicable, and at the same time so conclusive on the great points of this question, that it may not be improper briefly to notice them. In support of the general principles, that the national character of the owner at the time of capture must decide his right to claim, and that a subject is condemned by it, even in the courts of his native country, without time being allowed to him to elect to remove, the following cases may be referred to. In The Boedes Lust (5 Rob., 247), it was decided that the property of a resident of Demarara, shipped before hostilities of any kind had occurred between Holland and Great Britain, but which was captured under an embargo declared by England upon Dutch property, as preparatory to war which ensued soon after the seizure, was, by the retroactive effect of the war applied to property so seized, to be *considered [286 as the property of an enemy taken in war. In this case, Sir W. Scott lays it down, that, where property is taken in a state of hostility, the universal practice has ever been to hold it subject to condemnation, although the claimants may have become friends and subjects prior to the adjudication. This case is somewhat stronger than the present, in the circumstance that in that, the state of hostility, alleged to have existed at the time of capture was made out by considering the subsequent declaration of war as relating back to the time of seizure under the embargo, by which reference it was decided to be a hostile embargo, and of course tantamount to an actual state of war. But this case also proves, not only that the hostile character of the property at the time of the capture establishes the legality of it, but that no future circumstance changing the hostile character of the claimant to that of a friend or subject, can entitle him to restitution. Whether the claimant, in this case, was a neutral or a British subject, does not appear. But if the former, it will not, it is presumed, be contended that he is, upon the principles of national law, less to be favored in the courts of the belligerent than a subject of that nation domiciled in the country of the adverse belligerent. Whitehill's case, however, referred to frequently in Rob. reports, comes fully up to the present, because he was a British subject who had settled but a few days in the hostile country, but before he knew or could have known of the declaration of war; yet, as he went there with an intention to settle, this, connected with his residence, short as it was, fixed his national character, and identified him with the enemy of the country he had so recently quitted. The want of notice, and of an opportunity to extricate himself from a situation to which he had so recently and so innocently exposed himself, could not prevail to protect his property against the belligerent rights of his own country, and to save it from confiscation. There are many other strong cases upon these points, which I forbear to notice particularly, from an unwillingness to swell this opinion already too long.

The sentence of the court is as follows:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is decreed and 287] ordered that the sentence of *the Circuit Court of Massachusetts condemning the one hundred casks of white lead claimed by Lenox & Maitland be, and the same is hereby affirmed with costs. And that the sentence of the said Circuit Court as to the claim of Magee & Jones to twenty-one trunks of merchandise be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled; and that the said twenty-one trunks of merchandise be condemned to the captors; and that the sentence of the said Circuit Court as to the ship Venus claimed by Lenox & Maitland be, and the same is hereby reversed; and that the said ship Venus be condemned, the one-half thereof to the captors, the other half to the United States, under the order of the said Circuit Court. That the sentence of the said Circuit Court as to the claim of Wm. Maitland to one-half of one hundred and fifty crates of earthen ware, thirty-five cases and three casks of copper, nine pieces of cotton bagging and twenty and four-twentieths tons of coal, be, and the same is hereby reversed, and that the same be condemned to the captors; and that the sentence of the said Circuit Court, as to the claim of Alexander M'Gregor to one-half of one hundred and ninety-eight packages of merchandise as the joint property of himself and Lenox & Maitland, and of the claim of Wm. Maitland for one-fourth of the same goods, and of the claim of Alexander M'Gregor to twenty-five pieces of cotton bagging and five trunks of merchandise, be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled, and that the same be condemned to the captors; and that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court for further proceedings to be had thereiu.

JOHNSON, J., declined giving an opinion.

STORY, J. I do not sit in this cause; but the great question involved in it, respecting the effect of domicile on national character, forms the leading point in many cases before the court. Those cases have been ably and fully argued, and I have listened, with great solicitude and attention, to the discussion. On so important a question, where a difference of opinion has been expressed on the bench, I do not feel at liberty to withdraw myself from the responsibility which the law imposes on me. The parties in the other cases have a right to my opiuion; and, however painful it is, in the 288] embarrassing *situation in which I stand, to declare it, I shall not shrink from what I deem a peremptory duty. The question is not new to me. It has beeu repeatedly before me in the Circuit Court, and has been applied sometimes to relieve and sometimes to condemn the claimant. I shall not pretend to go over the grounds of argument, but content myself with declaring my entire concurrence in the opinion expressed by Judge Washington on this point.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. I entirely concur in so much of the opinion delivered in this case as attaches a hostile character to the property of an American citizen continuing, after the declaration of war, to reside and trade in the country of the enemy; and I subscribe implicitly to the reasoning urged in its support. But from so much of that opinion as subjects to confiscation the property of a citizen shipped before a knowledge of the war, and which disallows the defense founded on an intention to change his domicile and to return to the United States, manifested in a sufficient manner, and within a reasonable time after knowledge of the war, although it be subsequent to the capture, I feel myself compelled to dissent.

The question is undoubtedly complex aud intricate. It is difficult to draw a line of discrimination which shall be at the same time precise and equitable. But the difficulty does not appear to me to be sufficient to deter courts from making the attempt.

A merchant residing abroad for commercial purposes may certainly intend to continue in the foreign country so long as peace shall exist, provided his commercial objects shall detain him so long, but to leave it the instant war shall break out between that country and his own. This intention, it is not uecessary to manifest during peace; and when war shall commence, the belligerent cruiser may find his property on the ocean, and may capture it, before he knows that war exists. The question whether this be enemy property or not depends, in my judgment, not exclusively on the residence of the owner at the time, but on his residence taken in connection with his national character as a citizen, and with his intention to continue or to discontinue his commercial domicile in the event of war.

*The evidence of this intention will [289 rarely, if ever, be given duriug peace. It must, therefore, be furnished, if at all, after the war shall be kuown to him; and that knowledge may be preceded by the capture of his goods. It appears to me, then, to be a case in which, as in many others, justice requires that subsequent testimony shall be received to prove a pre-existing fact. Measures taken for removal immediately after a war, may prove a previous intention to remove in the event of war, and may prove that the captured property, although, prima facie, belonging to an enemy, does in fact belong to a friend. In such case, the citizen, in my opinion, has a right, in the nature of the jus postliminii, to claim restitution.

As this question is not only decisive of many claims now depending before this court, but is also of vast importance to our merchants generally, I may be excused for stating, at some length, the reasons on which my opinion is founded.

The whole system of decisious applicable to this subject, rests on the law of nations as its base. It is, therefore, of some importance to inquire how far the writers on that law consider the subjects of oue power residing within the territory of another, as retaining their original character, or partaking of the character of the nation in which they reside.

Vattel, who, though not very full to this point, is more explicit and more satisfactory on it than any other whose work has fallen into my hands, says, "the citizens are the members "of the civil society; bound to this society by "certain duties, and snbject to its authority, "they eqnally participate in its advantages. "The nativcs, or indigenes, are those born in the "country, of parents who are citizens. Society "not being able to subsist and to perpetuate it- "sclf bnt by the children of the citizens, those "children naturally follow the condition of "their fathers, and succeed to all their rights."

"The inhabitants, as distingnished from citi- "zens, are strangers who are permitted to set- "tle and stay in the country. Bonnd by "their residence to the society, they are sub- "ject to the laws of the state, while they re- "side there, and they are obliged to defend it, 290] "because it grants *them protection, "though they do not participate in all the rights "of citizens. They enjoy only the advantages "which the laws or custom gives them. The "perpetnal inhabitants are those who have re- "ceived the right of perpetual residence. These "are a kind of citizens of an inferior order, "and are united and subject to the society, "without participating in all its advantages."

"The domicile is the habitation fixed in any "place, with an intention of always staying "there. A man does not, then, establish his "domicile in any place, unless he makes snf- "ficiently known his intention of fixing there, "either tacitly or by an express declaration. "However, this declaration is no reason why, if "he afterwards changes his mind, he may not "remove his domicile elsewhere. In this sense, "he who stops, even for a long time, in a place, "for the management of his affairs, has only "a simple habitation there, but has no domicile."

A domicile, then, in the sense in which this term is used by Vattel, requires not only actual residence in a foreign country, but "an inten- tion of always staying there." Actnal residence without this intention, amounts to no more than "simple habitation."

Although this intention may be implied with- ont being expressed, it ought not, I think, to be implied, to the injury of the individual, from acts entirely eqnivocal. If the stranger has not the power of making his residence perpetual, if circnmstances, after his arrival in a country, so change as to make his continnance there dis- advantageous to himself, and his power to con- tinue, doubtful; "an intention always to stay there" onght not, I think, to be fixed upon him, in consequence of an unexplained residence previous to that change of circumstances. Mere residence, nnder partienlar circumstances, would seem to me, at most, to prove only an in- tention to remain so long as those circumstances continue the same, or equally advantageons. This does not give a domicile. The intention which gives a domicile is an unconditional in- tention "to stay always."

The right of the citizens or subjects of one country to remain in another, depends on the 291] will of the sovereign, *of that other; and if that will be not expressed otherwise than by that general hospitality which receives and af- fords security to strangers, it is supposed to terminate with the relations of peace between the two countries. When war breaks out, the subjects of one belligerent in the country of the other are considered as enemies, and have no right to remain there.

Vattel says, "enemies continue such wher- "ever they happen to be. The place of abode "is of no accont here. It is the political ties "which determine the quality. While a man "remains a citizen of his own country he re- "mains the enemy of all those with whom his "nation is at war."

It would seem to me to require very strong evidence of an intention to become the perma- nent inhabitant of a foreign country to justify a court in presnming such intention to continne, when that residence must expose the per- son to the inconvenience of being considered and treated as an enemy. The intention to be inferred solely from the fact of residence dur- ing peace, for commercial purposes, is, in my judgment, necessarily conditional, and depend- ent on the continnance of the relations of peace between the two countries.

So far is the law of nations from considering residence in a foreign country in time of peace as evidence of an intention "always to stay there," even in time of war, that the very con- trary is expressed. Vattel says, "the sovereign "declaring war can neither detain those sub- "jects of the enemy who are within his domin- "ions at the time of the declaration, nor their "effects. They came into his country on the "public faith. By permitting them to enter "his territory and to continue there, he tacitly "promised them liberty and security for their "return. He is therefore to allow them a rea- "sonable time for withdrawing with their "effects; and if they stay beyond the time pre- "scribed, he has a right to treat them as ene- "mies, though as enemies disarmed."

The stranger merely residing in a country during peace, however long his stay, and what- ever his employment, provided it be such as strangers may engage in, cannot, on the princi- ples of national law, be considered *as [292 incorporated into that society, so as, immedi- ately on a declaration of war, to become the enemy of his own. "His property," says Vattel, "is still a part of the totality of the wealth of "his nation." "The citizen or subject of a "state, who absents himself for a time, without "any intention to abandon the society of which "he is a member, does not lose his privilege by "his absence; he preserves his rights, and re- "mains bound by the same obligations. Being "received in a foreign country, in virtue of the "natural society, the communication and com- "merce, which nations are obliged to cultivate "with each other, he ought to be considered "there as a member of his own nation, and treat- "ed as such."

The subject of one power inhabiting the country of another, ought not to be considered as a member of the nation in which he resides, even by foreigners; nor ought he, on the first commencement of hostilities, to be treated as an enemy by the enemies of that nation.

Burlamaqui says, "as to strangers, those who "settle in the enemy's country after a war is "begun, of which they had previous notice, "may justly be looked upon as enemies and "treated as such. But in regard to such as "went thither before the war, justice and hu- "manity require that we should give them a "reasonable time to retire; and if they neglect "that opportunity, they are accounted ene- "mies."

If this rule be obligatory on foreign nations, much more ought it to bind that of which the individual is a member.

I think I cannot be mistaken when I say that, in all the views taken of this subject by the most approved writers on the law of nations, the citizen of one country residing in another is not considered as incorporated in that other, but is still considered as belonging to that society of which he was originally a member. And if war break out between the two nations, he is to be permitted, and is expected, to return to his own. I do not perceive in those writers any exception with regard to merchants.

It must, however, be acknowledged that the 293] great extension *of commerce has had considerable influence on national law. Rules have been adopted, perhaps by general consent, principles have been engrafted on the original stalk of public law, by which merchants, while belonging politically to one society, are considered commercially as the members of another. For commercial purposes the merchant is considered as a member of that society in which he has his domicile; and less conclusive evidence than would seem to be required in general cases, by the law of nations, has been allowed to fix the domicile for commercial purposes. But I cannot admit that the original meaning of the term is to be entirely disregarded, or the true nature of this domicile to be overlooked. The effects of the rule ought to be regulated by the motives which are presumed to have induced its establishment, and by the convenience it was intended to promote.

The policy of commercial nations receives foreign merchants into their bosom; and permits their own citizens to reside abroad for the purposes of trade without injury to their rights or character as citizens. This free intercommunication must certainly be believed, by the nations who allow it, to be promotive of their interests. Nor is this opinion ill founded. Nothing can be more obvious than that the affairs of a commercial company will be transacted to most advantage by being conducted, as it respects both purchase and sale, under the eye of a person interested in the result. The nation which takes an interest in the prosperity of its commerce can feel no inclination to restrain its citizens from residence abroad for the purposes of commerce; nor will it hastily construe such residence into a change of national character, to the injury of the individual. It is not the policy of such a nation, nor can it be its wish, to restrain its citizens from pursuing abroad a business which tends to enrich itself. It ought not, then, to consider them as enemies in consequence of their having engaged in such pursuit in the country of a friend, who, before their removal, becomes an enemy.

If, indeed, it be the real intention of the citizen permanently to change his national character, if it be his choice to remain in the country 294] of the enemy during *war, there can be no harshness—no injustice in treating him as an enemy. But if, while prosecuting his business in a foreign country, he contemplates a return to his own; if, in the prosecution of that business, he is promoting rather than counteracting the interests and policy of the country of which he is a member, it would seem to me to be pressing the principle too far, and to be drawing conclusions which the premises will not warrant, to infer, conclusively, an intention to continue in a country which has become hostile, from a residence and trading in that country while it was friendly; and to punish him by the confiscation of his goods, as if he was fully convicted of that intention.

It is admitted to be a general rule, that, while the state of things remains unaltered, while the motives which carried the citizen abroad continue, while he still prosecutes a business of uncertain duration, his capacity to prosecute which is not impaired, his mercantile character is confounded with that of the country in which he resides, and his trade is considered as the trade of that country.

It will require but a slight examination of the subject to perceive the reason of this rule; and that, to a certain extent, it is convenient without being unjust.

In times of universal peace, the question of national character can arise only when some privilege or some disability is attached to it, or in cases of insurance. A particular trade may be allowed or be prohibited to the merchants of a particular nation, or property may be warranted to be of a particular nation. If, in such cases, the residence of the individual be received as evidence of his national mercantile character, the subjects of inquiry are simplified, the questions are reduced to a plain one, and the various complex inquiries, which might otherwise arise, are avoided. There is, therefore, much convenience in adopting this principle in such a state of things; and it is not perceived that any injustice can grow out of it; since the individual to whom the rule is applied is not surprised by any new or unlooked-for event.

So if war exists between two nations. Each belligerent *having a right to capture [295 the property of the other found on the ocean, each being intent on detroying the commerce of the other, and on depriving it of every cover under which it may seek to shelter itself, will certainly not allow the advantages of neutrality to a merchant residing in the country of his enemy. Were this permitted, the whole trade of the enemy could assume, and would assume, a neutral garb.

There is, in general, no reason for supposing that a merchant residing in a foreign country, and carrying on trade, means to withdraw from it, on its engaging in war with any other country to which he is bound by no obligation. By continuing, during war, the domicile acquired in peace, he violates no duty, offends against no generally acknowledged principle, and retains all his rights of residence and commerce. The war, then, furnishes no motive for presuming that he is about to change his situation, and to resume his original national character.

These reasons appear to me to require the rule as a general one, and to justify its application to general cases. But they do not, in my opinion, justify its application to the case of a merchant whom war finds engaged in trade in a country which becomes the enemy of his own. His country ought not, I think, to bind him by his residence during peace; nor to consider him as precluded by it from showing an intention that it should terminate with the relations of peace.

When it is considered that his right to remain and prosecute that trade in which he had been engaged during peace is forfeited; that his duty, and most probably his inclinations, call him home; that he has become the enemy of the country in which he resides; that his continuance in it exposes him to many and serious inconveniences; that his person and property are in danger; it is not, I think, going too far to say that this change in his situation may be considered as changing his intention on the subject of residence, and as affording a presumption of intending to return.

Let it be remembered that, according to the law of nations, domicile depends on the inten-296*] tion to reside permanently *in the country to which the individual has removed; and that a change of this intention is, at any time, allowable. If, upon grounds of general policy and general convenience, while the circumstances under which the residence commenced, continue the same, residence and employment in permanent trade be considered as evidence of an intention to continue permanently in the country, and as giving a commercial national character, may not a total change in circumstances—a loss of the capacity to carry on the trade—be received, in the absence of all conflicting proof, as presumptive evidence of an intention to leave the country, and as extricating the trade, carried on in the time of supposed peace, from the national character, so far as to protect it from the perils of war? At any rate, do not reason and justice require that this change of circumstances should leave the question open to be decided on such other evidence as the war must produce?

The great object for which an American merchant fixes himself in a foreign country is, most generally, to carry on trade between that country and his own. In almost every case of this description before the court, the claimant is a member of a house established in the United States; and his business abroad is subservient to the business at home. This trade is annihilated by the war.

If, while peace subsists between the United States and Great Britain, while the American merchant possesses there all the commercial rights allowed to the citizens of a friendly nation, and may carry on uninterruptedly his trade to his own country, he is presumed, his intentions being unexplained, to intend remaining there always, and may, for general convenience, be clothed with the commercial character of the nation in which he resides, ought this presumption to be extended, by his own government, beyond the facts out of which it grows, if the interest of the individual be materially affected by that extension? Do not reason and justice require that we should consider his original intention as being only coextensive with the causes which carried him to and detained him in the country, as being, in its nature, conditional, and dependent on the continuance of those causes?

297*] *If such a person were required, on his arrival in a foreign country, to declare his real intentions on the subject of residence, he would, most probably, say, if he spoke honestly, "I come for the purpose of trade. I shall remain while the situation of the two countries permits me to carry on my trade lawfully, securely, and advantageously. When that situation so changes as to deprive me of these rights, I shall return." His intention, then, to reside in the country, his domicile in it, and, consequently, his commercial character, unless he continued his trade after war, would be clearly limited by the duration of peace. It would not, I think, be unreasonable to say, that the intention, to be implied from his conduct, ought to have the same limitation.

To me it seems that a mere commercial domicile acquired in time of peace, necessarily expires at the commencement of hostilities. Domicile supposes rights incompatible with a state of war. If the foreign merchant be not compelled to abandon the country, it is not because his commercial character confers on him a legal right to stay, but because he is specially permitted to stay. If in this I am correct, it would seem to follow that, if all the legal consequences of a residence in time of peace do not absolutely terminate with the peace, yet the national commercial character which that residence has attached to the individual, is not so conclusively fixed upon him as to disqualify him from showing that, within a reasonable time after the commencement of hostilities, he made arrangements for returning to his own country. If a residence and trading after the war be not indispensably necessary to give the citizen merchant or his property a hostile character, yet removal, or measures showing a determination to remove, within a reasonable time after the war, may retroact upon property shipped before a knowledge of the war, and rescue that property from the hostile character attached to the property of the nation in which the individual resided.

The law of nations is a law founded on the great and immutable principles of equity and natural justice. To draw an inference against all probability, whereby a citizen, for the purpose of confiscating his goods, is clothed, against his inclination, with the character of an enemy, in consequence of an act which, when committed, *was innocent in itself, was [298 entirely compatible with his political character as a citizen, and with the political views of his government, would seem to me to subvert those principles. The rule which, for obvious reasons, applies to the merchant in time of peace or in time of war, the national commercial character of the country in which he resides cannot, in my opinion, without subverting those principles, apply a hostile character to his trade carried on during peace, so conclusively as to prevent his protecting it by changing that character within a reasonable time after a knowledge of the war.

My opinion, then, is, that a mere commercial domicile acquired by an American citizen in time of peace, especially if he be a member of an American house, and is carrying on trade auxiliary to his trade with his own country, ought not to be considered positively as continuing longer than the state of peace. The declaration of war is a fact which removes the causes that induced his residence in the foreign country. They no longer operate upon him. When they cease, their effects ought to cease. An intention which they produced ought not to be supposed to continue. The character of his property shipped before a knowledge of the war, ought not to be decided absolutely by his residence at the time of shipment or capture, but ought to depend on his continuing to reside and trade in the enemy country, or on his taking prompt measures for returning to his own.

This is the conclusion to which my mind would certainly be conducted, might I permit it to be guided by the lights of reason and the principles of natural justice. But it is said that a course of adjudications has settled the law to be otherwise—that we cannot, without overturning a magnificent system bottomed on the broad base of national law, and of which the parts are admirably adjusted to each other, yield to the dictates of humanity on this particular question. Sir William Scott, it is argued at the bar, has, by a series of decisions, developed the principles of national law on this subject, with a perspicuity and precision which mark plainly the path we ought to tread.

299*] *I respect Sir William Scott, as I do every truely great man; and I respect his decisions; nor should I depart from them on light grounds; but it is impossible to consider them attentively without perceiving that his mind leans strongly in favor of the captors. Residence, for example, in a belligerent country, will condemn the share of a neutral in a house, trading in a neutral country; but residence in a neutral country will not protect the share of a belligereut or neutral in a commercial house established in a belligerent country. In a great maritime country, depending on its navy for its glory and its safety, the national bias is perhaps so entirely in this direction, that the judge, without being conscious of the fact, must feel its influence. However this may be, it is a fact of which I am fully convinced; and, on this account, it appears to me to be the more proper to investigate rigidly the principles on which his decisions have been made, and not to extend them where such extension may produce injustice.

While I make this observation, it would betray a want of candor not to accompany it with the acknowledgment that I perceive in the opinions of this eminent judge no disposition to press this principle with peculiar severity against neutrals. He has certainly not mitigated it when applying it to British subjects.

With this impression respecting the general character of British admiralty decisions, I proceed to examine them so far as they bear on the question of domicile

The case of The Vigilantia does not itself involve the point. But in delivering his opinion, the judge cited two cases of capture which have been quoted and relied on at bar. In each of these, the share of the partner residing in the neutral country was restored, and that of the partner residiug in the belligerent country was condemned. But these decisions applied to a trade continued to be carried on during war.

In a subsequent case, the share of the partner residing in the neutral country also was condemned; and the lords commissioners said that the principle on which restitution was decreed in each of the first-mentioned cases, was, "that they were merely at the commencement 300] *of a war." They said that "a person "carrying on trade habitually in the country "of the enemy, though not resident there, "should have time to withdraw himself from "that commerce; that it would press too heavily on neutrals to say that, immediately, on "the first breaking out of a war, their goods "would become subject to confiscation."

On these cases it is to be observed, that, although the two first happened at the commencement of the war, yet they happened during a war; and the partners whose interest was condemned, do not appear to have discontinued their residence and tradiug in the country of the enemy after war had taken place. The declaration "that it would press too heavily on neutrals to say that, immediately on the first breaking out of a war their goods would become subject to confiscation," though applied to a neutral not residing in the belligerent country, clearly discriminates, in a case of capture, between the rights of parties at the commencement of a war, and at a subsequent period. But it is sufficient to say that neither the case itself, nor the cases and opinions cited in it, apply directly to the questiou before this court.

In the case of The Harmony, the property of Mr. Murray, an American citizen residing in France, was condemned on account of that residence. But Mr. Murray had removed to France during the war, and had continued there for four years.

The scope of the argument of Sir William Scott goes to show that the single circumstance of residence in the enemy country, if not intended to be permanent, will not give the enemy character to the property of such resident captured in a trade between his own country and that of the enemy. It is material that the conduct of Mr. Murray, subsequent to the capture, had great influence in determining the fate of his property. Had he returned to the United States immediately after that event, I do not hazard much in saying that restitution would have been decreed.

In the case of The Indian Chief, Mr. Johnson, an American citizen domiciliated in England, had engaged *in a mercantile en- [301 terprise to the British East Indies—a trade allowed to an American citizen, but prohibited to a British subject. On its return, the vessel came into Cowes, and was seized for being concerned in illicit trade. Mr. Johnsou had then left England for the United States. He was considered as not being a British subject at the time of capture, and restitution was decreed.

In delivering his opinion in this case, Sir William Scott said: "Taking it to be clear that the national character of Mr. Johnson, as a British merchant, was founded in residence only, that it was acquired by residence, and rested on that circumstance alone, it must be held that, from the moment he turns his back on the country where he has resided, on his way to his own country, he was in the act of resuming his original character, and is to be considered as an American. The character that is gained by residence ceases by non-residence. It is an adventitious character that no longer adheres to him from the moment that he puts himself in motion, bona fide, to quit the country sine animo revertendi."

This case undoubtedly proves, affirmatively, that the national character gained by residence ceases with that residence; but I cannot admit it to prove, negatively, that this national character can be laid down by no other means. I cannot, for instance, admit that an American citizen, who had gained a domicile in England during peace, and was desirous of returning home on the breaking out of war, but was detained by force, could, under the authority of this opinion, be treated as a British trader, with respect to his property embarked before a knowledge of the war.

In the case of La Virginie, the property of a Mr. Lapierre, who was probably naturalized in the United States, but who had returned to St. Domingo, and had shipped the produce of that island to France, was condemned. But he was considered as a Frenchman, was residing at the time in a French colony, and was engaged in a trade between that colony and the mother country. The case, the judge observed, might have been otherwise decided, had the shipment been made to the United States.

302*] *In the case of The Jonge Clarissa, Mr. Ravie had a license to make certain importations as a British subject. He had a house in Amsterdam, went there in person during the war, and made the shipment under his own inspection and control. It was determined that, in this transaction, he acted in his character as a Dutch merchant, and was not protected by his license. This was a trading during war.

In the case of The Citto, the property of Mr. Bowden, a British subject residing in Holland, was condemned. It appeared that he had settled in Amsterdam, where he had resided, carrying on trade, for six years. In 1795, when the French troops took possession of that country, he left it and settled in Guernsey. The Citto was a Danish vessel captured in April, 1796, on a voyage from a Spanish port to Guernsey, where Mr. Bowden then resided. In June, 1796, after the capture of the Citto, he returned to Holland. In argument, it was contended, that it appeared that British subjects might reside in Holland without forfeiting their British character, from the proclamation of the 3d of September, 1796, which directs the landing of goods, imported under that order into the united provinces, to be certified by British merchants resident there.

The judge was desirous of knowing the nature of Mr. Bowden's residence in Holland—whether he had confined himself to the object of withdrawing his property, or had been engaged in the general traffic of the place. If the former, "he may," said the judge, "be "entitled to restitution, more especially ad- "verting to the order in council, which is cer- "tainly so worded as not to be very easy to be "applied."

The cause stood for further proof.

It is plain that, in this opinion, the residence of the claimant at the time of capture was not considered as conclusive. Had it been so, restitution must have been decreed, because Mr. Bowden was a British subject, and, at that time, resided in Guernsey. It is equally apparent that, had his subsequent residence in the enemy country been for the sole purpose of withdrawing his property, the law was not un-

303*] derstood to forbid restitution. *The language of Sir William Scott certainly ascribes considerable influence to the proclamation, but does not rest the right of the claimant altogether on that fact.

On the 17th of March, 1800, an affidavit of Mr. Bowden, made the 6th of August, 1799, was produced, in which he stated his residence in Holland previous to the invasion by the French. That he quitted Holland and landed in England the 20th of January, 1795, whence he proceeded to Guernsey, where he resided with his family. That, in the month of June, 1796, he was under the absolute necessity of returning to Holland, for the purpose of recovering debts due and effects belonging to the partnership, his partner remaining in Guernsey.

The affidavit then proceeded to state many instances of his attachment to his own government, and concluded with averring that he was still under the necessity of remaining in Holland, for the purpose of recovering part of the said debts and effects, which would be impossible were he to leave the country; but that it was his intention to return to his native country, so soon as his affairs would permit, where his mother and his relations reside.

The court observed that it appeared, from the affidavit, that Mr. Bowden was, at that time, in Holland; and added, "it would be a strange "act of injustice if, while we are condemning "the goods of persons of all nations resident "in Holland, we were to restore the goods of "native British subjects resident there. An "Englishman residing and trading in Holland "is just as much a Dutch merchant as a Swede "or a Dane would be."

This case was decided in 1800. Mr. Bowden had returned to Holland in 1796, during the war, and had continued in the country of the enemy. It is not denied that he continued his trade, and the fact that he did continue it is fairly to be inferred, not only from his omitting to aver the contrary, but from the language of Sir William Scott. "An Englishman resid- "ing and trading in Holland," says that judge, "is just as much a Dutch merchant as a Swede "or a Dane would be." The case of Mr. Bowden, then, is the case of a British subject who continued to reside and trade in the enemy country four years after the commencement of hostilities. His *property must have [304 been condemned on one of two principles. Either the judge must have considered his residence in Guernsey, from January, 1795, to June, 1796, as a temporary interruption of his permanent residence in Holland, and not as a change of domicile, since he returned to that country, and continued in it, as a trader, to the rendition of the final sentence; or he must have decided that, although Mr. Bowden remained and intended to remain in fact a British subject, yet the permanent national commercial character which he acquired after this capture, retroacted on a trade which, at the time of capture, was entirely British, and subjected the property to confiscation. On whichsoever of these principles the case was decided, it is clear that the hostile character attached to the property of Mr. Bowden in consequence of his residing and trading in the country of the enemy during the war. This case is, I think, materially variant from one in which the residence and trading took place during peace, and the capture was made before a change of residence could be conveniently effected.

The Diana is also a case of considerable interest, which contains doctrines entitled to attentive consideration.

During the war between Great Britain and Holland, which commenced in 1795, the island of Demarara surrendered to the British arms. By the treaty of Amiens, it was restored to the Dutch. That treaty contained an article allowing the inhabitants, of whatever country they might be, a term of three years, to be computed from the notification of the treaty, for the purpose of disposing of their property acquired and possessed before or during the war, in which term they may have the full exercise of their religion and enjoyment of their property.

Previous to the declaration of war against Holland, in 1803, the Diana and several other vessels, loaded with colonial produce, were captured on a voyage from Demarara to Holland. Immediately after the declaration of war, and before the expiration of three years from the notification of the treaty of Amiens, Demarara again surrendered to Great Britain. 305] Claims to the captured *property were filed by original British subjects, inhabitants of Demarara, some of whom had settled in the colony while it was in possession of Great Britain, others before that event. The trial came on after the island had again become a British colony.

Sir William Scott decreed restitution to those British subjects who had settled in the colony while in British possession, but condemned the property of those who had settled there before that time. He held, that their settling in Demarara while belonging to Great Britain, afforded a presumption of their intending to return, if the island should be transferred to a foreign power; which presumption, recognized in the treaty, relieved those claimants from the necessity of proving such intention. He thought it highly reasonable that they should be admitted to their jus postliminii, and be held entitled to the protection of British subjects.

But the property of those claimants who had settled before it came to the possession of Great Britain, was condemned. "Having settled "without any faith in British possession, it "cannot be supposed," he said, "that they "would have relinquished their residence, be- "cause that possession had ceased. They had "passed from one sovereign to another with "indifference; and if they may be supposed "to have looked again to a connection with "this country, they must have viewed it as a "circumstance that was in no degree likely "to affect their intention of continuing there." "On the situation of persons settled there pre- "vious to the time of British possession, I feel "myself," said the judge, "obliged to pro- "nounce that they must be considered in the "same light as persons resident in Amsterdam. "It must be understood, however, that if there "were among these, any who have been actual- "ly removing, and that fact is properly ascer- "tained, their goods may be capable of restitu- "tion. All that I mean to express is, that "there must be evidence of an intention to "remove, on the part of those who settled "prior to British possession, the presumption "not being in their favor."

This having been a hostile seizure, though made before the declaration of war, the property is held equally *liable to condemna- [306 tion as if captured the instant of that declaration.

So much of the case as relates to those claimants who had settled during British possession, proves that other circumstances than an actual getting into motion for the purpose of returning to his own country, may create a presumption of intending to return; and may put off that hostile commercial character which a British subject residing and trading in the country of an enemy is admitted to acquire. The settlement having been made in a country which, at the time, was in possession of Great Britain, though held only by the right of conquest—a tenure known to be extremely precarious, and rarely to continue longer than the war in which the acquisition is made—is sufficient to create this presumption; but the case does not declare negatively that no other circumstances would be sufficient.

I am aware that the part of the case which applies to claimants who had settled previous to British possession, will, at first view, appear to have a strong bearing on the question before the court. The shipment was in time of peace, and the seizure was made before the declaration of war. The trade was one in which a British subject, in time of peace, might lawfully engage. However strong his intention might be to return to his native country in the event of war, he could not be expected to manifest that intention before the actual existence of war. The reconquest of the island followed the declaration of war so speedily as scarcely to leave time for putting in execution the resolution to return, had one been formed. Taking these circumstances into view, the condemnation would seem to be one of extreme severity. Yet even this case, admitting the decision to be perfectly correct, does not, I think, when accurately examined, go so far as to justify a condemnation under such circumstances as belong to some of the cases at bar.

The island having surrendered during war, such of its inhabitants as were originally British subjects were not allowed to derive, from this re-annexation to the dominions of Great Britain, the advantages to which a voluntary return to their own country, of the same *date, would have entitled them. They [307 were considered as if they had been "residents of Amsterdam."

But Sir William Scott observes, that "if "there are among these any who have been act- "ually removing, and that fact is properly as- "certained, their goods may be capable of "restitution." "Actually removing." When? Not, surely, before the seizure; for that was made in time of peace. Not before the declaration of war, when the original seizure was converted into a belligerent capture; for until that declaration was known, a person whose intention to remain or return was dependent on peace or war, would not be "actually removing." On every principle of equity, then, the time to which these expressions refer, must be the surrender of Demarara, or a reasonable time after the declaration of war was known there. The one period or the other would be subsequent to that event which was deemed equivalent to capture.

It is not unworthy of remark that Sir William Scott adds explanatory words which qualify and control the words "actually removing," and show the sense in which he used them. "All," says the Judge, "that I mean to ex- "press is, that there must be evidence of an "intention to remove, on the part of those who "settled prior to British possession, the pre- "sumption not being in their favor."

It would, then, I think, be rejecting a part, and a material part, of the opinion, to say that an intention to remove clearly proved, though not accompanied by the fact of removal, would have been deemed insufficient to support the claim for restitution.

Were there no other circumstances of real importance in this case—did it rest solely on the sentiments expressed by the Judge, unconnected with those circumstances—I should certainly consider it as leaving open to the claimants before this court the right of proving an intention to return within a reasonable time after the declaration of war, by other overt acts than an actual removal.

But there are other circumstances which I 308] cannot *deem immaterial; and, as the opinions of a judge are always to be taken with reference to the particular case in which they are delivered, I must consider these expressions in connection with the whole case.

The probability is, that the claimants were not merely British merchants. Though the fact is not expressly stated, there is some reason to believe that they had become proprietors of the soil, and were completely incorporated with the Dutch colonists. They are not denominated merchants. They are spoken of, through the case, not as residents, but as settlers. "They had passed," said Sir William Scott, "from one sovereignty to another with "indifference." This mode of expression appears to me to indicate a more permanent interest in the country—a more intimate connection with it than is acquired by a merchant removing to a foreign country, and residing there in time of peace, for the sole purpose of trade. And in another of the same class of cases it is said that, previous to the last war, the principal plantations of the island were in possession of British planters from the other British islands.

The voyage, too, in making which the Diana was captured, was a direct voyage between the colony and the mother country. The trade was completely Dutch; and the property of any neutral, wherever residing, if captured in such a voyage during war, would be condemned.

But it is still more material that those who settled in Demarara before British possession, must have settled during the war which was terminated by the treaty of Amiens; or, if they settled in time of peace, must have continued there while the colony was Dutch, and while Holland was at war with Great Britain. Whichever the fact might be, whether they had settled in an enemy country during war, or had continued, through the war, a settlement made in time of peace, they had demonstrated that war made no change in their residence. In their case, then, it might be correctly said, "that war created no presumption of an in- "tention to return"—"that they passed from "one sovereignty to another with indifference."

*I cannot consider claims under these [309 circumstances as being in the same equity with claims made by persons who had removed into a foreign country, in time of peace, for the sole purpose of trade, and whose trade would be annihilated by war.

The case of the Boedes Lust differs from the Diana only in this: the claimants are not alleged to have been originally British subjects. Restitution was asked, because the property did not belong to an enemy at the time of shipment, nor at the time of seizure, nor at the time of adjudication. These grounds were all declared to be insufficient. The original seizure was provisionally hostile; and the declaration of war consummated the right to condemn, and vested the property in the crown as enemy property. The subsequent change in the character of the claimants, who became British subjects by the surrender of Demarara, could not divest it. "Where property is taken "in a state of hostility," said Sir William Scott, "the universal practice has ever been to hold "it subject to condemnation, although the "claimants may have become friends and sub- "jects prior to adjudication." "With as little "effect," he added, "can it be contended that "a postliminium can be attributed to these par- "ties. Here is no return to the original char- "acter, on which only a jus postliminii can be "raised. The original character at the time of "seizure, and immediately prior to the hostil- "ity which has intervened, was Dutch. The "present character, which the events of war "have produced, is that of British subjects; "and, although the British subject might, un- "der circumstances, acquire the jus postliminii, "upon the resumption of his native character, "it never can be considered that the same priv- "ilege accrues upon the acquisition of a char- "acter totally new and foreign."

This opinion is certainly not decisive; but it appears to me rather to favor than oppose the idea that a merchant residing abroad, and taking measures to return on the breaking out of war, may entitle himself to the jus postliminii, with respect to property shipped before a knowledge of the war.

The President was captured on a voyage from the * Cape of Good Hope to Eu- [310 rope. Mr. Elmslie, the claimant, was born a British subject, but claimed as a citizen of the United States. He had removed to the Cape of Good Hope, during the preceding war, and still resided there. The property was condemned. In delivering his opinion, Sir William Scott observed: "It is said the claimant is "entitled to the benefit of an intention of re- "moving to Philadelphia in a few months. A "mere intention to remove has never been "held sufficient without some overt act, being "merely an intention residing secretly and un- "distinguishably in the breast of the party, "and liable to be revoked every hour. The "expressions of the letter in which this inten- "tion is said to be found, are, I observe, very "weak and general, of an intention merely in "futuro. Were they even much stronger than "they are, they would not be sufficient. Some- "thing more than mere verbal declaration, "some solid fact showing that the party is in "the act of withdrawing, has always been held "necessary in such cases."

It is to be held in mind that this opinion is delivered in the case of a person who had fixed his residence in an enemy country, during war, and that he claimed to be the subject of a neutral state. For both these reasons, the war afforded no presumption of his intending to return either to his native or adopted country. To the vague expression of an intention to return at some future indefinite time, no influence can be ascribed. When the judge says that "something more than mere verbal declaration, some solid fact showing that the party is in the act of withdrawing, has always been held necessary in such cases," I do not understand him to say that the person must have put himself in personal motion to return, must have commenced his voyage homeward, in order to be considered as in "the act of withdrawing." Many other overt acts, as selling a commercial establishment, stopping business, making preparations to return, accompanied by declarations of the intent, and not opposed by other circumstances, may, in my opinion, be considered as acts of withdrawing.

In the case of The Ocean, Sir William Scott said "This claim relates to the situation of 311] "British subjects settled *in a foreign "state, in time of amity, and taking early "measures to withdraw themselves, on the "breaking out of war. The affidavit of claim "states that this gentleman had been settled as "a partner in a house of trade in Holland, but "that he had made arrangements for the dis-"solution of the partnership, and was only "prevented from removing personally, by the "violent detention of all British subjects who "happened to be within the territories of the "enemy, at the breaking out of the war. It "would, I think, under these circumstances, "be going further than the principle of law re-"quires, to conclude this person by his former "occupation, and by his present constrained "residence in France, so as not to admit him "to have taken himself out of the effect of "supervening hostilities, by the means which "he had used for his removal."

If other means for removal were taken than arrangements for the dissolution of the partnership, they are not stated; and it is fairly to be presumed that these arrangements were the most prominent of them, since that fact is alone selected and particularly relied upon. In his statement of the case, the reporter says that the claimant had actually made his escape and returned to England, in July, 1803 (the trial was in January, 1804); but this must be a mistake, or is a fact not adverted to by the judge, since he says, in his opinion, that the claimant is, at the time, "a constrained resident of France."

I shall notice two other cases, which are frequently cited, though I have seen no full report of either of them.

The first is the case of Mr. Curtissos. This gentleman, who was a British subject, had gone to Surinam in 1766, and from thence to St. Eustatius, where he remained till 1776. He then went to Holland to settle his accounts, and with an intention, "as was said," of returning afterwards to England to take up his final residence. In December, 1780, orders of reprisal were issued by England against Holland. On the first of January, 1781, The Snelle Zeylder was captured, and, on the 5th of March and 10th of April, 1781, the vessel and cargo were condemned as Dutch property. On the 27th *of April, 1781, Mr. Curtissos returned [312 to England; and, on an appeal, the sentence of condemnation was reversed by the Lords of Appeals, and restitution decreed,

Other claims of Mr. Curtissos were brought before the Court of Admiralty; and, on a full disclosure of these circumstances, restitution was decreed, before the decree of the lords in the case of The Snelle Zeylder was pronounced.

The principle of this decree is said to be, that Mr. Curtissos was in itinere, and had put himself in motion, and was in pursuit of his original British character.

I do not mean to find fault with this decision; but certainly it presents some strong points more unfavorable to the claimant than will be found in some of the cases now before this court. Mr. Curtissos had obtained a commercial domicile in the country of the enemy. At the time of the sailing, capture and condemnation of The Snelle Zeylder, he still resided in the country of the enemy. But it is said he was in itinere; he was in motion in pursuit of his original British character. What was this journey he is said to have been performing in pursuit of his original character? He had passed from one part of the dominions of the united provinces to another. He had moved his residence from St. Eustatius to Holland, where he remained from the year 1776 till 1781 —a time of sufficient duration for the acquisition of a domicile, had he not previously acquired it. This change of residence, to make the most of it, is an act too equivocal in itself to afford a strong presumption that it was made for the purpose of returning to England. Had his stay in Holland even been short, a colonial merchant trading to the mother country, may so frequently be carried there on the business of his trade that the fact can afford but weak evidence of an intention to discontinue that trade; but an interval of between four and five years elapsed between his arrival in Holland and his departure from that country, during which time he is not stated to have suspended his commercial pursuits, or to have made any arrangements, such as transferring his property to England, or making an establishment there, which might indicate, by overt *acts, the intention of returning to his [313 native country. This journey to Holland, connected with this long residence, would seem to me to be made as a Dutch merchant for the purpose of establishing himself there, rather than as preparatory to his return to England. But it was said that he intended to return to England. How was this intention shown? If not by his journey to Holland and his long residence there, it was only shown by his being employed in the settlement of his accounts while a merchant at St. Eustatius, a business in which he would, of course, engage, whatever his future objects might be. This equivocal act does not appear to have been explained, otherwise than by his own declarations; nor does it appear that these declarations were made previous to the capture.

But could I even admit that the journey from St. Eustatius to Holland was made with a view of passing ultimately from Holland to Eng land, yet the intention was not to be immediately executed. The time of carrying it into effect was remote and uncertain; subject to so many casualties that, had not the war supervened, it might never have been carried into effect.

But laying aside these circumstances, the case proves only that being in itinere, in pursuit of the native character, divests the enemy character acquired by residence and trading; it is not insinuated that this character can be divested by no other means.

Mr. Whitehill's case, though one of great severity, does not, I think, overturn the principle I am endeavoring to sustain. He went to St. Eustatius but a few days before Admiral Rodney and the British forces made their appearance before that place. But it was proved that he went for the purpose of making a permanent settlement there. No intention to return appears to have been alleged. The recency of his establishment seems to have been the point on which his claim rested.

This case, in principle, bears on that before the court, so far only as it proves that war does not, under all circumstances, necessarily furnish a presumption that the foreigner residing in the enemy country intends to return to his 314 own. The circumstances of this *case, so far as we understand them, were opposed to the presumption that war could affect Mr. Whitehill's residence. War actually existed at the time of his removal; and had that fact been known to him, there would have been no hardship in his case. He would have voluntarily taken upon himself the enemy character at the same time that he took upon himself the Dutch character. There is reason to believe that the court considered him in equal fault with a person removing to a country known to be hostile. St. Eustatius was deeply engaged in the American trade, which, from the character of the contest, was, at that time, considered by England as cause of war, and was the fact which drew on that island the vengeance of Britain. Mr. Whitehill could have fixed himself there only for the purpose of prosecuting that trade. "He went," says Sir William Scott, "to a place which had rendered itself particularly obnoxious by its conduct in that war." This was certainly a circumstance which could not be disregarded in deciding on the probability of his intending to remain in the country in the event of war.

These are the cases which appear to me to apply most strongly to the question before this court. No one of them decides, in terms, that the property of a British subject residing abroad in time of amity, which was shipped before a knowledge of war, and captured by a British cruiser, shall depend, conclusively, on the residence of the claimant at the time of capture, or on his having, at that time, put himself in motion to change his residence. In no case which I have had an opportunity of inspecting, have I seen a dictum to this effect. The cases certainly require an intention, on the part of the subject residing and trading abroad, to return to his own country, and that this intention should be manifested by overt acts; but they do not, according to my understanding of them, prescribe any particular overt act as being exclusively admissible; nor do they render it indispensable that the overt act should, in all cases, precede the capture. If a British subject residing abroad for commercial purposes, takes decided measures, on the breaking out of war, for returning to his native country, and especially if he should actually return, his claim for the restitution of property shipped before his knowledge of *the war would, I think, [315 be favorably received in a British court of admiralty, although his actual return, or the measures proving his intention to return, were subsequent to the capture. Thus understanding the English authorities, I do not consider them as opposing the principle I have laid down.

An American citizen having merely a commercial domicile in a foreign country, is not, I think, under the British authorities, concluded, by his residence and trading in time of peace, from averring and proving an intention to change his domicile on the breaking out of war, or from availing himself of that proof in a court of admiralty. The intrinsic evidence arising from the change in his situation, produced by war, renders it extremely probable that in this new state of things he must intend to return home, and will aid in the construction of any overt act by which such intention is manifested. Dissolution of partnership, discontinuance of trade in the enemy country, a settlement of accounts, and other arrangements obviously preparatory to a change of residence, are, in my opinion, such overt acts as may, under circumstances showing them to be made in good faith, entitle the claimant to restitution.

I do not perceive the mischief or inconvenience that can result from the establishment of this principle. Its operation is confined to property shipped before a knowledge of the war. For if shipped afterwards, it is clearly liable to condemnation, unless it be protected by the principle that it is merely a withdrawing of funds. Being confined to shipments made before a knowledge of the war, the evidence of an intention to change or continue a residence in the country of the enemy, must be speedily given. A continuance of trade after the war, unless, perhaps, under very special circumstances, and for the mere purpose of closing transactions already commenced, would fix the national character and the domicile previously acquired. An immediate discontinuance of trade, and arrangements for removing, followed by actual removal within a reasonable time, unless detained by causes which might sufficiently account for not removing, would fix the intention to change the domicile, and show that the intention to return had never been abandoned; that the intention to remain always had never *been formed. It is [316 a case in which, if in any that can be imagined, justice requires that the citizen, having entirely recovered his national character by his own act, and by an act which shows that he never intended to part with it finally, should, by a species of the jus postliminii, be allowed to aver the existence of that character at the instant of capture. In the establishment of such a principle, I repeat, I can perceive no danger. In its rejection, I think I perceive much injustice. An individual whose residence abroad is certainly innocent and lawful, perhaps advantageous to his country, who never intended that residence to be permanent, or to continue in time of war, finds himself, against his will, clothed with the character of an enemy, so conclusively that not even a return to his native country can rescue from that character and from confiscation, property shipped in the time of real or supposed peace. My sense of justice revolts from such a principle.

In applying this opinion to the claimants before the court, I should be regulated by their conduct after a knowledge of the war. If they continued their residence and trade after that knowledge, at any rate after knowing that the repeal of the orders in council was not immediately followed by peace, their claim to restitution would be clearly unsustainable. If they took immediate measures for returning to this country, and have since actually returned, or have assigned sufficient reasons for not returning, their property I think may be capable of restitution. Some of the claimants would come within one description, some within the other. It would, under the opinion given by the court, be equally tedious and useless to go through their cases.

My reasoning has been applied entirely to the case of native Americans. This course has been pursued for two reasons. It presents the argument in what I think its true light; and the sentence of condemnation makes no discrimination between native and other citizens.

The claimants are natives of that country with which we are at war, who have been naturalized in the United States. It is impossible to deny that many of the strongest arguments urged to prove the probability that war must determine the native American citizen to aban- 317 *] don *the country of the enemy and return home, are inapplicable, or apply but feebly, to citizens of this description. Yet I think it is not for the United States, in such a case as this, to discriminate between them.

I will not pretend to say what distinctions may or may not exist between these two classes of citizens in a contest of a different description. But in a contest between the United States and the naturalized citizen, in a claim set up by the United States to confiscate his property, he may, I think, protect himself by any defense which would protect a native American. In the prosecution of such a claim, the United States are, I think, if I may be excused for borrowing from the common law a term peculiarly appropriate, estopped from saying that they have not placed this adopted son on a level with those born in their family.

THE MERRIMACK.

Goods purchased by British merchants before the war between the United States and Great Britain, in pursuance of orders from American citizens, shipped to the agent of the British merchants in the United States, also an American citizen, "on account and risk of an American citizen," and no circumstances of fraud or unfairness appearing in the transaction, were vested in the American citizens at the time of the shipment, and are not liable to condemnation, although the vessel sailed from England after the declaration of war was known there. Restitution.

But if the goods be purchased as above, though the accompanying invoices, bills of lading and letters be addressed by the British consignors to the American citizens for whom the purchase was made, and all concur to show the property to be in them, yet if these documents are inclosed in a letter from the consignors to their agent in the United States, though an American citizen, directing him not to deliver the goods in case of the existence of certain circumstances, nor until he should have received payment from the consignees in cash, the property in the said goods continued in the British consignors at time of capture. Condemnation.

Goods by the same ship, purchased as above, and consigned to the agent of the consignors, being an American citizen, in whose name also the bill of lading is made out, but the bill of parcels and invoice in the name of the American merchants for whom the purchase was made; the shipment also being expressed to be on their account, though the goods are spoken of in the letter of the consignors as British property; vested in the American merchants at the time of shipment.

The circumstance that the goods continue, during the whole voyage, at the risk of the shippers, is immaterial. Restitution.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland.

The following are the material facts of the case:

The ship Merrimack, owned by citizens of the United States, sailed from Liverpool for Baltimore, a few days after the declaration of war, by the United States against Great Britain, was known in that country, having on board a cargo of goods shipped by British subjects, and consigned to citizens of the United States. On the 25th of October, 1812, she was captured, in the Chesapeake Bay, between Annapolis and Baltimore, by the private armed vessel Rossie, Joshua Barney, commander.

The goods, being libeled as prize in the District *Court of Maryland, were several- [*318 ly claimed by sundry citizens of the United States.

These several claims, and the circumstances connected with them respectively, were thus stated by MARSHALL, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court:

1. William & Joseph Wilkins, merchants of Baltimore, claimed the goods contained in eleven cases and one bale marked W. J. W.

These goods were made up for them, in pursuance of their orders, before the war was known in Great Britain, by a manufacturing company, one member of which, Thomas Leich, resided in Leicester in Great Britain, and the other, Edward Harris, was an American citizen residing in the United States.

The bill of parcels was in the name of Messrs. William & Joseph Wilkins. This paper also served for an invoice, and there was no other on board for these goods.

The bill of lading was in the name of Edward Harris, who was the consignee.

The goods were accompanied by a letter from Thomas Leich to Edward Harris, dated Leicester, the 29th of July, 1812, in which he says: "With this you will receive bill of lading of 11 "cases of worsted and cotton hosiery for Messrs. "W. & J. Wilkins, Baltimore, and with in- "surance to 892*l.* 5*s.* It is a large sum, but, "from what I can learn, they are very respect- "able. Indeed, Mr. Brown, of the house of

"Chancellor & Co., came with him, and seemed "almost offended that did not send the cotton "hose he ordered before, and said he would "guarantee the amount of the worsted goods, "therefore must have offended him if did not "comply. Have not sent but about half the "cotton goods they ordered," &c. "Informed "them that we thought it necessary to secure "our property to ship all to you, as you could "prove that they were American property, by "making affidavit they are bona fide your prop-"erty. As our orders in council are repealed, hope "your government will be amicably inclined as 319] "well, and *that trade will be on regular "footing again, but for fear there should be "some other points in dispute, I shall send you, "and our friends through your hands, all the "goods prepared for your market which you'll "perceive is very large." "Hope you will ap-"prove of my sending all, and as there may "have been some alterations in some of your "friends, shipping them to you gives the power "of keeping back to you."

There was also on board a letter dated Leicester, 22d July, 1812, signed Harris, Leich & Co., and addressed to Messrs. Wm. & Joseph Wilkins, merchants of Baltimore, in which they say: "The repeal of the orders in council hav-"ing been agreed on by our government, we "have availed ourselves of the opportunity of "sending the greater part of your spring and "fall orders," &c. "As we are not certain that "your government will protect British prop-"erty, we have thought it right to ship all ours "under cover to Mr. Harris, who can claim as "his own bona fide property, and he, being a "citizen of the United States, thought proper "to use every precaution, having received some "unpleasant accounts about your government "having agreed on war with this country, which "we hope will not be the case."

2. M'Kean & Woodland, citizens of the United States, claim sundry parcels of goods, part of the same cargo, as their property.

These goods were purchased by Baily, Eaton & Brown, merchants of Sheffield, in pursuance of orders from the claimants. They were shipped to Robert Holladay, also an American citizen. The bill of lading was to Robert Holladay, "on account and risk of an American citizen." The invoice was also headed to Robert Holladay.

A letter from Baily, Eaton & Brown to Samuel M'Kean, dated 11th July, 1812, says: "A few days ago we received a letter from Mr. "Rogerson, of New York, informing us that "the partnership of Messrs. M'Kean & "Woodland was dissolved, but he does not say "whether you or Mr. Woodland continue the "the business, or whether both of you decline it. "We have purchased about £3,000 sterling of 320] "goods by order of *the late firm, and "on their account, most of which have been "purchased and paid for by us, from fifteen to "eighteen months ago, and have been on our "hands waiting for shipment. We have this "day given orders to our shipper at Liverpool "to put them on board a good American vessel "sailing for your port with a British license, "but from the uncertainty we are in respect-"ing the particulars of your dissolution of "partnership, and, in fact, not knowing "whether to consign them to you or Mr. "Woodland, we have finally concluded to "consign them to Mr. Holladay, with whom "you will be pleased to make the necessary ar-"rangements respecting them." "We have "addressed the invoice to Mr. Holladay to "your care; and directly on receiving it, if he "should not be in Baltimore, you will please "advise him of its arrival."

The residue of the letter contains their reasons for hoping that Mr. M'Kean will not insist on the usual credit, but will remit immediately on receiving the goods. This request is founded on their having been so long in advance for the purchase of them.

Messrs. Baily, Eaton & Brown addressed a letter to Mr. Holladay, dated the 10th of July, 1812, in which they say: "Inclosed you will "receive invoices of sundry goods for Messrs. "M'Kean & Woodland, which complete "their orders." They then assign the same reason for shipping the goods to Mr. Holladay that is given in their letter to Mr. M'Kean; and, after directing him to arrange with Mr. M'Kean, add: "We cannot view this consignment at all "in the light of an intercepted shipment com-"ing within the meaning of the articles of "agreement between you and us." This letter also contained a proposition for immediate remittance, founded on the time which had elapsed since the goods were purchased. This proposition, they say, is made to all their friends in the United States, and they hope none will refuse to accede to it. "But," they add, "in thus acting, we have left the "matter to the free and unbiassed will of our "friends, and they are certainly upon honor."

3. Messrs. Kimmel & Albert, merchants of Baltimore, claimed seven packages of goods on board the *Merrimack, which were [321 purchased, in pursuance of their orders, by Baily, Eaton & Baily. The invoice, bill of lading, and letters, addressed (one by the consignors and the other by the shipper, who was their agent) to Messrs. Kimmel & Albert, concur in showing property in the claimants. But all these documents and letters are inclosed in a letter of the 5th of August, 1812, written by Baily, Eaton & Baily to Samuel M'Kean. In this letter the writer refers to a former letter of the 3d of July, in which they informed Mr. M'Kean that they should, on the recommendation of their general agent, Mr. Hollaway, inclose their invoices and bills of lading for the adjacent country to him, and requested him to make inquiries into the circumstances of their correspondents, and be regulated, as to putting the letters, &c., into the post-office so as to reach the persons to whom they might be addressed, by the result of those inquiries. Messrs. Baily, Eaton & Baily indulge the hope that the repeal of the British orders in council will restore peace between the two countries, in which event M'Kean is still to be governed by their letter of the 3d of July. "But," they add, "if, when you receive our "invoices and bills of lading, a state of war "should really continue, it will be proper not "to deliver these goods until you have received "the amount of the invoices from the consign-"ees, in cash."

4. John H. Browning & Co. were also claimants of part of the cargo.

This claim stood on precisely the same principles with that of Kimmel & Albert. The documents given in evidence were, in effect, the same, and were inclosed in the same letter from Baily, Eaton & Baily to Samuel M'Kean.

It was contended by the captors, in the District Court, that, from the papers and letters on board, it appeared that the goods were not sold and delivered in England, so as to vest the property in the claimants, but were sent to the agents of the shippers in the United States, to be delivered or not, according to their discretion; consequently, that the property was not changed, and the goods, therefore, were liable to capture as British property.

322*] *Restitution was decreed in the District Court, and the decree was affirmed in the Circuit Court. An appeal was taken to this court, where the captors pray condemnation on the same grounds as in the courts below.

Harper, for the appellants,

After stating the facts of the case, argued that the claims of the captors to the several parts of the cargo in question all rested on the same principle, viz.: That no transfer of the property had taken place at the time of the capture. The shippers were British subjects.

1st. As to the property claimed by William & Joseph Wilkins.

It appears, from the evidence introduced into this part of the cause, that the goods were not to be delivered to the claimants until they had come first to the hands of the shippers' agent, who was to decide upon the solvency of W. & J. Wilkins, and to regulate himself accordingly, with regard to the delivery of the goods. He even had a power, under certain circumstances, to make them his own. W. & J. Wilkins were also to have an option, either to take the goods or not. But a more powerful argument than either is, that the shippers themselves, in their letters both to the consignee and the claimants, denominate these goods British property, and express their apprehensions that the American government will not protect it. Again, if these goods had been lost at sea, they could not have been charged to the Messrs. Wilkins, as goods sold and delivered. The loss would clearly have been the loss of the shippers. The property in this part of the cargo cannot, therefore, be considered as having been vested in W. & J. Wilkins. It was clearly in the British shippers, both at the time of shipment and at the time of capture. The claim of the Messrs. Wilkins ought, therefore, to be rejected.

2d. As to the claim of M'Kean & Woodland, Harper stated the facts, and prayed condemnation on the general principle that the property had not been transferred.

3d and 4th. In opposing the respective claims 323*] of *Kimmel & Albert, and of John H. Browning & Co., the counsel for the captors argued on nearly the same grounds as in the case of W. & J. Wilkins; and, in addition thereto, he urged the condition of payment which was annexed to these two cases, and which was to be performed before the delivery of the goods to the claimants.

He also made a second point in regard to all the claims, viz.: That, admitting the goods to have been the property of American citizens, yet, since the declaration of war was known in Liverpool at the time of the shipment, the claimants are to be considered as having been engaged in a hostile trade, which gives the property an enemy character, and subjects it to condemnation. The shippers, on this supposition, must be looked upon as the agents of the claimants, and the acts of agents are, in law, the acts of their principals.

Pinkney, contra, for the claimants.

If the title of the claimants be good in equity it is sufficient; but it is good at law as well as in equity.

In examining the several claims, I shall follow the order which has been pursued by the counsel for the captors.

First, as to the claim of W. & J. Wilkins. The invoice and bill of parcels show the purchase by the claimants. The bill of parcels is always good evidence, in an action on a policy, to show interest. The invoice corresponds with the bill of parcels, and is not contradicted by the bill of lading. Leich's letter to Harris speaks of the goods as being "for Messrs. W. & J. Wilkins." These circumstances are strongly in our favor. It has been urged, however, on the other side, that the property of the goods could not have been in the claimants at the time of capture, because, 1st. There was a condition of payment, without complying with which the goods were not to be delivered; and, 2d. Because there was a power vested in Harris to keep back the property, in case of the insolvency of the Wilkins's. The first objection is founded on an error in fact. The objection, if applicable to the claimants of the other parts *of the cargo, is not so [324 here. It appears, indeed, in some part of the evidence, that an inducement to prompt payment was held out to the Wilkins's, viz., an offer to allow seven per cent. discount for prompt payment; but there was no express condition of payment. The second objection, viz., that Harris was empowered to keep back the goods, in case of the insolvency of the claimants, is easily answered. Insolvency of the parties was the sole ground on which Harris could retain the goods; but this is only the same power which the shipper himself would have had by the general law in maritime cases, if he had consigned the goods directly to the Wilkins's. It is the general law, in case of the insolvency of the consignee, that the shipper may stop the goods in transitu in itinere, although purchased in England, if the purchase was on credit. The intervention of Harris, in this case, merely gives a facility to the right which the shippers before possessed. (4 Rob., 21, 25, The Josephine.)

It is also urged that the shippers themselves, in their letters, have denominated the goods in question British property, and expressed an apprehension that it would not be protected by the American government, and have therefore suggested to Harris that he could swear they were his. This objection possesses little weight. A mere attempt to conceal belligerent property only deprives the party of the benefit of further proof, but is not a ground of confiscation. (4 Rob., 161, 195, The Madonna delle Gracie; Gregory's case.)

2d. As to the claim of M'Keen & Woodland. Two objections to this claim, arising from the letter of Baily, Eaton & Brown to M'Kean, have been urged by the captors.

1st. The consignment to Holladay.

2d. The expectation of the shippers that M'Kean & Woodland would pay cash.

The consignment to Holladay needs no farther explanation than is to be found in the letter which states the fact. The shippers, having heard that the partnership of M'Kean & Woodland was dissolved, were uncertain to which of them the consignment ought to be 325] made, and *therefore determined to consign the goods to Holladay. But the property vested in M'Kean & Woodland, notwithstanding this intermediate consignment. In a court of prize, such intermediate consignment is not considered as altering, in any degree, the nature of the case.

2d. Though the letter from the shippers requests an immediate cash payment, there is no express condition to that effect: there is merely an appeal to the justice and honor of the claimants.

An additional proof that the property was in the claimants is, that it was insured for them, and not for the shippers.

It appears that all the bills of lading, except that for W. & J. Wilkins, express the shipments to have been made on account and risk of American citizens generally. The reason for this general mode of expression was the uncertainty of the shippers respecting the dissolution of the partnership.

3d and 4th. We now come to the claims of Kimmel & Albert; and Browning & Co., which, depending on precisely the same principle, will be examined together.

In these two cases only is there an absolute condition of payment. But the goods had been regularly ordered by the claimants long before they were shipped. They were finally shipped for them, and in pursuance of their orders. They were delivered to the master of a general ship. The invoice, bill of lading and letters, all concur in showing property in the claimants. The legal property vested in them by the delivery of the goods to the master. The shipper, having delivered them to the master, was functus officio, and could not thereafter stop the goods on any ground but the insolvency of the consignee, which is the only case of stoppage in transitu authorized by the common law or the law maritime. (1 Rob., 181, 219, The Aurora; Conversation between Sir W. Scott and Dr. Lawrence; 6 Rob., 325, 6, 7, The Constantia.)

Again. Can a captor devest the eventual rights of citizens, or does he take the property subject to the conditions to which it would be subject in the hands of the consignor or his agent? We contend for the latter doctrine. 326] *The rights of the citizen become absolute upon his complying with those conditions. In the present case, if the goods had arrived at their port of destination without capture, the title to them would have become absolute in Kimmel & Albert, upon payment to the consignor of the amount required. And, as the captor, according to our doctrine, does but stand in the place of the consignor, we contend that the property will become equally absolute in the claimants upon making the same payment to him.

We do not admit the doctrine that property cannot, upon the high seas, pass in transitu, so as to defeat the captors. Suppose it had been agreed that the property should change after it had passed a certain degree of longitude; would not the agreement be carried into effect, upon that degree of longitude being passed? But it is not now necessary to contend for this doctrine, because the property in the present case was vested in the claimants, upon the shipment, liable, however, to be devested upon a condition.

There is manifest inconsistency in the English prize law. A belligerent lien will be condemned, but a neutral lien will not be protected; neutral property may become belligerent in transitu, but belligerent property cannot become neutral. This court will adopt the reason of the rule, but not the rule itself.

Harper, in reply.

In this case there was no transfer of either an equitable or legal right. In the case of W. & J. Wilkins, the delivery of the goods was only to Harris; or to the master of the ship, who, by undertaking to deliver them to Harris, became his agent, and not the agent of the Wilkins's. So with regard to the invoice, bill of lading, and bill of parcels; they were all delivered, not to the Wilkins's, but to Harris or his agent, the master. No evidence of the title of W. & J. Wilkins was put in a course to reach them, but through the agency of Harris, who was not to deliver it at all, but in a certain event. The goods, although purchased by order of the claimants, were not delivered to them. The claimants could not have maintained an action for them, either at law or in equity.

*M'Kean & Woodland's case is still [327 stronger against them. The business of that concern was not continued by any person. They have become insolvent. Holladay has the absolute control over the goods. He was to make arrangements with the claimants or with M'Kean alone, and was to require cash.

Saturday, March 12th. Absent—LIVINGSTON, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts relating to the several claims in this case, delivered the following opinion of the court, as to the claims of M'Kean & Woodland, Kimmel & Albert, and John H. Browning & Co.:

1. As to the claim of M'Kean & Woodland.

The question of property, in this case, depends on certain letters written by Baily, Eaton & Brown, which were found on board the captured vessel. A letter of the 11th of July, 1812, addressed to Samuel M'Kean, shows in the clearest manner that the property in dispute was purchased and shipped for M'Kean & Woodland, in pursuance of their orders; and accounts for assigning it to Mr. Holladay.

There is nothing in the cause which can throw the slightest suspicion on the fairness of this transaction. It unquestionably is, what, on the face of these letters, it purports to be, a purchase for M'Kean & Woodland, made in pursuance of their orders, and shipped for them to Robert Holladay, because, in the moment of shipment, information was received that their partnership was dissolved, and the shipper had no instructions in what manner to direct to them. In this situation, he considered himself as acting most certainly for their advantage by addressing the goods to an agent residing in the same town with M'Kean & Woodland, who should receive them to their use. In such a case, the court is of opinion that the property was vested in M'Kean & Woodland, and is, consequently, not liable to condemnation as enemy property.

The sentence is affirmed.

328*] *2. As to the claim of Kimmel & Albert.

From their letter it is appareut that, in the event of war, Baily, Eaton & Baily, reserved to themselves that power which ownership gives over goods, and instructed their agent, M'Kean, in what manner that power was to be exercised. There being no letter addressed to Kimmel & Albert, but under cover to M'Kean, it is apparent that they were to know nothing of the shipment, unless, in the opinion of M'Kean, it should be prudent to make the communication; and, even then, the property was to become theirs, not under the original contract, but under a new contract to be made with M'Kean. The dclivery on board the ship was a delivery to M'Kean, not absolutely for Kimmel & Albert, but for them provided they acceded to new and distinct propositions made by Baily, Eaton & Baily. In such a case, no change of property could take place till Kimmel & Albert should accede to these new propositions; and the capture having taken place before the contract was complete, the goods must be considered as enemy property.

The sentence is reversed, and the claim dismissed.

3. The claim of John H. Browning & Co.

This claim stands on precisely the same principles with that of Kimmel & Albert. The documentary evidence is in effect the same, and was inclosed in the same letter from Baily, Eaton & Baily to Samuel M'Kean. The claim therefore must be dismissed.

The sentence is reversed and the claim dismissed.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, as to the claim of W. & J. Wilkins, as follows:

The points of distinction between this case and that of M'Kean & Woodland, unfavorable to these claimants, are the following:

1. That Harris, the direct consignee, had a control given him over the goods, which au-

329*] thorized him, had *he thought proper, to refuse to deliver them over to the Wilkins's.

2. That Harris had also a power, uuder certain circumstances, to make them his own.

3. That, in the letters both to the Wilkins's and Harris, the consignor alleges as his reason for making the shipment through Harris, his fears that this government would not protect British property; thereby, as is contended, acknowledging this property to be British.

On the other hand, it is a circumstance favorable to this claim, that the original bills of parcels were made directly to the claimants, and were sent along with the shipmcnt as a substitute for an invoice.

It is assumed as a postulate, that a direct consignment on account of the consignee, made in pursuance of his orders, is not subject to condemnation as prize of war; and that it is immaterial whether it be purchased for cash or credit; or insured in the enemy's country or elsewhere.

It will, then, be enough to show that every beneficial interest which such a shipment would vest in the consignee was vested in the claimants in this case.

The first difficulty arises from the circumstance that the bill of lading was made out to Harris, and not to the Wilkins's, whereby the captain of the ship became bound to deliver them to Harris or his assigns.

Upon a fair view of the whole transaction, this distinction will be found rather to be formal than real; and that it produces no difference in the state of right between these parties.

The interest vested in the consignee by the delivery to the captain is not absolute to all purposes. So far as relates to the right of stoppage in transitu, it continues subject to the control of the consignor, and may be reduced by him into possession, before actual delivery; or the authority of the captain to deliver them *according to the original bills of lading, [330 may be countermanded, and another destination given them.

Upon comparing all the circumstances of this case, it will be found that the trausaction was so arranged as to produce no other change in the rights of the parties than to put it in Harris's power to exercise this right of stoppage in transitu, in case of the insolvency of the Wilkins's.

The bill of lading is made out to Harris, which gave him the right to demand the goods of the captain.

But the invoice, which has the additional strength of a bill of parcels, is made out to the claimants, which gave them the right to demand the goods of Harris.

Both in the letter to Harris and to the Wilkins's, the shipment is declared to be ou account of the latter; and, in the letter to the former, the shipper goes into a detail of his reasons for giving the claimants so large a credit.

Thus these papers, taken together, place the interest of the claimants on the same footing as if the bill of lading had been made out to Harris for the use of the Wilkins's; and in that case, there could have been little doubt that the claim must be sustained.

If the invoice, although made out to the claimants, had been inclosed to the direct consignee, it would have furuished a strong argument in favor of the captor. But here, the evidence of right is placed in the claimant's own hands; thereby acknowledging their right iu the goods shipped, and furnishiug them with the means of asserting it. Thus the shipper could never have denied the rights of the claimants in this case; for he had furnished the most direct and conclusive evidence against himself.

But it is asserted that Harris had it in his power to make these goods his own, in defiance of the will of the claimants.

If this were the fact, it would only show that, in *either view of the alternative, [331 it was a shipment on American account, and that the shipper had parted with all his interest.

But the fact is not so; aud in answering this argument, we answer the remaining one also.

The shipper knew what he was about. War was already probably declared, and he was aware of the crash of mercantile credit which generally follows on such an event. He also knew that, in case of asserting his right of stoppage in transitu, the property reverted and became British; in which case, as he expresses himself, the property might be subjected to seizure, as enemy's property.

With these considerations on his mind, he makes out the bill of lading to Harris, and informs him that his object is to enable him to keep the goods back in case of an alteration in the circumstances of the claimants; and in this case only is the hint given him that he may claim them as his own. It is contended, that he acknowledges, in his letter to the claimants, that the property is British. But this is an error in fact. It was necessary to assign some reason or some excuse for not having the bills of lading made out to the claimants themselves. And for this reason, he urges an apprehension that our government would not protect British property. But this reason could only be applicable in the event of a stoppage in transitu; as a direct shipment to the claimants would have left no room for such an apprehension. In the letter, also, to Harris, it is said, is contained an acknowledgment that the property is British. This, also, is founded in mistake; for the letter to Harris only communicates the reason which had been assigned in the other letter, for having the bill of lading made out as it was. But suppose the passage in the letter to the claimants, on this subject, had been full and explicit to the declaration of an opinion that the property continued British, although shipped on American account; yet this would have been but an expression of an erroneous opinion, and certainly ought not, as far as the interests of the claimants are concerned, to have an influence on the decision of this court. But it is asserted that the goods continued, on the whole 332] voyage, at the risk of *the shippers. This may be true, and yet it does not prove enough. Had the shipment been direct to the claimants, and insurance omitted contrary to order or custom, the shippers would have been equally liable, and yet the property would not have been subject to capture. It is enough for the purposes of the claimants that the property in the goods had been transferred to them, independently of the control of the shipper or his agent, except so far as the right to stop in transitu interfered. And such was the situation of the rights of the parties in this case. The goods ordered by the claimants were shipped to an agent for their use, subject only to a right which unquestionably, under any circumstances, existed in the shippers. In their letter to the claimants they inclose a bill of parcels, by way of invoice, containing a positive acknowledgment of the sale to them; and the letter itself, as well as that to Harris, speaks of the goods expressly as their goods. The immediate consignee could, therefore, only be considered as the bailee of the claimants. Nor does it appear that a tender of the money would have been necessary to entitle them to receive the goods of Harris, as, in the letter to Harris, it is acknowledged to be a sale on credit, and particular discounts offered as an inducement for an early payment.

Indeed, there are words in the letter to the direct consignee, which amount to a positive declaration that the shipments were not on his account nor on that of the shippers, but for the use and benefit of others. "I shall send you, and our friends through your hands, all the goods prepared for your market." By connecting these words with the bills of lading, the result is that, although the direct consignee was entitled to demand the goods of the captain, yet it was not to his own use, but to the use of the several persons on whose account they were shipped.

STORY, J., delivered the following separate opinion as to the claim of W. & J. Wilkins:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the court, just delivered, as to the claim of Messrs. Wilkins. It is true that the goods were purchased pursuant to the orders of Messrs. Wilkins; but I do not think that the *property, by [333 the mere purchase, became vested in them; and the usage and course of trade is generally otherwise. The purchase was made with the money of the shipper; and, until a delivery, actual or constructive, to the Messrs. Wilkins, the propriety thereof remained completely in the shipper. The goods were also shipped as the property of the shipper, consigned to the agent of the shipper, and not to the agent of the Messrs. Wilkins, to be delivered only in case of the consignee's being satisfied of their perfect solvency. It is true that the bill of lading purports that the goods are shipped on account and risk of the consignee; but the confidential letters explain the transaction, and show that the shipment was so made as a cover against belligerent risks; and that the property was not intended to be changed from the British shipper, in its transit. The delivery, then, of the goods on board of a general ship, was no delivery to the Messrs. Wilkins. It was not even a delivery which vested the property of the goods in the consignee. The legal property and possession thereof still remained in the shippers; and if the goods had actually come to the hands of Mr. Harris, his possession would have been but a continuation of the possession of the shipper. In contemplation of law, the goods were as much under the control and possession of the shipper as if he had been on board the vessel during the voyage, or had shipped them in his own name. If they had been lost during the voyage, the loss would have been his. He had not a mere right of stoppage in transitu in case of insolvency, for that can be exercised only where the property by the shipment is vested in the consignee for his own use; but he had a perfect right of countermand in all cases whatever. He might sell the property, give it a new direction, control its delivery, and, indeed, exercise all the rights of full dominion and propriety. It seems to me, that if the Messrs. Wilkins had neither a jus ad rem nor a jus in re, and the latter only is recognized in prize courts, they could only, by subsequent acts, overreach the legal rights of the captors. At the time of the shipment and capture it was, in my view, enemy property liable to condemnation, having no neutral or American onus attached to it. It was subject to the legal claims of the creditors of the shipper; and nothing existed in the Messrs. Wilkins but a mere spes occupandi, or, as the common law phrases it, a 334] mere possibility, which attached *neither to the substance nor the form of the thing. Upon what ground, then, if I am right as to the ownership of the goods, can the claim be maintained? The right of capture acts upon the proprietary interest of the thing captured, at the time of capture. It is not affected by the secret liens or private engagements of the parties. It repudiates even the strong claim of a bottomry bond, because it is not a jus in re. Can, then, a mere possibility be of more consideration in a court of prize? The absence of all authority to this effect, and the strong and emphatic language of all the cases as to secret liens, speak as powerfully as the most direct and pointed decisions against it.

There is a case cited by the court in The Aurora (4 Rob., 218) where property was shipped by a merchant in Holland to A, a person in America, by order of B, and per account of B, but with directions to A not to deliver it unless satisfaction should be given for the payment; and it was held as good prize on the ground that the property still remained in the enemy shipper. This case I think strongly in point; and the manner in which Lawrence attempted to distinguish it from the case then on trial, shows a full concurrence in its correctness. The reasoning of the court in The Aurora itself, and in The Marianna (6 Rob., 22), are also illustrative of the general doctrine.

On the whole, I consider that, by the doctrine of the common and the prize law, these goods were, at the time of capture, enemy property; and that the claim of the Messrs. Wilkins ought to be rejected; and in this opinion I have the concurrence of two[1] of my brethren.

Monday, March 14th. Harper suggested diminution of the record in the case of W. & J. Wilkins, and prayed the court to grant a writ of certiorari to the court below; but the court refused, the case having been argued and decided.

335*] *THE FRANCES, BOYER, MASTER.

(THOMPSON ET AL. CLAIMANTS.)

A naturalized citizen, who, in time of peace, returns to his native country for the purpose of trade, but with the intention of returning again to his adopted country, continuing in the former a year after the knowledge of the existence of war between the two countries, for the purpose of winding up a complicated business, and engaging in no new commercial transactions whatever with the enemy, and actually returning to his adopted country in a little more than a year after his first knowledge of the war, is to be considered as having gained a domicile in his native country—and his goods, captured after the war, liable to condemnation. Goods appearing by the ship's papers to be a consignment from alien enemies to American merchants, condemned in toto as prize, although further proof was offered that American merchants were jointly interested, and that they had a lien upon the goods, in consequence of advances made by them.

Further proof on these points refused.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

The facts were as follow:

War was declared by the United States against Great Britain on the 18th of June, 1812.

The ship Frances, having on board a cargo of goods of British manufacture, consigned to various persons in the United States, sailed from Greenoch, in Scotland, on the 19th of July, in the same year, for New York. On the 28th day of August following, she was captured by the Yankee privateer, and carried into the District of Rhode Island, where the cargo was libeled as enemy property.

Robert and James Thompson and William Steele, naturalized citizens of the United States, claimed a considerable part of this cargo as their own property; and also claimed 130 packages, another part of the same cargo, as being owned by them jointly with British subjects, or as having a lien upon the property in consequence of advances made upon the consignment.

These goods were all consigned by James Thompson, a naturalized citizen of the United States, residing in Scotland, to William Steele, a citizen of the United States, carrying on the business of the concern in New York.

All the goods claimed, except the 130 packages, were incontestibly the property of the claimants; and, on the trial, restoration of two-thirds was decreed to Robert Thompson and William Steele, residents in the United States; in which decree the captors acquiesced. The remaining third, which belonged to James Thompson, who resided in Scotland, was condemned; and from this sentence he has appealed to this court.

*The 130 packages were also con- [336 demned as enemy property; and from this sentence the claimants have appealed to this court; but, having received more full information than they originally possessed respecting the ownership of these goods, they now abandon their claim as to this property, except as to 66 boxes, of which they still claim to hold a moiety; the other moiety being acknowledged to be the property of Messrs. Dalgleish & Frame, British subjects.

A claim to all the above-mentioned goods was also interposed by the United States, for a violation of the non-intercourse laws; which claim was rejected in the Circuit Court, and an appeal taken to the Supreme Court.

James Thompson, as appeared from the evidence, was a native of Scotland, and came to the United States in the year 1793, where he resided, carrying on trade and commerce, till the year 1801. In 1797 he was naturalized. In the year 1801 he went to France, on the commercial business of his house, and, some time afterwards, passed over to England, where he was employed in making purchases for and shipments to his house. In the year 1803 he settled in Glasgow, where he continued doing that part of the business of the partnership which was to be transacted in Great Britain, until the declaration of war. After the knowledge of that event, he transacted no commercial business whatever, and was exclusively employed in arranging his affairs in such manner as would enable him to return to the United States. This being accomplished, he, in August, 1813, engaged a passage on board the cartel ship the Robert Burns, about to sail from Liverpool to New York, but was stopped by the orders of government. He then passed over to Ireland, and privately embarked for the United States, where he arrived in November last. Several affidavits were taken to show that he always considered the United States as his permanent place of residence, and that he uniformly expressed his determination to return. His letters manifested the same intention. It also appeared that his business was complicated, and required his attention after he ceased to engage in new adventures; but it did not appear that he had performed any act which could 337 *]be considered as *commencing to return, until August 1813, when he engaged a passage on board the Robert Burns.

As to the 66 boxes of merchandise, the moiety of which was still claimed by Robert & James Thompson and William Steele, they prayed, on bringing up the cause to this court, to be allowed to make further proof of their property in the said goods; and offered, as further proof, the affidavit of James Thompson that they were the joint property of the house of Dalgleish & Frame and of Messrs. Thompsons & Steele, under a contract made by two letters which were exhibited, and which he said were original. In addition to this, James Thompson swore that he gave his bill for the moiety of these goods, which bill he had paid, and that he was prevented from notifying this contract to his partners in his letter to them, by the hurry produced by the shipment. The claimants offered, also, the affidavit of William Steele, stating that, some time after the papers of the ship Frances were opened, he received the invoice and letters annexed to his affidavit in an envelope with some other papers. That the letters were in the handwriting of John Frame and James Thompson. That, before he received them, he was convinced, from the marks, that the goods in the invoice were, in some respects, the joint property of his house and of Dalgleish & Frame; which fact he stated to the agents of the captors as well as the judge of the Circuit Court, at the trial in June, 1813; and that James Thompson was in the habit of taking goods on joint account from houses in Scotland, and sending them to the house in America, without specifying whether they were on joint account or on commission.

The letters referred to were, one from Dalgleish & Frame, dated Glasgow, 27th June, 1812, and addressed to Mr. James Thompson, Glasgow, in which they say the goods were printed in consequence of his orders; and express a hope that he will take the whole contained in the invoice; or, if not, that he will allow them to go to his house on joint account. The other was a letter addressed to Messrs. Dalgleish & Frame, signed James Thompson, and dated Glasgow, 1st July, 1812, in which he acknowledges the receipt of their letter of the 27th of June, 1812, and says, that as there are a *great many more goods in the invoice [338 than he had ordered, and as he did not wish to take so large a quantity, he would send them on joint account.

The invoice, or rather bill of parcels, is dated Glasgow, 27th of June, 1812, and was headed "Messrs. R. & J. Thompson and W. Steele bought of Dalgleish & Frame."

The affidavit of John Frame, taken in Glasgow, was also exhibited, in which he swears that the goods are the joint property of Messrs. R. & J. Thompson and Wm. Steele and of Dalgleish & Frame.

Such was the further proof offered.

In the Frances were two letters from James Thompson to Wm. Steele. The first was dated Glasgow, July 13th, 1812, in which he says: "I annex a list of goods consigned by the Frances. These consignments are the safest and surest trade for us, and it was from this conviction that I allowed of so many consignments." In the annexed list of consignments, referred to in the foregoing letter, were the goods shipped by Messrs. Dalgleish & Frame. In this letter he writes on the business of the house, speaks of the consignments generally, recommends that the goods should be promptly sold at the market price, and accounts of sales returned; but makes no allusion to any interest in the goods of Dalgleish & Frame.

Irving, for appellants, after stating the facts of the case, and the claim of Robert & James Thompson and William Steele, contended,

That British property shipped on board an American vessel, before a knowledge of the war, was not liable to capture, either under the laws of the United States or the President's instructions to the commanders of privateers. That the commissions issued by the President to the private armed vessels of the United States, only authorized them to seize, 1st. British vessels and the property found on board; 2d. All property liable to capture by the laws of war; and that the property, in the present case, did not come under either of these *descriptions. [339 (Acts of Congress of June 18th, and June 26th, 1812, Laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 227 and 238. See, also, the instructions of the President to the private armed vessels of the United States.)

Enemys' property in possession of the nation

declaring war, at the time of the declaration, is not liable to seizure as prize of war; it can only be sequestered by municipal regulation. The court having jurisdiction in cases of this kind, sits as a municipal, not as a prize court. (1 Rob., 238, The Rebeckah; 5 Rob., 207, The Boedes Lust; 2 Azuni, 224.)

The property, in the present case, is to be considered as committed to the public faith. The circumstances under which it was shipped, and afterwards sailed, were very peculiar. The non-intercourse act and the several acts supplementary thereto, the revocation of the French decrees, the President's proclamation of 2d November, 1810, the letter of the American Secretary of State (Mr. Monroe) to Mr. Foster, the British minister, under date of July 26th, 1811, the revocation of the British orders in council, and the assurances of Mr. Russel, the American Charge d'Affaires in Great Britain, presented a state of things on which the British merchants, and the American merchants in Great Britain, confidently relied for the security of their property shipped, under these circumstances, to the United States.

This doctrine, that the property of an enemy, found in the country at the breaking out of a war, is under the safeguard of a public faith, is a principle of the common law. In England, property in this situation would not be condemned. Enemy goods which came down the Baltic, and were landed in England before a knowledge of the war, have been there held to be safe. Magna Charta itself recognizes the principle. By the rule of reciprocity, therefore, protection ought to be extended by the American government to the property now in dispute.

It is said that we have not a standing in court, that James Thompson is an alien enemy, and that an alien enemy cannot support a claim 340] of this kind. But we *say that, admitting James Thompson to be an alien enemy, his agent in this country may have a standing in court, if the property in question be divested of its hostile character, which we contend is the case here. (5 Rob., Nostra Madonna delle Gracie; 6 Rob., 1; Id., 21, The Marianne; 2 Rob., 135, The Packet de Bilboa.)

But if these goods be hostile property, and the claimants, on that account, have no right to them, still, we contend, the captors cannot support their claim. The property of the goods, if not in the claimants, is in the United States, and liable to seizure under the non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809; which act is neither repealed by nor merged in the act declaring war, nor any other act. (Laws U. S., vol. 9, p. 243, § 5, § 8, and § 18 of the act.) The 3d sect. of the prize act (Laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 239), requires that all the laws of the United States, then in force, be observed by the owners, officers and crews of privateers. The non-intercourse act was one of the laws of the United States then in force. The second set of instructions to the privateers of the United States (issued 26th August, 1812), interdicts the capture of American vessels having on board British goods. They are to be seized by the collectors of the respective ports. The United States have always asserted their prior right to such property. (See the circular letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, of October 16th, 1812.) They have chosen to municipalize it—to reserve it to themselves. Congress has resisted every attempt to the repeal of the non-intercourse. The act of July 13th, 1813 (Laws U. S., vol. 12, p. 14), shows that the United States have not relinquished their claim to property situated like that now in dispute. Their relinquishment only goes to such property as should be condemned as prize of war.

As to the first instructions of the President, they only authorize the private armed vessels of the United States to capture enemy property on board neutral or hostile vessels, and not that found on board American vessels returning to the United States, flying before the storm of war, and seeking the protection of their country. See the circular letter of Mr. Secretary Gallatin, of 26th August, 1812. The second set of instructions, before referred to, prohibit the capture of American vessels returning to the United States with British property shipped *after the repeal of the orders in coun- [341 cil, and before the declaration of war was known in England. These instructions were operative as soon as issued, and were the law for all the privateers of the United States. They made a cessation of hostilities as to the property above described; which, if thereafter captured by a privateer, would be restored to the owners. The captors would only be relieved from the payment of damages and costs. (2 Azuni, 229, 230, 355, 263; 2 Dallas, 40, Bain v. Schr. Speedwell; 1 Rob., 154, The Mentor.)

We would now, on behalf of the claimants, move the court to allow us further proof as to the ownership of the property. We wish to show that the goods are not, in truth, consigned property, but that one moiety belongs to the claimants. We wish to explain the papers which the captors have considered as proving the property in question to be hostile. That we have a right to make this explanation, we refer the court to the following cases: 6 Rob., 3; Id., 132, W. and J. Bell's case; 4 Rob., 161, Madonna delle Gracie; Id., 21, The Josephine; 3 Rob., 268, The Sarah That further proof may be allowed in an appellate court, see 1 Rob., Am. Ed., p. 7; Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's statement of the general principles of proceeding in the admiralty.

Dexter, contra,

Said that the motion, on behalf of the claimants for further proof, was entirely unexpected —that there was nothing for them to found such a prayer upon; that the claim to the 130 packages was ambiguous, the ground upon which it was made being alternative, viz., either that the goods were shipped on joint account, or that the claimants have an equitable lien on them, on account of advances made on the consignment.

That these 130 packages were wholly British property is clear from the papers exhibited, they were consigned by British merchants to the claimants, with orders to sell, and remit the proceeds.

The decision as to the residue of the property in dispute, viz., the third claimed by James Thompson, depends upon his national character. That this is hostile is *evident [342 from the decision in the case of the Venus (ante p. 253), to which decision, and the argument on behalf of the captors in that case, we beg leave to refer the court.

To return, then, to the 130 packages. It being clear that they were British property, the only question is, whether such property is liable to condemnation as prize of war.

The case, as stated and argued upon by the captors, is not justified by the facts; the real state of the case is materially different. The Frances was captured, not in port, but on the high seas. She did not enter the port upon the faith of the nations, but was brought in as prize.

The counsel for the claimants, admitting the goods now in dispute to be British property, has said that American property similarly situated would not be condemned in England; and that therefore, by the rule of reciprocity, protection ought to be extended by the American government to these goods. But even the rule of reciprocity, if it were one which this court could enforce, would not avail the claimants in the present case; for the British government do not themselves respect the rule. They have captured and condemned our vessels sailing towards England, though ignorant of the war.

The declaration of war is expressed in terms as general as possible. The instructions of the President to the privateers of the United States give them a general authority to capture all property liable to capture by the laws of war.

The public faith was not pledged so as to protect this vessel. If it was pledged to repeal the non-intercourse law, there was no pledge that war should not be declared; and we claim condemnation under the declaration of war.

As to the President's instructions of 26th August, it appears that they were issued only two days previous to the capture of the Frances. The captors, consequently, had no notice of their existence. They sailed with instructions authorizing this capture; and we contend 343] *that the new instructions were no instructions to these captors, until they had received notice of their being in force.

It has been said, on the part of the appellants, that if their claim is rejected, the United States, and not the captors, will be entitled to the property. We reply that the United States have now abandoned their claim; so that the property, if condemned, must be condemned to the captors.

Harper, for appellants.

The reasons on which we ground our prayer for further proof are the following:

1st. Certain bales of carpeting appear, by the invoice and bill of lading, to be the property of Steele. In the letter of 13th July, 1812, from James Thompson to Steele, they are stated to be a consignment. The further proof which we would offer in regard to this apparent inconsistency, goes to show that upon these goods, although stated to be consigned to Steele, James Thompson & Co. had made advances to the owners to the amount of £1,000 sterling, which created a lien upon the goods. This lien, we contend, was the property of James Thompson & Co. Again, certain other good appear, in like manner, by the bill of lading and invoice, to be the property of Steele; but, by the letter, to be the property of Dalgleish & Frame and James Thompson. The further proof we offer here is, that we were joint owners with Dalgliesh & Frame.

It is a general rule of prize law, that further proof shall be allowed on an appeal, where the preparatory evidence was doubtful or ambiguous. The present case, we conceive, comes within this rule.

Dexter, contra.

On this point of further proof, cited the two following cases: 6 Rob., 24 (Amer. ed.), The Marianna—to show that an equitable lien is no ground of restitution in prize causes—and 5 Rob., 196, The Tobago, where it is decided that a bottomry bond given in time of peace, gives *no such title to the obligee as will en- [344 able him to support a claim for restitution after a declaration of war. He contended that a captor takes cum onere only when the onus is visible and direct.

Further proof, under the circumstances of this case, ought not to be allowed. The goods were shipped when war was expected. The intention of the shipper was to give a neutral character to the property. James Thompson knew the facts relative to the transaction as well when he made the shipment as now. He had reason to expect and did expect war. Hence the color given to the transaction. If the court allows further proof in a case like this, they will hereafter be inundated with fraud and perjury. It is a general rule of the prize courts, that further proof which goes to contradict the ship's papers shall not be admitted. If there had been really an American interest in this case, it was James Thompson's duty as well as interest to let it appear upon the ship's papers. The original claim of the appellants was stated in the alternative: either they had a lien on the goods for money advanced by them through James Thompson, or the goods were consigned to them on joint account.

The heading of the invoices was false, by their own admission. A letter appears among the papers in this cause from Robert Sterling, Jun., who had property on board, shipped in the name of Wm. Steele; this letter was evidently written in contemplation of war. James Thompson's letter of 13th July contains a list of goods consigned, in contradistinction to the goods belonging to the firm. The goods in question are among the consignments. By James Thompson's letter of 14th July, it appears that he knew of the war. From a second letter of Robert Sterling, Jun., dated 15th July, it is evident that he also knew of the war. In contradiction to such documents, further proof ought not to be admitted.

Harper, in reply.

In the cases of the bottomry bond and the lien, cited by the counsel on the opposite side, the possession of the *property was in [345 the captors. The lien was a lien without possession, it was only an incumbrance. But here, the thing was in possession of him who had the lien. The property was vested, so far as the lien extended for the advances. Steele was Thompson's agent, and might have retained the goods until the advances were repaid.

Although war was feared, peace was confidently expected. There was no motive for giving a neutral character to the property. No fraud was intended. There was no intention to defeat the non-intercourse law. Besides, an intent, even if it existed, to defeat a municipal law, is no ground for refusing further proof.

The letters referred to by the counsel for the captors, went with the invoices; and the accidental ambiguity which seems to exist in the papers was owing to the hurry occasioned by the endeavor to get the goods first to market, and to obtain the bounty on exportation.

Dexter. In the cases cited, the property was not more in the belligerent captor than it was in the present case. These goods never were in possession of the consignee. They were captured in the hands of the shipper. They were not shipped as the property of James Thompson & Co., but as the property of the Scotch merchants.

Irving cited 1 Rob., 86, The Bernon, on the point of further proof.

Monday, March 7th. Irving. As to the national character of James Thompson. It appears, from the testimony in this case, that James Thompson is a native of Scotland, that he came to the United States in 1793, was naturalized in 1797, and, in 1801, returned to Scotland, where he continued to reside as a merchant till some time subsequent to the declaration of war.

Naturalization, under the laws of the United States, confers upon the subject of it all the rights and privileges of a native citizen, excepting that of becoming President of the United 346*] States. He has, therefore, the *same right to leave this country and go abroad which a native citizen possesses. The law of England is the same in this respect. When is the hostile character to be fixed upon him? Not until a war breaks out between the two countries, and he continues, notwithstanding, to reside and carry on a hostile trade with the enemy country. (2 Cranch, 120, Murray v. The Charming Betsy.) A citizen, whether native or naturalized, surprised in a foreign country by a war, has a right to a reasonable time to withdraw his effects. (4 Rob., 161, 195, Madonna delle Gracie.) In Mr. Johnson's case (1 Rob., 17, 12, The Indian Chief), his engagements to his creditors were considered by the court as a sufficient justification of his residence in Great Britain, and his property was restored. On the point of reasonable time to withdraw, see 5 Rob., 90, The Ocean; 1 Rob., 165, 196, The Hoop; 4 Rob., 191, 232, The Dree Gebroeders. Vattel, B. 3, ch. 4, § 63.

Expectation of peace justifies delay in an enemy country, or explains the quo animo of the resident. (5 Rob., 60, The Diana.)

In Bell v. Gilson, (1 Bos. & Pul., 355), it is decided that the goods of a British subject purchased in an enemy's country after the commencement of hostilities, may, under certain circumstances, be sent to England. This decision, though now overruled in that country, in the case of Potts v. Bell (8 T. R., 548), has not been overruled here.

The liberty to withdraw property in case of war is expressly recognized by various treaties, which fix the time for withdrawing. (See, among others, the treaty of 1794, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, art. 26.) But these treaties do not create the principle.

If, then, we allow time to an enemy to withdraw his effects, shall we not allow at least the same indulgence to our own citizens?

A cruiser cannot capture for violation of a municipal law. The seizure for a violation of the non-intercourse *act is directed to [*347 be by the collectors; the action for the recovery of the penalties and forfeitures arising under the act is to be debt, and the proceedings generally are to be in conformity with the act of 2d March, 1799, to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage. But where a statute gives a particular form of action, that form must be pursued. (Act of Congress of March 1st, 1809, § 8 and 18; Laws United States, vol. 9, p. 248, 254; Act of March 2d, 1799, § 67, 68, 69, 88, 91; Laws United States, vol. 4, p. 389, 390, 427, 431; Bac. Abr., vol. 4, p. 654, tit. Statute, K.)

Saturday, March 12. Absent—LIVINGSTON, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The rights of James Thompson depend entirely on his national commercial character; which is decided by the opinion given in the case of the Venus, (ante p. 253).

The sentence of condemnation pronounced in the Circuit Court, as to James Thompson's claim, is affirmed.

The original evidence is very strong to prove that the shipment made by Dalgleish & Frame was entirely a consignment. The whole letter of the 13th of July confirms this idea. It is scarcely credible that the property of Dalgleish & Frame would have been placed on the list of consignments without a note upon it, had it been shipped on joint account. The hurry of business will not excuse or account for this omission. The proposition of Dalgleish & Frame is stated to have been made on the 27th of June, and to have been accepted on the 1st of July. The letters of Thompson to Steele are written on the 13th and 17th of July, when this shipment is treated as being altogether a consignment. The hurry could not have been such as to account for a misstatement of the fact. There is, too, something mysterious in the manner in which the papers, offered as additional proof, reached Mr. Steele. That they should not have been accompanied by a letter, nor bear any marks of coming from abroad, is singular.

Further proof is not admitted, and the* [*348 sentence is affirmed.

THE FRANCES, BOYER MASTER.
(Graham's claim.)

Where the affidavits produced on the order for further proof are positive, but their credibility impaired by the non-production of letters mentioned in the affidavits, a second order for further proof will be allowed in the Appellate Court.

THIS case, like the preceding, was an appeal from the District Court of Rhode Island; and the claim of John Graham, the appellant, was to certain other goods by the same ship, the Frances, captured and carried into Rhode Island, as stated in the case referred to, by the Yankee privateer.

Harper, for claimant.

Pinkney and Dexter, for the captors.

The material facts of the case. and the substance of the argument on both sides, are stated in the following opinion of the court,[1] delivered

March 12th, by MARSHALL, Ch. J.:

John Graham, a merchant of New York, claimed sundry parcels of goods shipped on board the Frances, as his sole property.

The goods were shipped by William Graham & Brothers, merchants of Glasgow, on account and risk of John Graham, merchant, of New 349] York. There are *two bills of lading, each filled up with the name of John Graham. There are also two invoices, each headed with the name of William Graham & Brothers as shippers, and stating the goods to be shipped on account and risk of John Graham. The first of these invoices is marked in the margin thus, W. G. ⋈ I. P. and the other thus, [G.] There were also two lists of goods. The first headed, "List of goods shipped by the Frances, for Messrs. John Graham & Co., New York." This list is marked W. G. ⋈ I. P. The other is headed, "List of goods shipped by the Frances, for Messrs. Peter Graham & Co., Philadelphia." These goods are accompanied by two letters dated the 15th and 16th of July, signed William Graham & Brothers, the first addressed to Messrs. John Graham & Co., and the last to Messrs. Peter Graham & Co. The letter to John Graham & Co. treats of their trade generally, and contains only the following allusion to this shipment: "You have herewith the ship Fan- "ny's accounts, to which refer—also invoice of "sundry goods per Frances. We hope they may "go to a good market. We expect you will "have about one hundred packages of English "goods. There will be somewhat more to "Philadelphia."

The letter to Peter Graham & Co. is also a general letter on the subject of their trade. It contains the following passage respecting the shipments by the Frances: "We have shipped "by Frances a few goods well selected. We "could not get almost any cluster seeds."

The Circuit Judge directed the cause to stand for further proof.

It appears from the affidavit of John Graham that in the month of January, in the year 1809, he entered into a limited partnership with his brothers, William Graham and Peter Graham, who, as well as himself, are naturalized citizens of the United States. The business was to be conducted at New York by himself, under the name of John Graham & Co.; at Philadelphia, by Peter Graham, under the name of Peter Graham & Co., and at Glasgow, by William Graham, under the name of William Graham & Brothers. That, from the commencement of the partnership, he has been in the constant 350] habit of carrying on extensive *business with the knowledge of his partners, on his private account, and also in connection with others. That the investment and disposal of the funds of the deponent, together with the management of the mercantile concerns of the firms composed as aforesaid, and the commission business, were the principal if not the sole business of William Graham & Brothers at Glasgow. That, from the intimate knowledge they possessed of each other's affairs, and in consequence of their connection as brothers, the distinction between his firm and his private character was not always preserved. It was the less attended to because the affairs of the company and his individual concerns were frequently the subjects of the same letter, and it became the more usual to address him by the style of the firm, because there are several other persons of the same name in New York. He adds, that in making shipments on the sole account of the deponent, William Graham has been in the habit of assorting the whole into invoices of small quantities, calculated to suit the generality of purchasers in the New York market, and also that the goods in any one of the said invoices might be sold entire, or transhipped to Philadelphia or any other market, with the original invoice accompanying the same, as such original invoice would inspire more confidence in the buyers. This circumstance occasioned the lists of property shipped by the Frances, and one of them to be addressed to Peter Graham & Co. He swears in the most positive and precise terms, that the property is entirely his own, and was purchased with his private funds in the hands of William Graham.

William Black deposes, that he has been long and intimately acquainted with John Graham, who is a man of fortune and character, and has been in the habit of transacting much of his own business in the said Graham's counting-house. That, from his knowledge of the affairs of the said Graham, he verily believes that the said Graham, both before and since the war, has been in the habit of doing business on his private account, and has received many shipments in which neither of his brothers were interested. He has been concerned with the deponent as part owner of vessels in which the deponent believes that neither William nor Peter Graham held any share.

*Isaac Belt and David Dunham, mer- [351 chants of New York, swear to facts similar to those stated by William Black.

Charles Graham, of a different family from the claimant, swears that in the year 1811, there were, according to the dispensary, six persons of the name of John Graham in New York, one of whom was the deponent's father; and that mistakes were frequently made respecting each other's letters which came through the post-office.

William Hill, principal clerk of William Graham & Brothers, deposes to the different concerns and to the nature of the business transacted by William Graham & Brothers, as stated in the affidavit of John Graham. That they had under their care ships and vessels in which John Graham alone was interested. That since an early period in the year 1811, the concern of William Graham & Brothers have not shipped any goods whatever, for or on account of the said copartnership, to either of their said establishments, or in any other manner whatsoever. That vessels continued to arrive, particularly the Trident, the Fanny, and the Cuba, to the charge of the said William Graham & Brothers, for the account and risk of John Graham, in which ships and cargoes the said copartnership or the said William Graham had no share or interest whatsoever. The deponent has seen sundry letters from the said John Graham to the said William Graham & Brothers, to invest the moneys arising from the freight and cargoes of those ships, in goods, in behalf of him, the said John Graham, so soon as the British orders in council should be revoked; and, until then, to place the amount to his private credit in the books of William Graham & Brothers, which was done by the deponent as clerk. That this money was invested in the goods shipped by the Frances and other vessels, which were shipped on the sole account of John Graham, and were so entered on the books, by the instructions of William Graham. He states the practice of dividing shipments into small invoices, as is stated in the affidavit of John Graham.

1.—Livingston, J., was absent when this opinion was delivered.

Peter Graham swears that he has not, and never had, any interest in the goods shipped by 352] the Frances. That *John Graham has been in the habit of transacting business on his own account, with the knowledge of his partners, and has frequently consigned his separate goods to Peter Graham & Co.

William N. Steele, clerk of Peter Graham, deposes to the same fact; and founds his belief that Peter Graham had no interest in the goods shipped by the Frances, on his knowledge of the business of the house.

William Graham states in detail, with great explicitness, the circumstances narrated in the affidavits of John Graham and of William Hill, his principal clerk, and avers most solemnly that the goods shipped by the Frances were the sole property of John Graham.

The court below directed restitution of two-thirds of the cargo, as being the property of John and Peter Graham, and condemned one-third, as being the property of William Graham. From this sentence of condemnation John Graham has appealed; and from so much of the sentence as directs a restitution of one-third as the property of Peter Graham, the captors have appealed.

It is certainly a rule in prize courts dictated by good sense, and calculated to promote the purposes of justice, that letters accompanying the cargo, written in good faith, in the prosecution of a fair and honest business, should have great influence in ascertaining the real proprietors of it. The letters on board the Frances are of this description. They are such as would be written if the goods were really the property of the company; but such as could scarcely have been written if the goods were the sole property of John Graham. Had they been his sole property, it must have happened that some expression would have been found in the letters indicating the fact. Men who write carelessly and without design, may not be very explicit; but it rarely happens that they entirely conceal the truth. There will be some allusion to it.

If the goods were the sole property of John Graham, why address a letter to Peter Graham & Co.? The affidavits account rationally enough for making up separate invoices; but 353] addressing a letter to Peter Graham *& Co., at Philadelphia, by a vessel destined for New York, has very much the appearance of a shipment destined for the company at that place, and not for John Graham, of New York. The expressions of that letter favor the same idea. "We have shipped you, by Frances, a few goods well selected." These cannot well be the goods of John Graham. The language is surely not such as would be used in that state of things. "We could not get almost any cluster of seeds." These expressions have a necessary reference to some letter of orders from Peter Graham, mentioning cluster seeds among the articles directed to be shipped.

The affidavits produced on the order for further proof, are too positive to be disregarded without considerable reluctance and hesitation. There are, however, certain rules of evidence, the authority of which is admitted in all courts. One of these is, that if a written paper be referred to, which paper is in the power of the party, it ought to be produced. The affidavits of William Graham and of William Hill state expressly that letters had been received from John Graham, directing the disposition of cargoes shipped from America on his own account, and ordering the proceeds to be invested in British manufactures, also on his own account, so soon as the British orders in council should be repealed. Why are not these letters produced? It is impossible not to perceive their necessity. Mr. John Graham must have copied these letters into his letter book. Why has he not furnished some evidence of this fact. His letters must have been answered by William Graham more explicitly than in that which was found on board the Frances. Why is no one of those letters produced? It is impossible to account for the fact that no one of these letters is an exhibit in the cause. The court feels itself bound, judging on this evidence according to the rules of law, to consider the goods as the property of the company. But it is urged, on the part of the claimant, that if permitted to give further proof, he will produce the correspondence and such other proof as will be entirely satisfactory to the court. Several circumstances exist in this cause to induce the court to allow still further time for the production of such further evidence as may place the transaction beyond any doubt.

The cause is ordered to stand for further proof.

(Dunham & Randolph's Claim.)

A case of further proof. Goods, shipped by a British to an American house (partly in conformity with orders, and partly without orders,) who had an option to accept or reject the whole invoice in a limited time, remain the property of the shippers until the election be made to accept them.

THIS is another case of goods by the Frances, captured by the Yankee, and condemned in the Circuit Court of Rhode Island, brought up to this court on appeal.

Messrs. Dunham & Randolph, merchants of New York, claimed three bales and nineteen boxes of goods shipped by Alexander Thompson, of Glasgow, a British subject, and consigned to Dunham & Randolph. The bill of lading is in their names, and the invoice purports to be on their account and risk. A letter from Thompson to Dunham & Randolph, dated Glasgow, 11th July, 1812, after describing the goods, and the labor he had employed in the business, and stating that the goods were sent partly in the Fanny and partly in the Frances, says: "I have exceeded in some articles, and "have sent you others not ordered." "I leave "it with yourselves to take the whole of the "two shipments, or none at all, just as you "please. If you do not wish them, I will thank "you to hand the invoices and letters over to "Messrs. Falconer & Co. I think twenty-four "hours will allow you ample opportunity for "you to make up your minds on this point; "and if you do not hand them over within that "time, I will, of course, consider that you take "the whole."

On the 15th of July, Alexander Thompson again wrote to Dunham & Randolph a letter in which he mentions the information that a bill declaring war had passed the House of Representatives. He then adds, "considering the "circumstances of the times, I thought it best "to inform Messrs. Falconer, Jackson & Co. "fully of the conditions on which I have ship-"ped you the goods by the Fanny and Frances."

In a letter to Messrs. Falconer, Jackson & Co. of the same date, he explains, in full, the proposition he had made to Dunham & Randolph, and directs how those gentlemen are to act for him, should Dunham & Randolph reject the consignment.

355*] *This property was condemned in the courts below, and from the sentence of condemnation the claimant appealed to this court.

Pinkney, for the appellants.

This is a mere question of fact as to property. Were or were not the goods the property of the enemy? We contend that they were not. All the documentary evidence shows the property to belong to Dunham & Randolph. The condition mentioned in Thompson's letter of 11th July, was a condition subsequent. The property vested in the claimants, liable to be devested, if rejected by them within twenty-four hours after receiving the letter.

The greater part of the goods, if not the whole, was shipped by order of the claimants long before the sailing of the vessel. The delivery to the master of the ship was an execution of the order. The shipper had no longer any control over the property, except, in case of the insolvency of the consignees, in which event he might stop it in transitu.

Every circumstance connected with the transaction appears to be perfectly fair; and if the evidence now before the court is not sufficient to support the claim of the appellants, it is a case for further proof. The claimants had accepted the shipment by the Fanny before the capture of the Frances, and thereby rendered certain what was before optional. They thereby bound themselves to take the shipment by the Frances.

Hunter, contra.

The goods in question were not shipped according to order, as appears by Thompson's letter of 11th July. They belonged to the shipper until the consignees had elected to take them; and they could not make their election before the arrival of the Frances.

At whose risk were the goods while at sea? Thompson had no power to impose the risk on the claimants. If the goods had arrived at Boston they might have been attached as the property of the shipper. If attached *as [356 the property of the claimants, they might have said the goods were not their property; or if they had been sued as garnishees of Thompson, they might have said they owed him nothing. They were not bound to accept the goods.

If the property, at law, belonged to Thompson, a fortiori in a case of prize. It is a rule of prize courts that, in time of war, no future election shall be allowed to change the right of property at sea—in transitu. The question is, in whom is the legal estate? At whose risk were the goods passing at the time of capture? (2 Rob., 111, 133, The Packet de Bilboa; 1 Rob., 90, 107, The Danckebaar Africaan; 5 Rob., 115, 128, The Jan Frederick; 1 Rob., 283, 336, The Vrouw Margaretha; 4 Rob., 21, 25, The Josephine; Id., 180, 218, The Aurora; Id., 170, 207, The Carl Walter; 6 Rob., 337, The Carolina; 1 Rob., 243. 289, The Copenhagen.) These cases all go to prove that, during war, property cannot change in transitu.

Dexter, same side.

In this case there was no contract to change the property. To constitute a contract the assent of both parties is necessary. The goods were not shipped according to the order of the claimants, and a condition was annexed. The property never vested in the claimants. It was only to vest in them on condition that they failed to deliver over the goods to Messrs. Falconer & Co.

Pinkney, in reply.

The further proof which the claimants would offer, will show that almost all the excess of goods beyond the order was on board the Fanny. Here was a direct assignment to the claimants. The goods were delivered to their agent, the master of the vessel. The documents were all sent to the consignees. No change of property in transitu was necessary. The property was already vested in the claimants; and, upon its arrival, they might have asserted their right to it. So far as the goods comported with the order, the contract was *certainly executed. There can be no [357 doubt about those goods. The claimants might have maintained trover or replevin for them.

This was not the sort of shipment described by Sir W. Scott in the cases cited. Thompson, the shipper, was a naturalized citizen of the United States. This appears in other cases before this court; and that fact constitutes part of the further proof which we wish to introduce. There was no knowledge of the war in this case. The transaction was not shaped by the expectation of war. Thompson did not believe that war would take place, and he gives his reasons. The shipment was directed on the 11th of July. Between that and the 15th the intelligence of the war was received.

Saturday, March 12th. Absent—LIVINGSTON, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It has been argued for the appellants, that, by and the invoice and bill of lading, the true construction of the letter of Alexander Thompson, the property was vested in Dunham & Randolph, liable to be devested by their rejecting the consignment within twenty-four hours after receiving the letters. That the condition annexed to the transfer is subsequent, not precedent.

The court cannot concur in this reasoning. It has been very truly urged for the captors, that to vest this property in Dunham & Randolph, a contract is necessary; and that to form a contract, the consent of two parties is indispensable. In this case, no such contract appears. Had Thompson, in execution of the orders of Dunham & Randolph, consigned to them, unconditionally, such goods as they had directed, the contract would have been complete; and the goods would, on being shipped, have become the property of Dunham & Randolph. But Thompson has not done this. With the goods which were ordered he has consigned other goods, expressly stipulating that Dunham & Randolph shall not take the goods they had ordered, unless they consent to take the whole quantity put on board both vessels. This, then, is a new proposition, on 358] which Dunham & Randolph *are at liberty to exercise their discretion. They may accept or reject it; and until they do accept it, the property must remain in Thompson. The sentence of condemnation, therefore, in this case, was warranted by the evidence before the Circuit Court.

But the claimants pray an order for further proof; and say, that, before the capture of the Franccs, the Fanny had arrived, and Dunham & Randolph had consented to take both cargoes.

This application is opposed on the principle that, were the fact even true, as alleged by the claimant, belligerent property cannot change its character in transitu.

Reserving any opinion on the law of the case, until the facts alleged shall be substantiated, if it shall be in the power of the claimants to substantiate them, the cause is ordered to stand for further proof.

THE FRANCES, BOYER, MASTER.

(Kennedy's Claim).

Question of fact as to property.

THIS was likewise a case of goods by the Frances, condemned in the Circuit Court of Rhode Island. They were claimed by Duncan Kennedy, an American citizen, who appealed to this court.

The case was submitted to the court without argument.

Saturday, March 12th. Absent—LIVINGSTON, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Duncan Kennedy, surviving partner of the house of George Stayley & Co., merchants of New York, claims eight boxes of merchandise, part of the cargo of the ship Frances, as his property.

*The invoice is headed: [359

"Glasgow, 8th July, 1812.

"Messrs. George Stayley & Co.

"Receive from James Smith."

A letter from James Smith to George Stayley & Co., in speaking of the goods, terms them "our goods," and does not, in any manner, indicate that they are the goods of Stayley & Co. He concludes his letter with saying: "As it is to be hoped the trade will now open, I shall expect your instructions saying what goods are best suited for the market."

The bill of lading is filled up with the name of George Stayley & Co. "on account and risk as per invoice."

There are several letters from George Stayley, in Glasgow, to his father; but none of them indicate an opinion that the property of the goods was in George Stayley & Co.

The sentence, condemning these goods, must be affirmed.

THE FRANCES, BOYER, MASTER.

(French's Claim.)

An intention, clearly proved, of a consignor of goods to vest the right of property in the consignee, is not sufficient to effect such a change of property, until the goods are received by the consignee, or some evidence is given of his agreement to take them on his own account; until that time, the goods are at the risk of the shippers; and if they are enemies, the goods, if captured, are good prize. No difference though the consignee were the agent of a third person who had directed him to order the goods, unless it appears that he actually did order them.

THIS, like the former cases of the Frances, was an appeal from the United States Circuit Court for the Rhode Island District.

William French, the appellant, a citizen of the United States, claimed fourteen boxes of merchandise shipped on board the Frances by James Auchincloss, of Paisley, in Scotland, to A. & J. Auchincloss of New York, on their account and risk, with orders to remit the proceeds to the shipper for payment. The claimant *alleged that the goods had been [360 previously ordered by him through A. & J. Auchincloss, to be imported on his account and risk.

Further proof was ordered by the court below, to consist of the original order for the merchandise, and all the letters and correspondence relating to it, and of all the proofs of property in the claimant.

Under this order the claimant produced a letter dated Baltimore, 20th February, 1812, signed by himself, and addressed to A. & J. Auchincloss, requesting them to order from their friends in Scotland, goods not exceeding in value £1,000 sterling, to be shipped so soon as the orders in council should be revoked.

On the 20th of September, 1812, A. & J. Auchincloss wrote a letter to the claimant, advising him of the capture of the Frances with the goods, said to be shipped on his account, to their address, and desiring him to take the necessary steps to have his property cleared.

To these letters were added affidavits of the claimant, tending to prove the property in him, together with an affidavit of Darius Hodson, that he forwarded the above last mentioned letter to the claimant at Providence, by his request; and that, when he took it from the file, it was a whole sheet directed to the claimant from New York, by J. Auchincloss, Jun.; but that, in order to save postage, he, the deponent, tore off the outside leaf, not thinking, at the time, of its being of any importance.

Upon this proof, the claim was rejected in the court below, and the property condemned to the captors.

In this court the cause was argued by Jones for the appellant, and Dexter for the captors; and on Tuesday, the 15th of March. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the following opinion of the court:

361*] *This is the claim of William French to a part of the cargo of the Frances, shipped by James Auchincloss, of Paisley, in Great Britain, to A. & J. Auchincloss, of New York, on their account and risk. By the correspondence between the consignor and consignees, which was exhibited to the court below, under an order for further proof, it is somewhat doubtful whether these goods were to be sold as the property of the consignor or of the consignees. In the letter from the former to A. Auchincloss, dated the 17th of July, 1812, he says: "You will lose no time to "transmit immediately, on the receipt of the "invoice by the Fanny as well as by the "Frances, to the full amount of the invoices; "as thereby, and no other way, is your credit "and John's to be restored here. Also remit, "as I have often told you, to clear off your "old debt; and, for God's sake, let us have no "more failing in the family. You will observe that the goods per Fanny and Frances "are principally bought upon a credit of 3, 4 and "5 months—this the consequence of failing."

In another letter of the same date, from the same to the same, he says: "By this ship, the "Frances, I have shipped you 14 boxes of different kinds of goods, which I beg you will "lose no time to dispose, as by early remittances you will undoubtedly strengthen your "credit." In another part of this letter he says, "I beg you will lose no time to remit "largely, say 3,000 or 4,000 pounds. Remember the old cash account with the Paisley "Banking Company." These letters, so far as they throw light upon this transaction, intimate very strongly that A. & J. Auchincloss were to dispose of these goods upon their own account, and as the purchasers of them. But to produce a change of property from the shipper to the consignee, it was essentially necessary that the goods should have been sent in consequence of some contract between the parties, by which the one agreed to sell, and the other to buy. Had the language of these letters been more explicit than it is to prove that the intention of the consignor was to vest the right of property in the consignee, it would not have been sufficient to effect such a change, until the goods were received, or some evidence given of the agreement of the consignee to take them on his own account. No order from A.

362*] & J. Auchincloss to the *consignor of this cargo, authorizing the shipment of it, was produced or offered to be produced in the court below; and this court, therefore, is warranted in believing that none such was ever given. Indeed, no interest whatever in these goods is asserted to have existed in A. & J. Auchincloss, but the same is claimed by Wm. French, a citizen of the United States, who, under the order for further proof, produced, in support of his claim, a letter from himself to A. & J. Auchincloss, dated the 20th February, 1812, in which he requests them to order from his friends in Scotland, a quantity of goods enumerated in the letter not to exceed £1,000 sterling, to be shipped as soon as the orders in council should be revoked, and adding that he should consider the goods at his risk from the time they should be shipped; also an invoice of these goods sent by A. & J. Auchincloss to Wm. French, together with a letter from them, dated the 20th of September, 1812, advising him of the capture of the Frances with the goods shipped on his account, and recommending it to him to take the necessary steps to vindicate his right to the property. This letter made its appearance in the court below, with the outer leaf, on which the postmark would have been placed, had there been any, torn off. To do away the suspicion which this circumstance might well excite, the affidavit of Darius Hodson was produced, in which he states that he forwarded this letter to the claimant, at Providence, having first torn off the outer leaf with a view to lessen the rate of postage.

The affidavit of the claimant is added, which is fully to the purpose of supporting his interest in these goods, so far as his order to A. & J. Auchincloss can vest such an interest in him. But passing over those observations which might fairly be made upon the mutilated state of the letter from A. & J. Auchincloss to the claimant, and the suspicious manner in which that circumstance is attempted to be explained, it may be observed that the claim of Wm. French is in no respect stronger than if it had been made by A. & J. Auchincloss. Admit that he wrote to A. & J. Auchincloss the letter of the 20th of February, 1812, and received from them that of the 20th of September, the inquiry still remains to be answered, where is the order for this *shipment from A. [363 & J. Auchincloss as the agent of the claimant?

The truth is, that in whatever light this question is viewed, these goods were at the risk of the shippers until they should be received by the consignee; and, consequently, were, by the capture, made good prize, as property belonging to the enemy.

THE FRANCES, BOYER, MASTER.

(Gillespie's claim.)

The commercial domicile of a merchant at the time of the capture of his goods determines the character of those goods, hostile or neutral.

THIS, also, was an appeal from the sentence of the Rhode Island Circuit Court condemning certain goods captured on board the Frances, by the Yankee privateer.

These goods were shipped by Colin Gillespie, the claimant, who had been naturalized in the United States, and consigned to Archibald Bryce and Alexander Muirhead, for sale and remittance to the shipper at Glasgow.

To ascertain the national character of the claimant, further proof was ordered by the court below, calling upon him to show how long, after his naturalization, he resided in the United States, before he went to Great Britain; how long he had since resided in the United States, at any time or times; how long in Great Britain; what was the nature of his business in the latter country; and in whom the property vested at the time it was shipped.

Upon the production of this further proof, it appeared that the property was vested in the claimant at the time of its being shipped; that he was a native of Great Britain; that he emigrated to the United States in 1793; was naturalized in 1798; having, in the interim, returned to his native country on mercantile business in 1794 and 1796, and revisited the United States in 1795 and 1797; that he again returned to his native country in 1799, was there 364*] married and revisited the United *States with his wife in the same year; that he continued to reside in New York until June, 1802, when he once more returned to Great Britain, and resided there until November, 1805, when he came to the United States (Mrs. Gillespie having died in Scotland), formed a partnership with John Graham, of New York, and returned to Glasgow in the same year, where he carried on the business of the partnership under the firm of Colin Gillespie & Co.; that he remained there until the partnership was dissolved, and until the 2d of July, 1813; on which day he left the enemy's country, and arrived in the United States with his family in October, 1813; that he kept house at Glasgow, and built a warehouse there, which he still owns, and kept his counting-house therein. He formed a determination to return to the United States, as he deposes, on being informed of the declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain, which took place on the 18th of June, 1812, and was known in England about the 20th of July following, but was prevented, by his engagements and commercial concerns from carrying that intention into effect until the period above mentioned, still leaving some of his affairs unarranged

Upon this evidence the property was condemned in the Circuit Court, and an appeal was taken, by the claimant, to this court, where the cause was argued by Jones, Harper and Dexter for the claimant, and Pinkney for the captors.

Jones, for the claimant.

The goods in question were purchased early in July, 1812; they were shipped on the 14th of that month, at which time the declaration of war was not known in England. It does not appear that the claimant shipped any other goods than those in question. In less than a year after he had received information of the war, he returned to the United States with his family, thereby giving unequivocal evidence of the quo animo of his residence in Great Britain. In such a case, even the property of a neutral would be protected; a fortiori, ought the property of one of our own citizens to receive protection. Cases of this kind are analogous to cases of confiscation. If there be any particular period at which *we can consider this [365 property as assuming a hostile character, it must be that at which it would have been confiscable by the enemy, supposing the party to continue an American citizen. Had that period arrived? Were the circumstances such as would have justified Great Britain in confiscating this property? If not, surely the United States ought not to condemn it. (Vattel, B. 3, sec. 63.)

This case may be considered in another point of view, viz., whether the case of a naturalized citizen returning to his native country, and carrying on trade, as in the present case, is distinguishable in its consequences, in the event of war, from that of a native citizen going to a foreign country and engaging in trade. We contend that it is not. One authority, and one only, seems to favor the distinction; and that is the case of La Virginia (5 Rob., 99). But in that case, it does not appear that the American character of Mr. Lapierre was acquired by naturalization. It might and very probably did depend on domicile alone. We contend that a person naturalized in this country is as much a citizen of the United States, to all the intents and purposes of the present case, as a native. The naturalization law of the United States requires of the applicant for the privileges of naturalization, unqualified abjuration of allegiance to his former sovereign. The law of England on the subject goes to an equal extent. Naturalized and native subjects are looked upon as the same, to all legal purposes. (4 Cranch, 321, Dawson's Lessee v. Godfrey.)

A denizen may be made such for life or in tail; "but one cannot be naturalized either with limitation, for life or in tail, or upon condition; for that is against the absoluteness, purity and indebility of natural allegiance." (Co. Lit., 129, [a]; 2 Domat, 376.)

If, according to the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, on the return of a naturalized citizen to his native country, his former duties return, and his duties to his adopted country still continue, under what contradictory obligations would he be placed. This was Lord Hale's doctrine, but it is now done away. (Foster's Crown Law 185, sec. 4.)

*It has been decided in England, in [366 the case of Marryat v. Wilson (1 Bos. & Pul., 430), that a natural born subject of that country admitted a citizen of the United States of America, either before or after the declaration of American independence, may be considered as a subject of the United States, so as to entitle him to trade to the East Indies under the 13th article of the treaty of 19th November, 1794.

Harper, same side,

Asked whether the court, in the case of the Rapid, had decided the question as to the difference between the British acts concerning letters of marque, prizes and prize goods, which authorize the capture of the property of inhabitants in hostile countries (and on which the British admiralty decisions are founded), and the act of Congress declaring war, which only gives a right to capture the property of British subjects.

JOHNSON, J., said the court had fully considered that point and decided it in the case of the Rapid.

Pinkney, for the captors.

We contend that the property even of a native American citizen domiciled in an enemy country at the time of the capture of such property, is liable to condemnation as prize of war; and, a fortiori, the property of a naturalized American citizen, a native of the enemy country, under like circumstances; which is the case before the court, and which will be first considered.

It has been contended on the other side, that a person naturalized in the United States is as much a citizen of this country as a native, and that he continues to be so, though he return to his native country and there engage in trade. It has been argued that, in order to become an American citizen, he must abjure his allegiance to his former government; that, consequently, though he should return to his native country, he can no longer be considered as under the protection of that government; that his new allegiance to the United States continues, and that our government is bound to protect him; that he is therefore to be considered in the 367] *same light as a native citizen, and that his property is equally to be protected in case of war.

That a person so abjuring his native allegiance cannot claim protection from his former government while he continues in the country of his adoption, is admitted; but we contend that if he voluntarily returns within the sphere of his original allegiance, he is as much a subject of his former government as if he had never emigrated; that the reciprocal duties of allegiance and protection, on the respective parts of the subject and the sovereign, are revived; he is no longer a citizen of the United States. The two allegiances are incompatible, we admit; the naturalization law of the United States clearly goes upon this idea; but in case of the party's return to his native country, it is the old allegiance which must prevail, and not the new, as is contended by the claimant. By his return, he has, in fact, consented to resume his former allegiance; for he must be presumed to have known the laws of his country, and that those laws would impose upon him his old duties in case of his return. He is now, as Sir W. Scott would call him, a redintegrated subject of his native country, and is liable to all his former obligations. He is now bound actively to support the government to which he has returned. In case of war, he may be compelled to take up arms against the country he has adopted; to pay taxes for the support of the war, &c., and this, not by arbitrary power, but of right. These obligations, it will be recollected, we contend are the effect of a voluntary return. We do not mean to say that if a naturalized citizen should enter the army of the United States and be captured by the nation to which he formerly belonged, during a war between the two countries, he would, on being carried to his native country as a prisoner, incur those obligations. But in the case now before the court, the return of Gillespie, the claimant, to England, was entirely voluntary. Without regard, therefore, to the question of domicile, Gillespie was, according to the doctrine for which we have been contending, politically an enemy of the United States at the time of the capture of the Frances. If he was not an enemy, I should be glad to know who can be considered as such. If he is not hostis who has every hostile duty upon him, I am at a loss to know who is.

*If the war had been sudden, hu- [368 manity might plead in behalf of the claimant. But in this case, there was no surprise. War had been threatening for a long time previous to its actual declaration. No indulgence, therefore, on this ground, can be claimed.

The counsel for the claimant has cited Lord Coke in support of his doctrine of naturalization, but does not seem to have considered that, according to that author, a British subject can never become a citizen of any other country.

The case of Marryat v. Wilson has also been cited. That case is perhaps entitled to some consideration; but even there, the court had, at first, decided against Collet, and it was only upon the request of the American minister (Mr. King) that they consented to reconsider the case, when they finally decided in his favor.

2. If Gillespie was politically an enemy at the time of the capture, the doctrine of commercial domicile is wholly immaterial in the present case. But as the court may not view the subject in the same light as we do, a few remarks on the latter point may not be unnecessary.

We lay it down, then, as an indisputed position, that the character of captured goods is decided by the commercial domicile of the owner at the time of capture. And we contend that Gillespie had a commercial domicile in Great Britain at the time of the capture of the goods in question. It does not appear that he had, in any manner, put himself in motion—in itinere, to return before the capture. All the evidence showing his intention to return arose after that event. A hostile character, therefore, attached to the property, if not to the owner.

This is not a case of withdrawing funds; it is a case of trade originating before the war, and continued after the war. Besides, the rule of withdrawal applies only to cases where the domicile of the party is not in the enemy country, though his trade is carried on and his property situated there. (See Coopman's case, cited in The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 12, 14; Escott's case, cited in *The Hoop, 1 Rob., 170, [369 201; The Madonna delle Gracie, 4 Rob., 161, 195.)

It has been said that at the time of the shipment of the goods in question the war was not known in England, and that it would be a case of great hardship, under such circumstances, to subject this property to condemnation. But want of notice, in cases like this, is an excuse not known to the law of nations. (See Whitehill's case, referred to in the case of The Hoop, 1 Rob., 170, 201.) Whitehill was a British subject—had been at St. Eustatius only two days and had no knowledge of the war—yet his property was condemned.

As to the fact that public treatics frequently allow a particular time for the respective subjects of both parties to withdraw in case of war, it may be observed, that this is only providing against the exercise of a right which the contracting parties would otherwise have had. But these mutual concessions do not alter the nature or effect of the domicile.

At all events, Gillespie ought to have put himself in motion to return to the United States immediately upon knowledge of the war. This he does not appear to have done; and, according to Sir W. Scott, nothing but the actual force of the government is a sufficient excuse for the neglect. But no such excuse has been offered.

On either of the grounds, therefore, which have been taken in this argument, we conceive that the property in controversy must be condemned.

Harper, in reply.

It is the nature of the trade, not the place of residence, which determines the hostile or neutral character of the trader.

We must still insist that a naturalized citizen of the United States is a citizen to every intent, the right to be President of the United States only excepted, which exception but proves the general rule.

It is said, on the part of the captors, that a 370] naturalized *American citizen ceases to be such when he returns to his native country. Suppose, then, while absent in his native country, a descent should be cast upon him in this —would he be considered by our courts as an alien, so as to deprive him of the estate so cast upon him? Again, suppose, in case of war between the two countries, he should enlist himself under the banners of our enemy, and be found in arms against us, should we not consider him as a traitor, and treat him accordingly? If he chooses to take such double responsibilities upon himself, it is his business to reconcile them; we can only consider him as an American citizen.

We might admit, perhaps, that by a return to his native country in time of war, he must be considered as having abandoned his rights as a citizen of the United States, in relation to trade; still, however, he could not throw off his duties. But Gillespie returned in time of peace. He therefore did not assume new duties incompatible with those he owed to this country. He assumed only that temporary allegiance to the government of Great Britain which every other stranger in that country owed. Upon the breaking out of the war, perhaps new duties might arise inconsistent with his duties as an American citizen. Yet, in that case, a reasonable time ought to be allowed him to remove; and if he made every reasonable exertion to return to the United States, and especially if he did actually return in less than a year after being informed of the existence of the war, which is the fact, he must be considered as having retained his American character.

The domicile of the owner at the time of capture is not the criterion whereby to determine the character of the property captured, in all cases. If it be so generally, this case ought to be an exception. Gillespie was lawfully in England at the breaking out of the war; he cannot be presumed to have known that war would take place; it is impossible that he should have known it; such a presumption is unreasonable. Whitehill's case has been cited on the other side; but the counsel for the captors is mistaken as to the facts of that case. Whitehill knew of the war, and that St. Eustatius was hostile, at the time he went there; which essentially distinguishes it from the case now before the court.

371*] Pinkney referred to the history of the times, to show that Whitehill had no knowledge of the war when he went to St. Eustatius.

Harper. If Whitehill did not know that war had actually been declared, he knew that measures had been taken which may be considered as equivalent to a declaration. The capture took place in February. He knew that letters of marque had been issued in December preceding, and that a long irritation had existed between the two governments. He knew, also, that the trade in which he was engaged was a trade frowned upon by his own government. In the present case the circumstances were entirely different. (5 Rob., 220, 247.)

Saturday, March 12th. Absent—LIVINGSTON, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Colin Gillespie, a naturalized American citizen residing in Glasgow, claimed sundry goods, shipped on his own account, as his property. This claim depends entirely on his national character, and is decided in the case of The Venus.

The sentence of the Circuit Court, condemning the property of the claimant, is affirmed.

VOWLES AND OTHERS v. CRAIG AND OTHERS.

Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

If a person, who has obtained a survey upon a military land warrant under the commonwealth of Virginia for 2000 acres, sell and transfer, for a valuable consideration, his right to the survey, and assign the plat and certificate to the purchaser, whereupon he obtains a patent for the land in his own name; and if, upon a resurvey, it appear that the grant conveys 2700 acres, the vendor cannot in equity support a claim for the surplus, against the vendee.

THIS case, as stated by TODD, J., in delivering the opinion of the court was as follows:

This suit was instituted on the chancery side

NOTE.—A sale in bulk is not defeated by a discrepancy in the quantity, as where deed describes the land as containing 96 acres, be the same more or less, and it afterward appeared that the farm contained ten acres less. Faure v. Martin, 7 N. Y., 210; Marvin v. Bennett, 26 Wend, 169; Stebbins v. Eddy, 4 Mas. 414.

Where land is sold for a gross sum, the grantee takes the quantity actually comprised within the bounds of the conveyance, without reference to the quantity mentioned; and if there is no fraud or misrepresentation, he is not liable for a surplus, nor entitled to a deduction from the price for a deficiency in the quantity. Morris Canal Co. v. Emmett, 9 Paige, 168; 2 John, 37; 5 Mass. 355; 1 Atk. 325.

Where farm is sold at a fixed price per acre, and the quantity is misrepresented, though without fraud of the vendor, a court of equity will relieve the party injured by the mistake; the purchaser may take the farm at the price of the real number of acres, and if he has paid for it, may have compensation for the deficiency. Stebbens v. Eddy, 4 Mas. 414.

The rule of equity that where land is sold for a certain quantity a court of equity relieves if the quantity be defective, applies only to contracts for land in a settled country, where titles are complete, boundaries determined, and real quantity known, or capable of being ascertained. Dunlap v. Dunlap, 12 Wheat, 574.

A survey is not void because it includes more land than was directed to be surveyed by the warrant. Taylor v. Brown, 5 Cranch, 234.

Where deed describes land by natural boundaries and such boundaries contain more land than the quantity mentioned in deed, purchaser is entitled to it. Clark v. Munyan, 22 Pick. 410.

of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Kentucky District, by the complainants, now 372] appellants as the heirs *and legal representatives of Mary Vowles, formerly Mary Frazer.

The bill alleges that in the year 1774 a survey was made for Mary Frazer, as heir at law and only daughter of George Frazer, dec'd., by virtue of the Governor's warrant and agreeable to the royal proclamation of 1763, for 2,000 acres of land in Fincastle county, on Elkhorn Creek, the waters of Ohio River. That according to usual and customary allowance, made in this, as well as other military surveys at that time, a considerable quantity of land over and above 2,000 acres is contained within the actual boundaries. That in the year 1778, whilst the said Mary was a minor, Michael Robinson, as guardian of the said Mary, and who had intermarried with her mother, made a contract with the defendants Lewis, Joseph and Benjamin Craig, for the sale of the said 2,000 acres of land surveyed as aforesaid for the said Mary at the price of 30s. per acre, amounting to £3,000, which was paid in the depreciated paper currency of Virginia and was of little or no value. That the said Mary was induced to affix her signature to an assignment of the said plat and certificate of survey, which was post-dated so as to bear the appearance of its being executed when she was of full age; in consequence of which Lewis Craig obtained a patent for the said land in his own name and has since conveyed a part thereof to the said Joseph and Benjamin, under whom the other defendants derive their titles. The prayer of the bill is to vacate the contract and to decree a reconveyance of the land, and for general relief.

The answers of the defendants, Lewis and Joseph Craig, admit the making of the survey, and that it contains a considerable quantity of land within the boundaries more than 2,000 acres.

They admit the contract with Michael Robinson for the purchase of the said survey, but positively deny that it was made in the year 1778, and aver that it was made in 1779. They deny that the contract was for 2,000 acres of land at 30s. per acre, but was for the whole survey at the price of £3,000. They also positively deny that the assignment on the plat and certi- 373] ficate of *survey was post-dated or that any fraud or misrepresentation was practiced or used relative to the transaction.

The answers of the other defendants are deemed immaterial to the investigation of the questions arising in this case.

The cause was heard in the Circuit Court upon the bill, answers, depositions and other proofs. The court decreed the bill to be dismissed with costs; from which decree an appeal was taken to this court.

Taylor, for the appellants.

On examination of the evidence exhibited, we are satisfied that the allegation that the assignment was made during the minority of Mary Frazer is not sufficiently supported to have authorized the Circuit Court to have decreed a reconveyance. But we suppose the complainants were entitled to relief in some shape for the surplus land contained within the survey; either by a decree for the reconveyance of the surplus, by a pecuniary compensation for it according to its present value, or by a pecuniary compensation according to the price at which the land was sold, on which interest should be allowed.

No evidence is introduced of the terms of the sale, whether by the acre or in gross, except the survey, assignment, power of attorney, and receipt before mentioned, from these it plainly appears that the parties contracted on a supposition that the quantity of land sold and purchased was 2,000 acres.

The surplus of 700 acres (nearly one-third of the whole quantity supposed to be sold) cannot be considered as a small one, such as might arise from inaccuracy of instruments, &c., and therefore within the contemplation of the parties.

The remote residence of the vendor, who had but lately attained full age when she sold, precludes the idea of her having any information of the quantity of land to which she was entitled, other than that which was derived from the survey. On her part, therefore, and probably on the part of the purchaser also, the contract was *made under an evident mis- [374 take respecting the subject of sale. There is nothing discoverable in the contract or exhibits from which it can be collected that the sale was made without responsibility for the quantity, the words, more or less, almost universally used to designate such an intent, are nowhere to be found.

The case presented is that of a contract made under the influence of mistake, in both parties, as to a material and important part, without fraud or concealment on either side.

It is supposed that no difference exists between contracts for the sale of lands, and those of any other description. The same principles apply to all. This doctrine is recognized in the opinion expressed by the Court of Appeals in Kentucky, in the case of Young against Craig. In delivering that opinion the court expressed itself as follows: "The question in this case is whether Craig, who had sold to Young a tract of land containing in its boundaries a surplus, has a right to recover such surplus, or in case it cannot be had, a compensation therefor in money. There is no novelty or peculiarity in the principles upon which questions of this sort depend. In contracts of this kind the same good faith is required, and the same responsibility attaches to its violation, which law and reason prescribes in every description of contracts. If, through fraud or gross and palpable mistake, more or less land should be conveyed than was in the contemplation of the seller to part with, or the purchaser to receive, the injured party would be entitled to relief in like manner as he would be for an injury produced by a similar cause in a contract of any other species."

The same opinion also establishes the principle that in sales in gross as well as in sales by the acre, if the parties have contracted under manifest error as to quantity, the party injured is entitled to relief, unless, indeed, the surplus or deficit was small, not more than usual in such cases, and of course supposed to be within the contemplation of the parties. In that case it is true the court refused to decree compensation for the surplus land sold, because it appeared plainly to have been the intention of the parties to risk the gain or loss, and because the

375*] surplus *was not more than usual in such sales.[1] In the case of Young v. Craig, the court appears to have adopted the principle laid down by Pothier in his treatise on obligations (ch. 1, art. 3, s. 1, title Error), and also by the writers on natural law, "that an error about a thing, or about its quality, upon pros-376*] pect of which a man *is induced to come to any agreement, renders the agreement or bargain void, for in such case a man is not supposed to have agreed absolutely but upon supposal of the presence of such a thing or quality, on which, as on a necessary condition, his consent was founded, and, therefore, the thing or quality not appearing, the consent is understood to be null and ineffectual." (Puffendorf's Law of Nature and Nations, b. 1, ch. 3, § 12.)

On these principles, as applied to this case, the complainants would be entitled to compensation, or the contract would be considered as void, unless it was in proof that the surplus was not unusually great, and was not more than may reasonably be supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties. As the consideration of quantity does not appear to have been the operating motive which led to the contract, though it certainly influenced the price, according to the principles established by writers on natural law, it would appear that the error of the parties rather afforded a ground for a decree of compensation than for annulling the contract.

From an examination of the documents exhibited it will clearly appear that the parties contracted under an opinion that the survey contained only two thousand acres. The survey itself specifies that quantity. The power *of attorney to Joseph Craig describes [*377 the land as 2,000 acres, and the receipt of Michael Robinson for the last payment, states it expressly to be in full for 2,000 acres of land, the property of Mary Frazer. There is not an expression used which shows an intention on either side to make a risking bargain.

No evidence appears in the record to show that military surveys do usually contain surplus lands, and it is supposed without such proof the court cannot take judicial notice of such an allegation.

But if the court should recognize it, must it not also be admitted that the surplus in this case (one-third) is much more than is usual? The influence of error on the contracting parties being proved, it lies on the defendants to bring themselves within the exceptions stated in the

1.—The opinion of the Court of Appeals in Kentucky in the case of Young v. Craig, was as follows:

The question in this case is whether Craig, who had sold to Young a tract of land containing in its boundaries a surplus, has a right to recover such surplus, or in case it cannot be had, a compensation therefor in money.

There is no novelty or peculiarity in the principles upon which questions of this sort depend. In contracts of this kind the same good faith is required; and the same responsibility attaches to its violation which law and reason prescribe in every description of contract.

If through fraud, or gross and palpable mistake, more or less land should be conveyed than was in the contemplation of the seller to part with or the purchaser to receive, the injured party would be entitled to relief in like manner as he would be for an injury produced by a similar cause in a contract of any other species.

In this case, however, there is no evidence of fraud; and the only ground from which an inference can be deduced that there was such a mistake as would justify the interference of the court for the purpose of correction, is the surplus contained in the boundaries described by the deed. Whether this ground be sufficient to justify such an inference depends upon the nature and terms of the contract.

Contracts for the sale of land may be considered of two descriptions. 1st. Where the sale is of a specific quantity, which is usually denominated a sale by the acre; and, 2d. Where the sale is of a specific tract by name or description, each party risking the quantity; and this latter, for sake of brevity, is sometimes called a sale in gross.

It is evident that in a sale per acre much less variation from the quantity intended to be conveyed would afford evidence of a mistake which would justify the interposition of a court to correct it than would be sufficient for that purpose in a sale of the other description. But even in a sale per acre, as from the roughness and unevenness of the ground from the variation of instruments and from the different results that will necessarily be produced by different surveyors operating with the same instruments, it is impracticable to ascertain the quantity with perfect precision, a small deficit or surplus, however exactly the parties may have intended to be confined to a specific quantity, would not justify an application to a court of justice for relief. In many cases, however, of sales of this sort, the parties did not intend to be very scrupulously exact with respect to the quantity. There was particularly in the sales made at an early period of this country great liberality of admeasurement frequently allowed by the seller and expected by the purchaser. Where this was the case to authorize a conclusion from the surplus contained in the boundaries of a tract, that there was a mistake of quantity, the surplus ought to be greater than was usual in conveyances made about the same period and with the same intention of allowing liberal admeasurement. But as in some sales of an early period, and in perhaps a great majority of those of a more recent date, such a liberality of admeasurement was not intended by the parties it would be obviously improper and unjust to lay down any general rule as to the rate of surpluses that would justify an inference of a mistake which would deserve a correction. Each case must depend much upon its own particular circumstances. Whether such an inference would be authorized in the present case were the sale in question per acre, and not in gross, need not be determined since we are of opinion it is of the latter description.

The deed of conveyance must be taken as conclusive evidence of the terms of sale, unless it had been shown that language not comporting with the true intention of the parties had been inserted through fraud or mistake, of which there is not the slightest indication in this case.

The deed describes the land by its boundaries and situation, and as "containing by survey four hundred and twenty-five acres, be the same more or less." The plain and most obvious meaning of the expressions "be the same more or less," is that the parties were to run the risk of gain or loss as there might happen to be an excess or deficiency in the estimated quantity. This, it is believed, is the sense in which such an expression is uniformly understood by both the learned and the unlearned. This idea is not repelled by the expression of the quantity of acres; on the contrary, it rather derives strength from the manner in which the quantity is mentioned, for it plainly indicates that the expression of quantity was used as matter of description only, and that it was the intention of the parties not to be confined to a precise and specific quantity.

We do not mean to be understood that in a sale of this kind the surplus or deficit might not be so great as to authorize an inference that it had been produced by fraud or mistake; but in this case, where the estimated quantity was 425 acres, and the largest quantity with which any subsequent survey has made it is 481, the surplus does not appear so great as not to be within the reasonable limits of a risking bargain of this kind. (See in support of this doctrine, Sugden, 225, 6; 1 Call., 301.) We are, therefore, of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court, in favor of Craig, was erroneous, and must be reversed with costs.

case of Young v. Craig, by the exhibition of satisfactory evidence on those points. This has not been done.

If the complainants are entitled to relief, the next inquiry is, how it should be granted. The object of the parties being a sale and purchase of 2,000 acres of land, the contract being made for that quantity only, could Lewis Craig be compelled to receive and pay for more? Let it be supposed that he had made an improvident bargain, that the lands were not worth the price he gave, or that since the sale they had greatly depreciated in value, Mary Frazer, or her representatives, could, on no principle of equity, take advantage of her own error to require payment for a greater quantity of lands than had come within the contract, and Lewis Craig might relieve himself by a conveyance of the surplus land.

As Lewis Craig was not exposed to the risk of depreciation in value, on principles of reciprocity Mary Frazer and her representatives should be placed in the same situation, and should be entitled to a specific reconveyance, so far as it can be had without affecting the rights of others. It appears from the proceedings that Lewis Craig is still in possession and the owner of a part of this land, and that Joseph Craig, who was concerned in the purchase, holds another part; so far as these extend, a specific reconveyance may be decreed. As to the other 378] *defendants who appear to have been purchasers, and who probably had not notice of the latent equitable claim of the complainants so as to effect them, it is not contended that they can be compelled to convey. As to the quantity deficient after the conveyance of the lands held by Lewis and Joseph Craig, a decree for pecuniary compensation according to the present value, if the principles before stated are correct, is the appropriate relief. If the court should be of opinion that the complainants are entitled to their decree in respect to the surplus land, but should not consider the principles before stated correct, as to the manner in which it should be granted, no alternative seems to remain but that of adopting the original price (said to have been $5 per acre, and from calculation appearing to have been so) as the measure of compensation. The purchasers having had the use and received the rents and profits of the land should, as an equivalent, be decreed to pay interest, and an account should be decreed to ascertain the value of the paper money on the 20th December, 1779, and the interest which has accrued.

The length of time which has been suffered to intervene may perhaps be considered as amounting to a waiver of the complainant's equitable right, and be made an objection to a decree for relief in any shape.

In reply to this the following facts, which appear on the record, are stated:

That the defendants soon after their purchase removed to Kentucky, where they continued to reside, and that Mary Frazer and her representatives always resided in, or near Fredericksburgh, in Virginia.

Bledsoe, for the appellees.

Craig purchased Mary Frazer's interest, be it much or be it little. Her interest was all he purchased, and all he could obtain. And as evidence of it she assigned the plat and certificate of survey, that the patent might issue to Craig for whatever the survey contained. There was no mistake here. If Craig has got more land from the commonwealth of Virginia than he ought to have had, is Mary Frazer or her representatives to step into the *place of the [379 commonwealth to correct the error or the fraud? Or is she to step into Craig's place to defraud that commonwealth or to take advantage of the error of its officer because she once owned 2,000 acres of land which she has parted with? Had she carved and granted a definite interest out of her claim, retaining a part, the question might be differently settled. But in this case she would be worse than a volunteer who cannot be compensated in equity. She would be a volunteer mala fide.

A complainant in equity must recover on the strength and soundness of his own title. It is not sufficient that the defendant is in the wrong; the plaintiff must have right.

If the claim of the complainants to any part of the land itself were to be sustained, where would you begin on the survey to correct the error? On which end, side, or corner? The beginning and ending corners of a survey are arbitrarily designated by the surveyor when he makes out his plat and certificate: seldom or never corresponding with the actual stages of process on the ground itself.

But as it was clearly the intention of the parties that the whole should be sold, and as the evidence of the whole was transferred, the utmost that the complainants could, in any event conscientiously ask, would be, that the defendants should refund a part of the purchase money, in proportion to the surplus, with interest, which must be reduced by the scale of depreciation.

TODD, J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In the written arguments submitted by the parties, it is admitted by the counsel for the appellants that the evidence exhibited does not support the allegation in the bill; that the assignment was made during the minority of Mary Frazer. This admission renders it unnecessary for the court to go into a minute examination of the evidence; it will be sufficient to observe that the testimony is clear and satisfactory on this point; and, therefore, there is no pretense for setting aside the contract and decreeing a reconveyance of the land. But it is contended that the complainants are entitled *to relief in some shape for the surplus [380 land contained within the survey; either by a decree for the reconveyance of the surplus land, by a pecuniary compensation for it according to its present value, or by a pecuniary compensation according to the price at which the land was sold, on which interest should be allowed.

This argument assumes for its basis that there existed a mistake as to the thing sold. If there was a mistake, how did it originate, and who is injured thereby? Was there a mistake? It may be inquired to what quantity of land was Mary Frazer entitled by virtue of the Governor's warrant issued in pursuance of the royal proclamation? To two thousand acres. How much did she sell and receive payment for? Two thousand acres. It would appear from this that she had sold and received payment for as much land as she was entitled to. How comes it that this surplus was included in the survey? From the fraud, design, ignorance or negligence of the surveyor. Who is defrauded or injured thereby? The commonwealth of Virginia, and not Mary Frazer. For what is it asked that compensation shall be made? For land which, by the fraud, design, ignorance or negligence of the surveyor, Mary Frazer might by possibilty have been entitled to. Was the sale of this survey of a specific quantity, at a certain price per acre? or was it the sale of a specific tract? The bill alleges it was of the first description; the answers deny it, and say it was of the latter. There is no proof to support the allegation in the bill, unless from the survey, a power of attorney, and the receipt for the purchase money, it should be inferred, that as they relate to 2,000 acres of land, only that quantity was intended to be included in the sale. But this proof is conceived to furnish a very opposite conclusion—the description and designation of the tract of land sold, not as part of a tract, but an entire tract. The answers, being supported by the assignment, that it was a sale of the whole survey, and being also responsive to an allegation as well as to an interrogatory in the bill, must be taken as true and conclusive. When an assignment is made of a plat and certificate of survey, the purchaser takes it subject to the risk of its containing a less quantity than is expressed on its face, and should it contain more, he is entitled to it. In 381] the case of Young *v. Craig, decided by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, (a copy of which has been furnished and relied on by each party) the court say, "there was, particularly in the sales made at an early period "of this country, great liberality of admeasurement frequently allowed by the seller and "expected by the purchaser. Where this was "the case, to authorize a conclusion, from the "surplus contained in the boundaries of a "tract, that there was a mistake of quantity, "the surplus ought to be greater than usual in "conveyances made about the same period." Now, it appears from a statement in the bill, as well as from the general history of the country, that it was usual and customary to make considerable allowance in military surveys; and it is not shown that the surplus in this is greater than in other surveys made about the same time. Again, in the same case, the court proceed, "it would be obviously improper and unjust to lay down any general rule as to the rate "of surplus that would justify an inference of "mistake which would deserve correction; each "case must depend upon its own particular circumstances; whether such an inference would "be authorized in the present case, were the "sale in question per acre and not in gross, "need not be determined since we are of opinion it is of the latter description." If this reasoning be correct as to conveyances, it will apply with redoubled force to assignments of plats and certificates of survey, where the purchaser takes it subject to the risk of its containing less than it specifies.

Mary Frazer or the complainants can be considered in no other view than mere volunteers mala fide, and of course not entitled to the aid of a court of equity.

It seems, as a necessary consequence, if the complainants are not entitled to the surplus land, they are not to compensation in either of the other modes contended for. Where there is no right there can be no claim to compensation sustained.

Decree affirmed with costs.

*THE SALLY, PORTER, MASTER. [*382

Property engaged in an illicit intercourse with the enemy to be condemned to the captors, not to the United States. A municipal forfeiture under the laws of the United States is absorbed in the more general operation of the law of war. The prize act of 26th June, 1812, operates as a grant from the United States to the captors, of all property rightfully captured by commissioned privateers, as prize of war.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The facts of the case were as follow:

The brig Sally, John Porter, master, was captured by the privateer Jefferson, John Kehew, commander, July 7, 1812, as prize, and sent into the port of Salem in the District of Massachusetts, for adjudication. The Sally, at the time of her capture, had on board a coaster's manifest, and a permission from the collector of the port of Passamaquoddy, dated July 7, 1812, to proceed to Boston. From the manifest, her cargo purported to be one box of hones, and one box of furs. She had on board, also, about four thousand bushels of salt.

The Sally was licensed and enrolled for the coasting trade, at New London, June 6, 1812, upon the oath of John Patterson, of the city of New York, who swore that he was the agent of James Mavor, of New York, the owner.

Patterson was on board at the time of capture. Upon the return of the monition in the District Court, Patterson claimed the brig for Mavor, and Edward Monroe claimed the salt for himself and Lemuel P. Grosvenor, of Boston.

The affidavit of claim of Monroe did not state where the salt was taken on board, nor for what reason it was not mentioned in the manifest.

Patterson, Porter, the master, and the crew, upon the preparatory examinations, swore that the salt was put on board the brig at Robinstown and Eastport, in the District of Maine.

Among the papers found on board the Sally was a permission to land her cargo of 60 tons of cordage and 50 bolts of duck, from the deputy-collector of the port of Passamaquoddy, dated June 20, 1812.

*There was also found on board a [*383 letter to Messrs. Monroe & Grosvenor, Boston, dated Eastport, July 7, 1812, signed "L. P. G.," covering a bill of lading of the salt. In this letter it is said, "I am sorry to say that no clearance of the salt can be obtained on board the brig; I have, however, dispatched her, with a clearance of two small packages of John Brewer, consigned to us, and leave you to manage; it will, at least, be as well as the other goods sent—and I am hourly expecting a seizure to pay for sundry prizes taken from St. Andrews." Again: "A protection can be had, for any vessel bound here with provisions, from the English admiral," &c. St. Andrews is a small town in New Brunswick, a province belonging to Great Britain.

In the manifest of the Sally the two small packages above mentioned are consigned to Monroe & Grosvenor, Boston.

The captors produced witnesses in the District Court, who proved that the Sally discharged at St. Andrews her cargo of cordage, after the 1st July, 1812, and took in there the salt.

The vessel and cargo were condemned, in the District Court, to the captors, and an appeal entered by the claimants. In the Circuit Court the decree was affirmed, and Monroe and Grosvenor appealed to this court.

A claim was interposed by the United States as for a forfeiture under the non-intercourse act.

On the above statement (and upon the argument in the case of The Rapid, ante p. 155) the case was submitted.

Tuesday, March 15th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case cannot be distinguished from that of The Rapid. It was there decided that property engaged in an illicit intercourse with 384] the enemy is liable to confiscation *as prize of war, and the only remaining question now before us is, to whom it shall be condemned—to the captors, or to the United States.

By the general law of prize, property engaged in an illegal intercourse with the enemy is deemed enemy property. It is of no consequence whether it belong to an ally or to a citizen; the illegal traffic stamps it with the hostile character, and attaches to it all the penal consequences of enemy ownership. In conformity with this rule, it has been solemnly adjudged, by the same course of decisions which has established the illegality of the intercourse, that the property engaged therein must be condemned as prize to the captors, and not to the crown. This principle has been fully recognized by Sir William Scott, in The Nelly (1 Rob., 219); and, indeed, seems never to have admitted a serious doubt.

But a claim is interposed by the United States, claiming a priority of right to the property in question, upon the ground of an antecedent forfeiture to the United States, by a violation of the non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809 (vol. 9, p. 246, § 5), the goods having been put on board at a British port, with an intent to import the same into the United States.

We are all of opinion that this claim ought not to prevail. The municipal forfeiture under the non-intercourse act was absorbed in the more general operation of the law of war. The property of an enemy seems hardly to be within the purview of mere municipal regulations, but is confiscable under the jus gentium.

But even if the doctrine were otherwise, which we do not admit, we are all satisfied that the prize act of 26th June, 1812 (ch. 107), operates as a grant from the United States of all property rightfully captured by commissioned privateers, as prize of war. The language of the 4th, 6th and 14th sections is decisive.

The decree of the Circuit Court, condemning the vessel and cargo to the captors, is affirmed.

*THE EUPHRATES. [*385

Further proof, inconsistent with that already in the case, refused on the part of the claimant.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

The merchandise, in this case, was libeled in the District Court of Rhode Island as belonging to subjects of Great Britain. The capture was stated in the libel to have been made on or about the 23d day of August, 1812. No libel was filed against the vessel.

In June term, 1813, a claim was interposed on behalf of the United States, on the ground that these goods were imported in violation of the non-intercourse laws.

In May, 1813, Matthias Bruen interposed a claim to certain merchandise on board of the Euphrates, alleging that he is the sole legal owner thereof.

The papers connected with this shipment were as follow:

1. An invoice, dated Mansfield, 30th June, 1812, purporting the goods therein described to be shipped at Liverpool, under insurance, consigned to Mr. Henry Watkinson, New York, or, in case of his absence, to Mr. John French Ellis, of that place, for sale, on account of the manufacturers, Siddons & Johnston, who were British subjects.

2. A bill of lading by which it appeared that the goods were shipped at Liverpool, on the 7th of July, 1812, on board of the Euphrates, to be delivered to Henry Watkinson, he paying freight, &c.

1. A letter from Siddons & Johnston, dated Mansfield, 30th June, 1802, in which they say: "We have, this day, consigned to you for sale "on our account, sixteen trunks," &c., (which are the goods claimed). "We hope we shall "shortly hear of sales being made by you, to "advantage; we hope they will at least net us "what they are invoiced at, covering all ex- "penses. *We shall leave this ship- [*386 "ment to your discretion to make the best and "most advantageous returns you can."

There being no proof whatever on the part of the claimant, and he not appearing to have any interest whatever, by any of the papers on board, the goods were condemned both in the district and circuit courts, and the claimants adjudged to pay costs to the libelants.

From this decree there was an appeal, on the part of Mr. Bruen, to this court.

Harper, for the captors,

Stated that this was merely a question of further proof offered on the part of the claimants. The captors, he said, relied upon the documentary evidence produced in the cause. This evidence he stated to the court, and contended that it was too plain and consistent to justify the court in allowing the claimant further proof.

Stockton, contra,

Stated that the object of the further proof now offered was to show that Watkinson was agent for a manufacturing house in England; that the claimant ordered certain goods through this agent; that, on the passage of the non-intercourse act, he directed the goods not to be shipped, &c.

Daggett, same side,

Observed that it had been generally supposed that the rules of the English courts respecting further proof would not apply to the courts of the United States, but that parties would have the benefit of new evidence in this court, in prize cases as well as in other cases in admiralty; and that the parties in the present case had acted on that opinion.

The case was then submitted.

387* *Tuesday, March 15th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court does not understand the counsel for the appellant as contending that there was any error in the sentence of the Circuit Court, or that any other than sentence of condemnation could have been pronounced there. It was, indeed, a very clear case, on the proceedings before that court. But it is supposed that Mr. Bruen is entitled to an order for further proof, and that the facts which he will be able to make out, if an opportunity be afforded him, will entitle him to a restitution of the property.

Without rejecting the application on account of its being made at so late a period, the court has looked into the proof which it is proposed to bring forward, and, on comparing it with the proof already in the cause, we are of opinion that it is totally incompetent to make out a title in the appellant. There is not the least reason to believe that these goods were shipped in consequence of any previous orders given to Mr. Watkinson by merchants in this country, and transmitted by him to Messrs. Siddons & Johnston. On the contrary, whatever orders may have been sent to those gentlemen by Mr. Watkinson, it is most manifest that they did not, in this case, act upon them; for the invoice and letter accompanying the shipment announce, in terms not to be misunderstood, that these goods were sent to the United States for the exclusive account and at the sole risk of the British manufacturers.

It has not escaped the notice of the court that not one of the gentlemen who are alleged to have given orders for these goods on Messrs. Siddons & Johnston, through Mr. Watkinson, and who all reside in the United States, appears as a claimant for any part of them. Instead of this, we find them, or several of them, assigning their interest in this adventure, whatever it may be, to the claimant; but for what value does not appear; and every instrument takes care to express that the property is to be recovered at the risk and expense of Mr. Bruen. Thus is a total stranger to the shipment, and a mere volunteer who may not have 388 paid *a single cent for his title, made a party claimant; a mode of proceeding novel at least, and well calculated to awaken suspicions not at all favorable to his pretensions. Whether a title to goods obtained in this way would, under any circumstances, be sustained by a court of prize, we will not say; but it is, in our opinion, sufficient reason, of itself, to refuse the party any opportunity to make further proof. Mr. Bruen not only does not pretend that he owned any part of these goods at or previous to the time of capture, but merely that he was the legal owner at the time of filing his claim; and upon the affidavits now laid before the court, as the ground of an order for further proof, it appears that this legal title was acquired in the way already mentioned—that is, by a number of persons assigning to him a chose in action, which they must have considered of no value, or, at any rate, not worth pursuing. Such conduct can entitle the party to no favor or indulgence whatever. Upon the whole, the court is as well satisfied with the decree of the Circuit Court as it is with the total insufficiency of the evidence in reserve to produce any alteration in it.

The application, therefore, for further proof is rejected, and the sentence of the Circuit Court affirmed with costs.

Aff'g—1 Gall. 451. See Blatchf. Pr. 205.

THE MARY, STAFFORD, MASTER.

A case of withdrawing funds and further proof.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

The following is a statement of the facts connected with the case:

General Garret Visscher, alias Fisher, a native of the state of New York, entered into the British army before the revolution, and having obtained the rank of Lieutenant-General, died in England, rich, intestate, and without issue, leaving a large number of relatives, citizens of the state of New York, residing at or near Albany. Mr. Nanning J. Viss- [389 cher, one of the number, went to England, and met with no obstruction in obtaining letters of administration, and possessing himself of the estate to the amount of £150,000 sterling. In August, 1812, he set himself in motion to return to the United States, and did return, leaving Mr. Harman Visger, his agent, in England, to transmit the property to the United States, for the use of those concerned. Harman Visger, finding that he could not remit to this country in the course of exchange, without great loss, invested a large sum in goods of the growth and manufacture of Great Britain, and to transmit a part of them to the United States, hired, on freight, the brig Mary, an American registered vessel belonging to J. B. Kennedy, of South Carolina. The brig being at the port of London, was sent to Bristol, in July, 1812, to take on board this cargo. She arrived off that place, according to her log-book, on the 23d of the same month. On the 30th, an embargo was laid in England, on account of the war; and, on the 1st of August, the custom-house mark of stop was put on the Mary. Having been detained some time by the embargo, she sailed from Bristol, with the cargo on board, on or about the 15th day of August, 1812, bound to New York. Soon after she put to sea, she sprung a leak, and, on the 21st day of August, 1812, put into Waterford, in Ireland, to repair. Requiring a complete repair, her cargo was relanded and stored in the King's storehouses, and she was repaired by the freighter, at an expense of £1,700 sterling, to secure which he took from the captain a bottomry bond. On the 7th of April, 1813, the Mary sailed from Waterford; having cleared out for Newport, in Rhode Island, in order to avoid the blockade which was supposed to exist as to New York. Before sailing, a British license of the description usually denominated a Sidmouth license, was obtained for her from the King's privy council, by Mullet, Evans & Co., subjects of the King of Great Britain. The license ran in their name, and purported to be a renewal of a similar license granted on the 8th of July, 1812. She had no license from the American government. On the 23d of April, 1813, she was captured on the high seas, by the American privateer Paul Jones, and sent into Newport with a single prize-master on board, the captain being left in command of the vessel and in possession of the ship's papers. On her arrival at New-390] port, she was libeled *by the captors as being and bearing enemy property, and also by the United States for a breach of the non-intercourse acts. The claimants made application to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he, under the act of January 2, 1813, "directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures and penalties, in certain cases," remitted the forfeitures and penalties accruing to the United States.

The brig's papers were regular, proving her to be an American registered vessel.

The invoices and bill of lading stated her cargo to be shipped by Harman Visger, on account of the heirs of General Fisher, citizens of the United States, and consigned to Peter Remsen & Co., New York, to account with Nanning J. Visscher, administrator, or with Barent Bleecker, Esq., of Albany, agent for the heirs. The invoices were all dated 13th August, 1812. The bill of lading had no date; but by its reference to the invoices, the shippers have given it the semblance of the same date.

War was declared by the United States against Great Britain on the 18th of June, 1812, and the fact was known in London on the 26th of July following; the news was stated on that day in the public gazette in London, to have been received in Liverpool on the 18th of the same month.

The claimant was in England when the Mary sailed, and for some time after, and made no attempt to countermand the voyage. Insurance was obtained in England, freight paid, as well as license and brokerage money, and the exportation duties, before the Mary sailed.

The brig and cargo were acquitted in the District Court, but condemned in the Circuit Court; and from the decree of the latter the claimants appealed.

Stockton, for the claimants.

It is contended on the part of the appellants,
391*] *1. That the cargo in question having been purchased by citizens of the United States, either before the war was actually declared, or before that event was known in England, and with the sole intent of transferring American funds in England to the United States, the shipment was no act of illegal trading with the enemy, and no cause of forfeiture.

2. That the act of Congress of 2d January, 1813, authorizes this importation, and, by legal construction, amounts to a license for this vessel and cargo.

3. That the circumstance of the vessel's sailing with a Sidmouth license is no cause of forfeiture.

4. That the capture by the privateer was altogether unwarranted by its commission, and expressly against the instructions of the President of the United States; and, therefore, that the property ought to be restored with damages and costs.

As to the first point—the withdrawing of funds—we contend that a person found in a foreign country at the time of the breaking out of a war between that country and his own, has a right to do everything necessary to enable him to return to his own country with his effects. This doctrine is supported by weighty authorities, and is founded on principles of reason and justice. It is, besides, an act of sound policy in a nation to permit its own citizens to withdraw their funds from the hostile country; it is taking from the enemy's means of carrying on the war and adding to its own. According to the old rule on this subject, the withdrawing of funds from the enemy's country was a matter of right; but the modern rule of the Court of Admiralty has determined it to be a matter of favor merely. If it be a matter of favor, we conceive it is such a favor as both reason and policy would direct, in a case like this, to be granted. (See 4 Rob., 161, 195, The Madonna delle Gracie; Chitty's Law of Nations, 19, 20; 4 Rob., 191, 232, The Dree Gebroeders; 1 Bos. & Pul., 345. Bell et al. v. Gilson; 1 Rob., 184, 220, The Betty Cathcart.)

2. As to the act of the 2d January, 1813 (laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 341). This act amounts to a license from the *American govern-
[392 ment. The remission of the forfeitures incurred by a violation of the non-intercourse laws, is to be considered as legalizing voyages made under circumstances like those of the present case. The act ought to be liberally construed. It cannot be supposed that the United States meant to remit the penalties accruing to them for the violation of the non-intercourse laws, in order to benefit the privateersmen. The remission was intended exclusively for the benefit of the owners; against whose claim the legislature supposed the non-intercourse law to be the only bar.

Again, the act of 2d January must have been known in Ireland long before the Mary sailed from Waterford for the United States. She may therefore be considered as having sailed from that port under the faith of this act, as she had commenced her voyage from Bristol between the periods specified therein.

The act of 13th July, 1813, relinquishing the claims of the United States, &c., does not favor the claim of the captors, inasmuch as it relinquishes only the property of British subjects not captured in violation of the instructions of the 28th August, 1812; whereas, the property in the present case belonged to Americans.

The Mary sailed from Bristol, or, at all events, from London, which is to be considered as the terminus a quo of the voyage, in consequence of the repeal of the British orders in council; and is therefore to be considered as embraced in the President's instruction to privateers of 28th August, 1812.

3. The Sidmouth license is no cause of condemnation, inasmuch as the original license was obtained before the war was known in England, and the second was merely a renewal of the first; the British government conceiving themselves bound, in honor and good faith, to renew it.

There is no analogy between the present case and that of The Julia, decided yesterday. In that case the license was granted, flagrante bello, in order to neutralize belligerent property. But here, the granting of the license was only an act of justice, which the British government conceived themselves bound to perform.

393*] *The act of Congress of July 6th, 1812 (Laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 302, § 6), allows passports to be given for the safe transportation of any ship or other property belonging to British subjects, and then in the United States. This is just what the British government have done in the case of The Mary. The granting of the license was merely a reciprocity of good offices on their part.

But admitting this to be a case of sailing under the flag and pass of the enemy, still the vessel only, and not the cargo, would be liable to condemnation. As to this distinction between the ship and goods sailing under the enemy's flag, see Chitty's Law of Nations, p. 58; 5 Rob., 2, The Vrow Elizabeth.

4. This capture was illegal, being altogether unwarranted by the commission of the privateer, and directly in the face of the President's instruction of 28th August, 1812. This instruction prohibits the capture of "vessels "belonging to citizens of the United States "coming from British ports to the United "States laden with British merchandise, in "consequence of the alleged repeal of the "British orders in council." These were the precise circumstances of the vessel in question. The capture was therefore illegal.

That the President had a right to issue the instruction under consideration, cannot admit of doubt. By virtue of his office, he is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States; and, as such, has, in time of war, the whole public armed force of the nation under his control. The privateers of the United States constitute a part of that public armed force. The President was therefore authorized to issue this instruction. (2 Azuni, 355.)

From the preceding considerations, we trust the court will feel itself justified in reversing the sentence of the Circuit Court.

J. Woodward, contra.

If the character of the Mary was, prima facie, belligerent, she must be condemned. No 394] latent equities *can save her. That such was her character appears clearly from the examination in preparatorio; and a vessel must be acquitted or condemned generally, according as her character appears upon that examination. The license was for a British or American cargo. The presumption is that it was British. It was certainly British fabric. No American orders had been given for the goods. The whole appeared as British property, and at the risk of British subjects. If a vessel sails under such circumstances, she sails at her peril. (6 Rob., 24, The Marianna; 5 Rob., 194, The Tobago; 6 Rob., 134.)

But admitting, for argument's sake, that the property is, as the claimants contend, American property, still the transaction now under consideration was a withdrawing of funds from the enemy's territory after a full knowledge of the war, without the license of the American government; and therefore subjected the property so withdrawn to capture and condemnation as prize of war.

The property in question was certainly British long after the knowledge of the war in England, and the purchase of it by an American citizen in the territory of the enemy was an illicit trade, which is, of itself, cause of condemnation. That the property was British for a considerable time after the war was known in England appears from the dates of the invoices. They are all dated 13th August, 1812; from which circumstance (there being no bills of parcels) it is to be inferred that the purchase of the goods was made on that day; whereas the war was known in England, at all events, on the 26th of July preceding, and is stated to have been known in Liverpool on the 18th.

We contend, however, that this property was British, not only until the 13th of August, the time of the purchase, but that it is, at this day, strictly British property under color of an American name.

It does not appear from the record that the Mary sailed from London to Bristol with a view to the prosecution of the voyage to the United States. But if she did, there was an opportunity for countermanding the *voy-[395 age after it was known that war had been declared; and such countermand ought to have been given. If it might have been, and was not, the doctrine of putting in motion does not apply to the present case. The claimants were clearly in delicto, and no presumption can be made in their favor.

This voyage was in violation of the non-intercourse laws of the United States; and on that ground, also, the property is liable to condemnation.

With regard to trading with the enemy, we contend that not only the purchase of hostile goods in the enemy country, but also the payment, in that country, of freight, license and brokerage money, and of the exportation duties, amount to a trading with the enemy; and that every trading with the enemy is illegal. (1 Rob., 165, 196, The Hoop; The Juffrow Margaretha, cited in the same case, p. 181, note [Amr. Ed.,] 4 Rob., 191, 232, The Dree Gebroeders.) Several cases have been thought to favor an opposite doctrine; but the case now under consideration does not, we conceive, come within the principle of any one of them.

The first is the case of The Packet de Bilboa (2 Rob., 111, 133). But here, the vessel sailed before the war. The Mary, on the contrary, sailed with full knowledge of the war.

The next case is that of The Abby (5 Rob., 251). The same distinction exists here as in the last-mentioned case.

The case of Bell v. Gilson (1 Bos. & Pul., 345) has been overruled in the case of Potts v. Bell et. al. (8 T. R., 548.)

As to the license, it does not appear that any was granted on the 8th of July. The recital of such an one in the subsequent license is no evidence. The license in question, therefore, although it purports to be a renewal of a former one, is a license de novo, obtained with a full knowledge of the war; and is therefore cause of condemnation.

396*] Pinkney, in reply.

This is neither a case of trade with the enemy nor of domicile. Visscher had not acquired a British character by either of these means.

It is not a case of trading within the opinion of this court in the case of The Rapid. Visscher, the present claimant, was not domiciled in England. He returned to the United States almost immediately upon hearing of the war. He arrived long before the cargo. The transaction commenced and the goods in question were purchased before the war was or could have been known in England. No criminality can possibly be attached to the transaction, and therefore it cannot be a ground of forfeiture. This is the language of the English decisions on this subject.

It is admitted that if this enterprise had not been undertaken before knowledge of the war, and if some material part of it had not been actually carried into effect—if it had been entirely a new undertaking, and not with the view of withdrawing funds—it would have been a case within the rule of the law of nations, which prohibits trade with an enemy. But where the goods have been purchased before the war, as here, the case neither comes within that rule nor within the decisions of the English Court of Admiralty. Sir W. Scott admits that such goods may be withdrawn. (5 Rob., 141, The Juffrow Catharina.)

But if the court should be of opinion that this case comes within the general rule prohibiting trade with the enemy, still it will be recollected that that rule admits of relaxation under peculiar circumstances; and we conceive that the circumstances of the present case, if of any, will justify such relaxation. The putting into Waterford cannot, with any reason, be urged against us. That was an act of necessity, and was no discontinuance of the voyage. No new trading with the enemy took place there.

As to the Sydmouth license. It has already been shown that the original license was obtained on the 8th of July, a considerable time 397*] before information of the *war reached England. However criminal, therefore, the obtaining such a license might have been in time of known war, in a time of supposed peace it was perfectly justifiable and innocent; it was also absolutely necessary in the present case; the adventure could not have proceeded without a license. The British government was, in fact, bound to give it, by the universal custom of nations. Every nation is under a similar obligation. Our own government has authorized the President to grant such licenses.

But it has been said, that though the obtaining of the first license may be justified in this manner, yet the second, having been procured after knowledge of the war, will not admit of the same justification. Little need be added to what has already been said on this point. The second license was merely a renewal of the first; they are both, indeed, to be considered but one license. The first having been granted, the second was required, under the circumstances of this case, by the law of nations; or, if not, it was, at any rate, required by good faith. So the British government thought, and so they acted. This case is widely different from those of The Aurora and The Julia.

With regard to the President's instruction of 28th August, we contend that the Mary comes within both the letter and spirit of that instruction. Her national character is clearly shown by her register and other documents; she is proved to be owned by J. B. Kennedy, of South Carolina; and it is clear that she sailed on the faith of the repeal of the orders in council.

The power of the President to issue instructions to the privateers of the United States has already been considered. Congress has given him a twofold power over this part of the armed force of the nation. He is authorized to grant and to revoke their commissions. But omne majus continet in se minus; he may therefore grant with limitation, and he may revoke in part. In issuing the instructions in question, he has done nothing more than he had full power and authority to do.

Tuesday, March 15th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

The court made the following order:

*It is ordered that the claimant have [*398 leave to make further proof, by affidavits, as to the following points:

1. As to his own citizenship.

2. As to the names of the heirs of General Fisher who are interested in the property, the places of their residence, and their national character.

3. As to the time when Mr. Nanning J. Visscher went to England; the objects which he had in view in going thither; how long he resided there; when the cargo claimed by him was purchased; and when he returned to the United States. And,

4. As to the instructions which the Paul Jones had on board at the time of the capture of the Mary; and particularly, whether the instructions of the President of the 28th August, 1812, had been delivered to the captain, or had come to the knowledge of the captain at the time of the capture; or, whether the Paul Jones had been in port after the 28th of August, 1812, and before the capture.

It is further ordered, that the captors be also at liberty to make further proof as to these several matters.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
1960 BAGS OF COFFEE.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

The forfeiture of goods, for violation of the non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809, takes place upon the commission of the offense, and avoids a subsequent sale to an innocent purchaser, although there may have been a regular permit for landing the goods, and although the duties may have been paid.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, which restored a quantity of coffee which had been seized and libeled for violating the non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809 (vol. 9, p. 243, § 4, & 5).

The claimants in the court below alleged, by way of plea, that the coffee was regularly en-

399*] tered and the duties *secured according to law, after which they became the purchasers for a valuable consideration. They also denied that it was imported contrary to law.

The United States demurred to that part of the plea which states the purchase, &c., and took issue upon that part of the plea which denies the illegal importation. By the sentence of the District Court the demurrer was overruled, and the coffee restored; which sentence was affirmed in the Circuit Court, and the United States appealed to this court.

The cause was elaborately argued by the Attorney-General, Pinkney, for the United States, and by Boyd and Harper, for the claimants, at last term, and again at this.

The words of the statute which create the forfeiture, are: "That whenever any articles, "the importation of which is prohibited by "this act, shall, after the 20th of May next, be "imported into the United States," "all such "articles" "shall be forfeited."

Pinkney, late Attorney-General for the United States.

Two objections have been made to the claim of the United States for this forfeiture.

1. That the right of the United States does not vest until seizure and condemnation, and

2. That the United States are bound by the act of their officer in receiving the duties and permitting the goods to be entered.

1. The forfeiture occurs at the moment of committing the offense. The statute says whenever the act is done, the thing shall be forfeited. No other time is mentioned. The seizure is the consequence of the forfeiture, not its cause. The thing is first forfeited, and then seized. The forfeiture immediately follows the offense. The seizure is merely to ascertain the fact. This is the plain construction, or rather the letter of the statute.

There is a distinction between forfeitures at 400] common *law and those accruing under a statute. (3 Cranch, 351, United States v. Grundy et al.)

In that case the Chief Justice said: "Where "a forfeiture is given by a statute, the rules of "the common law may be dispensed with, and "the thing forfeited may either vest immedi-"ately, or on the performance of some particu-"lar act, as shall be the will of the legislature. "This must depend upon the construction of the "statute." The reason why the court decided in that case that the right to the ship did not vest in the United States immediately upon taking the false oath, was, that the United States had an alternative, either to take the vessel or its value, and until the United States had made their election, the right did not vest.

But there are two cases at common law where the forfeiture relates back to the time of the offense and avoids intermediate alienations—deodand and suicide. So also in the case of felony and flight. So also in all cases where the punishment for the offense is the forfeiture of the thing by which the offense was committed, or where the punishment cannot be inflicted on the person. In treason and felony, the forfeiture of personal chattels is not the punishment but a corollary, or consequence of the disability imposed on the person. But in regard to lands, the forfeiture relates to the time of the offense committed. With regard to purchasers the rule is caveat emptor. This is said to be a hard case, but there are other cases equally hard depending on the same rule. If goods are deposited with a merchant to keep, and he sell them, unless in market overt (and we have no market overt in this country), the sale is void and the owner may recover them from the purchaser who bought them without notice. This, too, is a hard case, but it is every day's practice.

To show that the forfeiture attaches at the moment of the offense committed, he cited 5 T. R., 112, Wilkins v. Despard; Salk., 223 and 12 Mod., 92, Roberts, v. Withered; 1 T. R., 252, Lockyer v. Offley.

2. As to the second point, he said it was impossible to contend that the United States were bound by their officer's ignorance of the fact of the forfeiture when he received the duties and granted the permit.

Boyd, contra. [401

The demurrer admits that the coffee was properly entered, that the duties were paid, and that there was a bona fide sale and transfer of the coffee, for a valuable consideration, before seizure. A forfeiture cannot overreach a bona fide sale to third person. That this is the rule at the common law is clearly proved by the very learned and elaborate argument of Judge Winchester in giving his opinion in the case of The Anthony Mangin (3 Cranch, 356), and the principle has been recognized by this court in the same case. (3 Cranch, 350, United States v. Grundy et al.) A forfeiture by statute is not more operative than a forfeiture at common law. There is no expression in the statute to justify the distinction. The common law says whenever a man shall commit treason or felony he shall forfeit his goods and chattels to the king.

Bona fide purchasers are favored at common law. (10 Ves., Jr., 104, Ex parte Edwards; 1 East., 94, 95; 2 Esp. N. P. Ca., 731; 12 Mod., 92; 2 Cranch, 390; 3 Cranch, 356; 6 Cranch, 133; 5 Bac. ab., 229.) The forfeiture must be followed by seizure and condemnation before the property can vest in the United States. This principle has been decided by this court in the St. Domingo cases, where the law being temporary and having expired after condemnation in the court below and before hearing in this court, the property was restored, which could not have been the case if the property was vested in the United States by the commission of the offense. If the title of the United States was complete at the time of the offense, and if the seizure was merely to ascertain the fact, the expiration of the law could not divest that title out of the United States, and this court must have affirmed the sentence of condemnation. (Yeaton et al. v. the United States, 5 Cranch, 281.) If the United States had not discovered the offense for three years, the act of limitations would have barred their claim. (2 Cranch, 336, Adams v. Wood.) If the coffee had been destroyed, the United States could not have recovered the duties, because the goods were not legally imported.

2. The United States are estopped from claiming the property by the acts of their officer, in granting the permit *and receiv- [402
ing the duties. The acts of officers are to be favored. (16 Vin., 114, tit. Officers; 17 Vin., 153.)

The permit to land the coffee, and the receipt for the duties, are conclusive evidence to all the world, except the illegal importer, that the coffee was lawfully imported. If a claimant encourage the vendee to buy, his claim shall be postponed to that of the purchaser. (Sugden on Vendors, 480.) Acceptance of rent is an admission of title. (18 Vin., 149.) So here acceptance of the duties is an admission of a lawful importation. A purchaser is only bound to use reasonable diligence. He has only to ask whether there be a regular permit to land the goods, and whether the duties have been paid. If the officers were mistaken, and have given evidence of a good title, their mistake ought not to injure an innocent purchaser. (2 Br. C. C., 389; 5 T. R., 118; 1 T. R., 260; 3 Cranch, 389, 390.)

The inconveniences of such a rule would be intolerable — the utmost prudence could not prevent a man from loss.

In personal chattels, possession is the criterion of title. (13 Ves., Jr., 121.)

Harper, on the same side.

This is a case of bona fide purchase, for a valuable consideration, without notice. It is presumed to be without notice because the contrary does not appear. The only case supposed to be against us is that of Roberts v. Withered (5 Mod., 191; 12 Mod., 92; Salk., 223). That was a case of detinue against the wrongdoer. There was no intervention of a purchaser without notice. The relation of the forfeiture to the time of the offense is never suffered to overreach an innocent purchaser without notice. Relation is a fiction of law which is never allowed to do injustice. Where a party not only conceals his claim, but gives out that the title is clear, he shall be postponed. The permit was evidence on which the claimant had a right to rely. No one can take advantage of his own act to injure another.

As to the common law doctrine of forfeit-
403*] ure, the *cases of treason and felony furnish the general rule; the cases of deodand, suicide and flight are exceptions. In treason and felony the forfeiture is admitted not to relate to the fact committed. In the case of deodand, the exception to the rule is founded on the notoriety of the fact. In the case of suicide the reason for the exception is that there is no other mode of punishing the offense, and flight is an admission of the fact, and a withdrawing himself from punishment. Notoriety, confession, and the inability to inflict other punishment are the grounds of these exceptions to the general rule. In treason and felony, if the goods are sold bona fide without notice, the forfeiture relates back only to the conviction. Unimpeached possession is evidence of unimpeached title. This principle applies to forfeitures under a statute as well as to those at common law. The rule caveat emptor, is never applied to secret liens.

Pinkney, in reply.

The letter of the act of Congress is plain and express. The forfeiture is the necessary and immediate consequence of the offense. No other time is mentioned. He did not mean to say that the title of the United States is consummated until condemnation. But the forfeiture attaches by the commission of the offense, and overreaches all intermediate acts. This doctrine is necessary for the public good, otherwise the rights of the United States would be defeated by fictitious sales, the fraud of which it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to detect. The forfeiture of the thing by which the offense is committed, is the punishment itself, not a mere consequence of a disability. It passes to the purchaser cum onere. Where legal rights have attached the rule caveat emptor always applies, but never to equitable liens without notice.

As to real estate, the relation in treason and felony was to the offense committed. Why did not the argument ab inconvenienti control the rule in that case? (Plowden, 260, 290.)

In the case of deodand, a horse kicks a man; before the man dies the horse is sold, the man dies, the horse is forfeited as deodand.

*Where is the notoriety? The true [*404 reason is, that it is the forfeiture of the offending thing. In felony, nothing but sale in market overt can prevent the relation of the forfeiture to the time of the offense. If felo de se give himself a mortal wound, and before his death convey his estate, and die, the conveyance is void. So in the case of flight after felony. The law looks principally to the thing for punishment.

The general rule of the law of England is that a purchaser of personal goods is not safe unless he purchased in market overt.

If the United States could be estopped by the acts of their officers, the plea is as good in behalf of the illegal importer as of the innocent purchaser. The purchaser was as much bound to know of the offense as the collector. But the collector had no authority to waive the penalty, and therefore cannot be presumed to have waived it. If he had even given a release of the forfeiture it would have been void.

The argument ab inconvenienti is rather an argument ad misericordiam. If there be hardship in the case, application should be made to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has power to relieve.

In the St. Domingo cases, the law had expired, without any provision being made to enforce the penalty in existing cases. After the expiration of the law the court had no authority to condemn; and the appeal annulled the sentence of the court below.

March 15th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., being absent.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This case has been argued very elaborately and has been a long time under consideration. But from the decision which the court has at length come to, its merits are brought within a very limited compass.

We are of opinion that the question rests altogether on the wording of the act of Congress, by which it is *expressly declared [*405 that the forfeiture shall take place upon the commission of the offense. If the phraseology were such as, in the opinion of the majority of the court, to admit of doubt, it would then be proper to resort to analogy and the doctrine of forfeiture at common law, to assist the mind in coming to a conclusion. But from the view in which the subject appears to a majority of the court all assistance derivable from that quarter becomes unnecessary.

It is true that cases of hardship and even absurdity may be supposed to grow out of this decision, but on the other hand, if by a sale it is put in the power of an offender to purge a forfeiture, a state of things not less absurd will certainly result from it.

When hardships shall arise, provision is made by law for affording relief under authority much more competent to decide on such cases than this court ever can be.

In the eternal struggle that exists between the avarice, enterprise and combinations of individuals on the one hand, and the power charged with the administration of the laws on the other, severe laws are rendered necessary to enable the executive to carry into effect the measures of policy adopted by the legislature. To them belongs the right to decide on what event a divesture of right shall take place, whether on the commission of the offense, the seizure, or the condemnation. In this instance we are of opinion that the commission of the offense marks the point of time on which the statutory transfer of right takes place.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Maryland on the demurrer, is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded that the issue in fact may be tried.

STORY, J. The decree which has just been pronounced by a majority of the court is decisive of the case of The Mars, which is now pending in this court, and my decision therein must be reversed. The opinion which I there held and the reasons which support it, are disclosed on the record, and though the discussion in this court has not increased my confidence in that opinion, nevertheless, as I am not yet satisfied 406] of its incorrectness, and two *of my brethren concur in it, I shall make no apology for introducing it in this place.

It is as follows:

The present information proceeds for a forfeiture of the brig Mars upon the allegation that the brig departed from the United States bound to a permitted port without giving bond pursuant to the act of the 1st of March, 1809, (ch. 91, § 16). There are other counts in the information which I need not now consider, because it is admitted there was a forfeiture under the first count, and the answer of the present claimant sets up, as a justification of his title, that he is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration and without notice of the offense; and it is admitted that this justification is true in point of fact, and that there have been no laches either as to the United States or as to the purchaser.

The question presented to the court is, whether property which has become forfeited to the United States, and afterwards, and before seizure, while remaining in the possession of the vendor, is sold to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, is protected against the claim of the United States.

This question is peculiarly delicate and interesting in whatever way it is considered. On the one hand it strikes at the root of almost all the forfeitures in rem which the legislature has provided to guard the revenue laws from abuse; and if the decision be against the United States, it may open a wide field for fraud and colorable transfers, to the encouragement of offenders. On the other hand, if the secret taint of forfeiture be indissolubly attached to the property, so that at any time and under any circumstances within the limitations of law, the United States may enforce their right against innocent purchasers, it is easy to foresee that great embarrassments will arise to the commercial interests of the country; and no man, whatever may be his caution or diligence, can guard himself from injury and perhaps ruin. Considerations of this nature have pressed heavily upon my mind, and I have therefore been solicitous to avoid a discussion involving so much public as well as private importance. I could have wished to have reserved *this [407 question for the consideration of all the judges in the highest tribunal, that in forming my opinion I might have had the light reflected from their minds, and the benefit of their acknowledged learning. The parties have, however, seen fit to pursue another course, and I shall meet the question as my duty requires without asking for shelter under any authority; though not without extreme diffidence.

Before I proceed to the principle question, it will be necessary to clear the way by adverting to some considerations which have grown out of the argument on each side. It should be remembered that this is not a case where the vendor was out of possession, and of course where the law might infer a want of due diligence in the purchaser. To such a case the maxim caveat emptor would certainly apply. Nor is the present a case where the sale was made at the first moment when the property came within the jurisdiction or grasp of the United States—for I should have little doubt that such a hurried sale could hardly be the foundation of a solid title. It is not a case of voluntary gift or collusive transfer which would probably share the fate of all bounties in fraud or exclusion of public rights. (Jones v. Ashurst, Skin., 357.)

It is admitted that the sale is bona fide, for a valuable consideration, and without any express or implied notice. Further, the statute, on which the information is founded, has declared that the property shall be wholly forfeited, if the offense be committed; but it has not declared at what time it shall take effect, to what time it shall relate, nor whether it shall be incapable of being purged by subsequent events. The forfeitures under the statute are to be distributed in the same manner as forfeitures under the collection act of 2d March, 1799, § 91, by which informers and officers of the customs, as well as the government, may acquire vested interests; and it follows, therefore, that these interests, as to informers and officers of the customs, cannot vest until their rights are ascertained by seizure or condemnation.

It has been argued on the part of the United States, that the forfeiture is, by the statute, made absolute on the commission of the offense, and as it was competent for the legislature to enact such a law, the title cannot be divested *by any subsequent event. That the [408 cases of forfeiture at the common law are not applicable because they depend upon the qualification annexed to them by the common law, which makes them conditional only, and not absolute forfeitures, whereas the present statute has annexed no qualification. And in support of this distinction the opinion of the Chief Justice in the case of The United States v. Grundy et al. (3 Cranch, 337), has been quoted where he says (p. 350): "It has been proved that in "all forfeitures accruing at common law, noth- "ing vests in the government until some legal "step shall be taken for the assertion of its "right; after which, for many purposes, the "doctrine of relation carries back the title to "the commission of the offense, but the dis- "tinction taken by the counsel for the United "States, between forfeitures at common law "and those accruing under a statute, is cer- "tainly a sound one. Where a forfeiture is "given by a statute the rules of the common "law may be dispensed with, and the thing "forfeited may either vest immediately or on "the performance of some particular act, as "shall be the will of the legislature. This must "depend upon the construction of the statute."

I entirely subscribe to the doctrine here stated by the Chief Justice. There can be no doubt that the legislature may provide that its forfeitures shall take effect differently from the course prescribed by the common law; but the question will always be: Have the legislature so done? If they have not, shall the rules of the common law govern in the absence of any positive declaration? It should be remembered, also, that the Chief Justice is here speaking in a case where the main question before him rested in a considerable degrec upon the point whether the legislature had not given an election of remedy, and suspended the vesting of any interest until the determination of that election. But I apprehend that the words of the Chief Justice by no means imply that when a forfeiture in rem is attached to a statute offense, the rules of the common law are of course excluded. They do not, in my judgment, import more than the opinion which I have already expressed. Now, in the case at bar, I cannot perceive in the language of the legislature any systematic exclusion of the common law as to forfeitures. They have declared 409] no more than that the *commission of an act shall induce a forfeiture; and so has the common law; but the question as to the nature and extent of the operation of this forfeiture is nowhere, that I can perceive, touched. This view of the subject leads me to deny another position assumed by the counsel for the United States, viz., that the doctrine of relation has nothing to do with the present controversy. In the progress of this examination, I think, if not already shown, it will sufficiently appear that the doctrine of relation has a very powerful influence in every essential view of the subject.

I will now consider the main question, which perhaps may be divided into two branches.

1. What is the interest or right which attaches to the government in forfeitures of property before any act done to vindicate its claims?

2. What is the operation of such act done to vindicate its claims, as to the offenders, and as to strangers?

1. As to the first point. In all cases at common law where lands are forfeited for the personal offense of the party, I take the rule to be universally true that until the offense is ascertained, by conviction and attainder, no title vests in the sovereign.

Before that time the party is entitled to the possession and profits of his lands, and the government have no vested right in them, either to enter or dispose of the estate. (2 Inst., 48; Staund., P. C., 192.) Nay, even after attainder until office found the sovereign is considered as having but a possession in law, and an office is necessary to complete a title. (Staund., P. C., 198.) The offender, therefore, has, until conviction, full power and authority to alien his lands and to convey to the purchaser a complete and legal, though defeasible seizin; and unless such conviction follow the offense the alienation is good against all the world. For, as Bracton says (Lib. 2, ch. 13, p. 30), "ea vero, quæ post fel- "oniam facta sunt, semper valent et tenent nisi "fuerit condemnatio subsecuta, et si fuerit sub- "secuta, non valent."

If this be true, and there seems to be no reason to doubt it, *it follows that the es- [410 tate of the offender is rightful, that he has both jus ad rem and jus in re; and consequently that the crown hath but a mere possibility which in no wise restrains the exercise of ownership over the property. (See 4 Bl. Com., 382.)

The same doctrine is also, in general, true as to like forfeitures of goods and chattels. (Bract. Lib. 2, ch. 13; Co. Lit., 391, a; Staund. P. C., 193; Id., 52; 2 Inst., 48; 2 Hawk., P. C., ch. 49.) Nor do the cases of deodand and suicide form any exceptions, for the authorities all concur that the forfeiture does not vest a property until the fact is found of record. (Foxley's case 5 Co., 109; Hales v. Petit, Plowd., 206, 262.) It has been supposed that goods waived vested ipso facto in the crown upon waiver; but on a careful examination of the authorities it will be found that the owner retains his full property until an absolute seizure by the crown. (Staund., prerog., lib. 3, ch. 25, p. 186; Fitz. ab. Estray, 2; 21 Edw. 4, 16.) For all purposes of alienation and sale therefore the property in goods and chattels remains in the owner notwithstanding the commission of an offense subjecting it to forfeiture; and consequently he may convey a good title against every person but the crown, and against the crown also unless in cases where the anterior relation applies. (Jones v. Ashurst, Skinn., 357.) I think therefore it may be assumed as a settled principle, that in forfeitures for personal offenses, before seizure or prosecution, the sovereign has no vested title.

Can the case be distinguished where the forfeiture is made to attach to the instrument itself by means whereof the offense is committed?

It seems to me that the most favorable cases for the United States, viz., deodands and waifs, conclusively show that no such distinction anciently prevailed, for whatever may be the effect of relation, it is certain that no property vested in the crown until seizure or inquisition. I infer, therefore, that no absolute property vested in the United States in the case at bar until actual seizure was made; and the decision in the King's Bench, in Lockyer v. Offley (1 T. R., 252), seems to me fully to support the inference. It has, indeed, been supposed by the counsel for the United States, that Roberts v. Witherell (1 *Salk., 223; 12 Mod., 92) and Wilkins [411 v. Despard (5 T. R., 112), support a contrary doctrine. But on examination they appear to me to confirm it. In the first, the action was detinue for property forfeited under the navigation act of Charles 2d, and the court held that the action will lay, because the bringing action amounted to a seizure. In the latter case there had been an actual seizure made for the forfeiture, and the sole question was if condemnation were not necessary to divest the property of the owner.

If I am right in the view which I have already taken of the subject, there can be little doubt that the title of the United States, so far as affects third persons, rests mainly on the doctrine of relation, and that the counsel for the United States must call in the aid of the common law to enforce the present claim. For if no title vests until seizure, there must, at the time of seizure, be a title in the offending party capable of being divested and of vesting in the United States. But at the time of the present seizure that title had been transferred to the present claimant and nothing was left in the vendor capable of transfer.

2. This leads me to the examination of the second point, viz.: What is the operation of the acts done by the sovereign to vidicate his title by forfeiture?

At common law, in case of attainder for treason or felony, the forfeiture of lands relates back to the time of the offense committed so as to avoid all intermediate changes and conveyances. (4 Bl. Com., 481, 487; Co. Lit., 390, b; Staund., P. C., 192), but in general, in like cases the forfeiture of goods and chattels relates back only to the time of conviction, so that all previous changes and alienations, and even bona fide gifts, are protected. (4 Bl. Com., 387; Co. Lit., 391; Staund., P. C., 192; Perk., § 29; Skinn., 357.) There are some cases in which the relation is carried back to the time of the inquisition made; but, unless that of suicide form an exception, there is no case where the relation is pressed beyond the time of prosecution. According to the decision in Plowden, 260, a felo de se forfeits all his goods and chattles, from the time of committing the act which occasions the death; and the doctrine seems to be supported by Rex v. Ward (1 Lev., 8.) The general 412] ground assigned for it is, that *otherwise the offender would go unpunished, and it is compared to the case of flight after felony. Now, admitting that this is a solid reason, and a sufficient foundation for a legal adjudication, it may well be doubted if the doctrine, or the decision in Plowden, required the forfeiture to relate back further than the death of the party.

The case was that Sir James Hales, the offender, was joint tenant with his wife of a term of years; and the question made was whether after inquisition the forfeiture should not relate back so as to overreach the right of survivorship which accrued to the wife.

Now, one of the judges (Weston) held that the forfeiture should only have relation to the death, at which time the title of the wife accrued; yet, in this concourse of titles, the king's title by prerogative should be preferred. (Plowd., 264.) And I find that Lord Hale (1 Hale., P. C., 414,) expresses great doubt whether, for all purposes, the relation could be carried back to the stroke which occasioned the death. Be this case as it may, it is the only exception to the general doctrine; and inter apices juris a case so unjust as that which robbed an unfortunate woman not only of the moiety which vested in her by survivorship from her husband, but of the other moiety absolutely vested in her by grant, I am glad to find is a judicial anomaly.

I have said that the case of a felo de se forms the only exception to the general rule. There are authorities to show that in case of flight for felony, the forfeiture, after it is found by inquisition, verdict, or indictment, relates back to the time of the flight so as to avoid all mesne acts. (Rex v. Wendman, Cro. Jac., 82.) But I think the better opinion, notwithstanding, is that it relates only to the time of finding the flight. (Co. Lit., 390; Staund., P. C., 192; 5 Co., 109, b; Bro. Forfeiture des terres, 119; Id. Relation, 31.) But it has been argued that admitting the rule that the forfeiture of goods and chattels in general relates back to the time of conviction, yet it is inapplicable to a case where a specific thing is declared forfeited by law, for in such case the corpus delicti attaches to the thing in whose hands soever it may come; and the case of deodand, put by counsel, in Plowden, 262, is cited in illustration. "If my horse strike a "man, *and afterwards I sell my horse, [413 "and after that the man dies, the horse shall "be forfeited." I do not find any authority to support this position, although it is cited as law in 1 Hawk., P. C., ch. 26, § 7, and in terms de la ley, deodand. It seems a peculiar case growing out of the avarice of the church and the superstition of the laity in ancient times. The distinction seems also countenanced by the court in Lockyer v. Offley (1 T. R., 252.) The counsel for the plaintiff there argued that the ship was forfeited the moment the smuggling was committed, even though she had afterwards come into the hands of a bona fide purchaser; and Mr. Justice Willes, in delivering the opinion of the court, in alluding to the argument that the forfeiture attached the moment the act was done, said: "It may be so as "to some purposes, as to prevent intermediate "alienations and incumbrances." To be sure this expression carries with it a pretty strong implication; but in the same case, returning to the argument, the same learned judge says: "I "do not know that it has been ever so decided— "it may depend upon circumstances, such as "length of possession, laches in seizing, or other matters." And the decision of the court went ultimately upon other grounds. I must, therefore, consider the authority as not fairly extending to this point, and indeed as rather leaning the other way. On the other hand, the case of lord and villain has been cited from Co. Lit., 118, § 117, to show that even where a right to seize property exists in the lord, it is not perfected by seizure so as to overreach prior alienations; for until seizure it is said that he has neither jus in re, nor jus ad rem, but a mere possibility. And the conclusion drawn from this example is not materially affected by the consideration that a contrary doctrine prevails in the case of the sovereign (Id., § 118), because the reason assigned is perfectly consistent with it—viz., that the property is in the sovereign before any seizure or office. I do not think much reliance can be placed upon analogies borrowed from the feudal tenures, because they were governed by peculiar and technical niceties, the reasons of which have long since ceased, and perhaps cannot now be well understood. But if the principle of the case put be that where the absolute property is not vested before the alienation, a subsequent seizure will not avoid such alienation if made bona fide, it is directly applicable to the case at bar.

414*] *I have already endeavored to show that the absolute property did not vest in the United States until seizure; and I think it would be a bold assertion that the United States could, before such seizure, have conveyed the property to a purchaser, or have clothed it with a national character. I consider a passage in Lord Hale's treatise on the customs as corroborating the view which I have already taken of this case. He says: "Though a title "of forfeiture be given by the lading or un- "lading, the custom not being paid, yet the "king's title is not complete till he hath judg- "ment of record to ascertain his title, for "otherwise there would be endless suits and "vexations; for it may be ten or twenty years "hence that there might be a pretense of for- "feiture now incurred." (Harg. Law tracts, 226.) According to Lord Hale even seizure would not be sufficient to fix the title in the king; but it must be consummated by a judgment of record.

But the point of difficulty is to decide whether the United States had not such an inchoate title as, connected with a subsequent seizure, would, by a retroactive effect, defeat the intermediate purchase. Now, it is precisely in this view that the case of villain may admit an unfavorable distinction; for until seizure the lord has not even an inchoate title, but a mere possibility. And though the property is in the like case of the sovereign said to be in him without seizure or offiee, yet I apprehend the title is not consummate until seizure or office; for uutil that time it could hardly be held that a purchaser under the villain, or even the villain himself, had a tortious possession and use of the property. The case of villenage, then, even supposing it to apply, does not go quatuor pedibus with the present. The case of Attorney-General v. Freeman (Hard., 101), has also been relied on by the claimant. In that case the party, after outlawry and before inquisition, made a bona fide lease of his lands; and it was held that the forfeiture did not overreach the title of the purchaser.

But I do not think that much reliance can be placed on this case, because it turned on a settled distinction that until inquisition the king has no title in the real chattels or freeholds of the outlaw; but in personal chattels the title is in the king without inquisition. (1 415] *Ld. Ray., 305; Salk., 395; 12 Mod., 176.) And the relation does not extend beyond the time of the commencement of the title. The case of The Anthony Mangin (3 Cranch, 356, n.) before Mr. Justice Winchester, is the only other authority that I recollect which has been thought materially to bear upon the question. I entertain the most entire respect for the opinions of that truly able and learned judge; and although the decision of that case did not rest upon the present question, it is but justice to acknowledge that it has thrown great light on the subject, and enabled us all to meet the stress of this cause with more certainty than could otherwise have been done. It was very clearly the opinion of the learned judge that a seizure did not relate back to the time of forfeiture so as to overreach an intermediate bona fide conveyance; and he has certainly offered cogent reasons in support of that opinion. But after a diligent examination of the authorities cited by him, I am well satisfied that the point has never been solemnly adjudged, and must now be decided upon principle.

It seems to be a rule founded in common sense, as well as strict justice, that fictions of law shall not be permitted to work any wrong, but shall be used ut res magis valeat quam pereat (3 Rep., 28, b.), and this rule, so equitable in itself, seems recognized in the common law. (13 Rep., 21; 2 Vent., 200.) And in respect to the doctrine of relation, this rule has been admitted in its fullest extent in civil cases. (Bro. Relation, 18; 1 H., 7, 17; Bro. Debt, 139; 6 Rep., 76, b; 3 Rep., 28 b.) For it has been repeatedly adjudged that relations shall never work an injury, "and shall never "be strained to the prejudice of a third per- "son who is not a privy or a party to the "act;" and further, that "in destruction of "a lawful estate vested, the law will never "make any fiction." (3 Rep., 29; 2 Vent., 200.)

It is true, as we have already seen, that a different rule prevails as to forfeitures of lands in treason and felony, founded probably on feudal principles, or the barbaric character of the times; yet even as to cases of treasou and felony a striking distinction is admitted in favor of goods and chattels; and mesne acts before conviction or inquisition are suffered to retain their actual validity.

*Looking to the vast extent of com- [416 mercial transfers the favor with which navigation and trade are fostered in modern times, and the extreme difficulty of ascertaining latent defects of title, it seems difficult to resist the impression that the present is a case which requires the application of the milder rule of the law.

If the principle contended for by the government be admitted in its full extent, it will be found very difficult to bound it. A bale of goods which is once contaminated with a forfeiture will retain its noxious quality through every successive transfer, even until it has assumed under the hands of the artizan its ultimate application to domestic use. Yet such a position would strike us all as monstrous. If we say that the forfeiture shall cease with the change of the identity of the whole package, as such, still an intrinsic difficulty remains. The object of the government would be completely evaded by the offeuder, and the innocent purchaser would sink under the pressure of frauds which he could never know, nor by diligence avert.

On the whole I have come to the result, not however without much diffidence of my own opinion, that a forfeiture attached to a thing conveys no property to the government in the thing, until seizure made or suit brought. That previous to that time the owner has the exclusive right of possession and property, though the government may be considered as having an inchoate title, or possibility. That against the offender or his representatives, upon seizure or suit, the title by operation of law relates back to the time of the offense so as to avoid all mesne acts; but as to a bona fide purchaser, for valuable consideration and without notice of the offense, the doctrine of relation does not apply so as to divest his legitimate title.

Considering, as I do, that this question is of very great importance, I trust that it will receive the decision of the highest tribunal; and I shall not feel humbled if, upon better examination, a different doctrine shall prevail by the judgment of that court.

I do therefore adjudge and decree that the decree of the District Court in the premises be affirmed.

417*] *THE UNITED STATES v. THE BRIGANTINE MARS.

A forfeiture under the 3d section of the act of 28th June, 1809 (ch. 9), will overreach a bona fide sale to a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the offense.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court of Massachusetts District, which affirmed the sentence of the District Court, restoring the brig to the claimants.

An information was filed against the brig Mars, for a breach of the act of 28th June, 1809 (entitled "An act to amend and continue "in force certain parts of the act, entitled an "act to interdict the commercial intercourse," &c.), in departing from port without having given bond according to the 3d section of the act, which provides that "if any ship or vessel "shall, contrary to the provisions of this sec- "tion depart from any port of the United "States without clearance, or without having "given bond in the manner above mentioned, "such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, "shall be wholly forfeited."

The vessel, after her return to the United States, and before seizure, was bona fide purchased by the claimants, for a full and valuable consideration, without notice of the offense. Upon this ground she was by the decree of the District Court ordered to be restored; which decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court. Judge Story's opinion in pronouncing that decree, will be found in the preceding case of the United States v. 1960 Bags of Coffee.

This case having been submitted upon the arguments which were had in that case,

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"This case depends upon the principle established in the case against the coffee, the Bohlens, Claimants.[1]

THE FRANCES, BOYER, MASTER.

(Irvin's claim.)

No lien upon enemy's property, by way of pledge for the payment of purchase money, or otherwise, is sufficient to defeat the rights of the captors, in a prize court, unless in very peculiar cases where the lien is imposed by a general law of the mercantile world, independent of any contract between the parties. Where goods are sent upon the account and risk of the shipper, the delivery to the master is a delivery to him as agent of the shipper, not of the consignee; and it is competent to the consignor, at any time before actual delivery to the consignee, to countermand it, and thus to prevent the consignee's lien from attaching.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court of Rhode Island, condemning certain British goods captured on board the Frances. These goods were claimed by Thomas Irvin, a domiciled merchant of the United States, on the ground of lien.

Irving, for appellant.
Pinkney, for captors.

Tuesday, March 15th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of court as follows:

Thomas Irvin is a merchant of New York, and claims certain packages of merchandise consigned to him by Robertson & Hastie, and also three boxes of merchandise consigned to him by Pott & M'Millan. The consignors were British subjects, residing in Great Britain at the time that these goods were shipped, which, according to the terms of the bills of lading, were on account and risk of the shippers.

It is not pretended that the real ownership in these goods was not vested in the consignors, enemies of the United States; but the claimant founds his pretensions on a lien created on the goods consigned by Robertson & Hastie, in consequence of an advance made to the shippers, in consideration of the consignment, by his *agent in Glasgow; and on the [*419 goods shipped by Pott & M'Millan, in virtue of a general balance of account due to him as their factor. To establish these claims in point of fact, an order for further proof is asked for, and the question is, whether, if proved, the claim can, in point of law, be sustained?

The doctrine of liens seem to depend chiefly upon the rules of jurisprudence established in different countries. There is no doubt but that, agreeably to the principles of the common law of England, a factor has a lien upon the goods of his principal in his possession, for the balance of account due to him; and so has a consignee for advances made by him to the consignor. The consignor or owner cannot maintain an action against his factor to recover the property so placed in his possession, without first paying or tendering what is thus due to the factor. But this doctrine is unknown in prize courts, unless in very peculiar cases, where the lien is imposed by a general law of the mercantile world, independent of any contract between the parties. Such is the case of freight upon enemies' goods seized in the vessel of a friend, which is always decreed to the owner of the vessel. (Abbott on Shipping, 184.) It is, to use the words of Sir W. Scott, "an in- "terest directly and visibly residing in the sub- "stance of the thing itself." The possession of the property is actually in the owner of the ship, of which, by the general mercantile law of all nations, he cannot be deprived until the freight due for the carriage of it is paid. He has, in fact, a kind of property in the goods by force of this general law which a prize court ought to respect, and does respect. On the one hand, the captor, by stepping into the shoes of the enemy owner of the goods, is personally benefited by the labor of a friend, and ought, in justice, to make him the proper compensation; and on the other, the ship-owner, by not having carried the goods to the place of their destination, and this, in consequence of an act of the captor, would be totally without remedy to recover his freight against the owner of the goods.

But in cases of liens created by the mere private contract of individuals, depending upon the different laws of different countries, the difficulties which an examination of such claims would impose upon the captors, and 420] *even upon the prize courts, in deciding upon them, and the door which such a doctrine would open to collusion between the enemy owners of the property and neutral claimants, have excluded such cases from the consideration of those courts. In the case of the Tobago (5 Rob., 196), where an attempt was made by a British subject to set up a bottomry interest on an enemy's ship, Sir W. Scott observed, that no precedents to sanction such a claim could be produced; and he very properly concluded, that this was strong evidence that it had not been the practice of the court to consider such bonds as property entitled to its protection. And it seemed to be conceded that, upon the same principle, the captor could not entitle himself to the advantage of such liens, existing in an enemy, upon neutral property. From this it appears that the doctrine of the prize courts upon this subject works against as well as in favor of captors. The case of The Marianna, in 6 Rob., avoids all the objections made to the application of the case of The Tobago to the present. It is precisely in point.

The principal strength of the argument in favor of the claimant in this case, seemed to be rested upon the position that the consignor in this case could not have countermanded the consignment after delivery of the goods to the master of the vessel; and hence it was inferred that the captor had no right to intercept the passage of the property to the consignee. This doctrine would be well founded if the goods had been sent to the claimant upon his account and risk, except in the case of insolvency. But when goods are sent upon the account and risk of the shipper, the delivery to the master is a delivery to him as agent of the shipper, not of the consignee; and it is competent to the consignor, at any time before actual delivery to the consignee, to countermand it, and thus to prevent his lien from attaching. Upon the whole, the court is of opinion that, upon the reason of the case, as well as upon authority, this claim cannot be supported, and that the sentence of the court below must be affirmed with costs.

LIVINGSTON, J. I differ in opinion from the majority of the court. Irvin had a lien on the goods, apparent on the face of the papers. I have no difficulty in condemning the property subject to that lien; but I cannot assent to an unqualified condemnation.

For other claims in case of same vessel, see 8 Cranch, 335-363.

*THE THOMAS GIBBONS, [*421

ROCKWELL, MASTER.

Under the 8th section of the prize act of June 26th, 1812, the President had full authority to issue the instruction of 28th August, 1812.

The commission of the privateers of the United States may be qualified and restrained by the instructions of the President.

A shipment made, even after a knowledge of the war, is to be considered as having been made in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, if made within so early a period thereafter as would leave a reasonable presumption that the knowledge of that repeal would induce a suspension of hostilities on the part of the United States.

By the mere act of illicit intercourse the property of a citizen is not divested ipso facto, it is only liable to be condemned as enemy property, or as adhering to the enemy, if rightfully captured during the voyage.

The President's instruction of 28th August, 1812, was meant to protect all British merchandise on board an American ship, without any exception on account of British proprietary interest.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia.

The ship Thomas Gibbons sailed from Liverpool for Savannah on the 16th of August, 1812, was captured on the 12th of October following, on the high seas, off Tybee light house, and, the same day, brought into the port of Savannah as prize to the privateer Atas.

The ship and cargo were under the protection of a special license, dated 21st July, 1812, and conceived in the usual terms of the document usually denominated the Sidmouth license, except that, in this instance, the protection was extended to the return voyage back to Liverpool, there to discharge the cargo, and receive freight, if it should be found not to be allowable for the vessel and cargo to enter the ports of the United States.

The clearance from Liverpool, 13th August, 1812, mentioned the ship as being released, in consequence of her license, from an embargo laid on American vessels.

The cargo, shipped at Liverpool by sundry British merchants, was consigned to sundry commercial houses at Savannah, and was claimed by the respective consignees; by some, in their own behalf, and by others, in behalf of their correspondents in the interior.

From the evidence introduced into the cause, it appeared that part of the goods, although expressed to be on account and risk of the consignees, was shipped without previous orders or authority; that some of them were shipped under general orders (transmitted in time of peace) to ship goods; others, under particular orders given during the operation of the orders in council and the non-intercourse act; such as, to ship "when the trade opened," "at a proper season," "as soon as it was legal to ship to the United States," &c.; and lastly, that some of them were shipped with an understanding that they were to become the property of the citizen consignee upon arriving at the port of destination.

422*] *The commission of the Atas was granted on the 24th of September, 1812, and was accompanied by a copy of the President's instruction to privateers, of the 28th of August, 1812, by which the public and private armed vessels of the United States are directed not to interrupt "any vessels belonging to citizens of "the United States coming from British ports "to the United States laden with British mer- "chandise, in consequence of the alleged repeal "of the British orders in council."

Jones, for the the captors,

Contended that the ship and cargo were enemy property.

I. Constructively so, by the maritime law of nations, according to which law the hostile character is impressed.

1. By being placed, by the enemy's pass or license, infra præsidium hostis; and by the employment and course of traffic. (1 Rob. 10, 11, The Vigilantia.)

2. By direct trading with the enemy, flagrante bello.

II. Actually so, with regard to a great proportion of the cargo, according to the principles of municipal law, as recognized and acted upon by prize courts, in administering the maritime law of nations; according to which,

1. Goods shipped without previous orders or authority, although expressed to be on account and risk of the consignee, continue the property and at the risk of the enemy shipper, until accepted by the citizen consignee.

2. General orders (transmitted in time of peace) to ship goods, are, ipso facto, superseded, if war intervene and render the act unlawful as well as dangerous.

3. Particular orders (given during the operation of the orders in council and the non-intercourse act) to ship "when the trade opened," or "at proper seasons," or "as soon as it was 423*] legal to ship to the United *States," could not authorize a shipment, merely upon the conditional revocation of the orders in council, whilst the American non-intercourse act continued in force; a fortiori if war should supervene.

4. The proprietary interest in goods shipped with an understanding that they are to become the property of the citizen consignee, upon arriving at the port of destination, continues in the enemy shipper until arrival and delivery, without regard to the terms in which the consignment is ostensibly made. (2 Rob. 111, The Packet de Bilboa.)

That, therefore, goods captured in itinere, under either of the foregoing predicaments, were to be treated as the property and at the risk of the shipper, and as partaking of his national character.

The principal question, he said, which would now be agitated was, whether the instruction of the President of the United States to American privateers, of 28th August, 1812, extended to the case now under consideration. He contended that it did not; or if it did, that it could not legally avoid the capture, nor in any manner affect the rights of the captors, quoad the prize in question, but could only be enforced (as originally intended) by the exercise of executive discretion and authority over the commission of the privateer. That, according to the decision in the case of The Sally, that the prize act operates as a grant from the United States to the captors, the President could not deprive them of their rights under that act. That the power of the President to instruct must be limited by the rights so granted to the captors. That the authority with which he was invested by Congress was only given him to regulate the conduct of our privateersmen, and to prevent abuses; not to limit their rights already vested. That he had no general authority to limit the rights of war, as was clear from the passage of particular acts of Congress investing him with the respective powers of removing British subjects, of giving licenses to depart, &c., which would have been wholly unnecessary had he possessed a general power over these matters. That the position contended for was further supported by the terms employed in the third section of the prize act, in which the owners, &c., of privateers are required to give bond *to the United [424 States that they will observe "the instructions which shall be given them according to law, for the regulation of their conduct;" also by the letter of the Secretary of State (Mr. Monroe) to Mr. Russell, of August 31st, 1812, written under the eye of the President, in which the secretary says, that it was not in the power of the President to control the privateers, except by an indiscriminate revocation of their commissions. But,

2. That, admitting the power of the President to issue the instruction under consideration, the present case was not embraced thereby. That the property in question, having been shipped after a full knowledge of the war, could not be considered as shipped in consequence of the alleged repeal of the orders in council. That the only time in which the shipments contemplated by the instruction could be made, was that which intervened between the repeal of the orders in council and the knowledge of the declaration of war; after which it was unreasonable to calculate on the safety of property shipped for the United States. That the ship, also, was not within the description of vessels intended by the instruction to be exempted from capture, because she was engaged in an illicit intercourse with the enemy, under an enemy passport issued after the knowledge of the war in England, and was therefore quasi enemy property. That, at all events, the property intended to be protected, by the instruction from capture, was American property, and not British, and therefore that, as to the latter, the capture was certainly rightful.

Harper, contra.

It has been said, on the part of the captors, that the President had no authority to issue the instruction of 28th August, either on general principles or under the prize act. We contend that his authority to issue it may be established on either of these grounds.

1. On general principles. The President, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, has, in time of war, the whole public armed force of the nation under his control. The privateers of the United States constitute 425] a part of the public armed *force. This appears from their commissions, without which they would be pirates. On general principles, therefore, the President was authorized to issue the instruction in question.

2. By the 8th section of the prize act, the President is authorized to establish and order suitable instructions for the better governing and directing the conduct of the privateers of the United States. Now, this "governing and directing" their conduct, we conceive, may be applied as well to the designation of the objects of hostility as to the mode of attack, &c. It is applicable, in our opinion, to their whole conduct.

But it is contended, that the present case is not embraced in the instruction. It is said that the ship did not sail in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council. What, then, we would ask, was the motive for sailing at the particular time this vessel sailed? What could have induced the master to sail after knowledge of the war, but a confidence that the repeal of the orders in council would have put a period to hostilities? It is well known that such a confidence did exist among the merchants in England generally, and that it continued until it was ascertained in that country that the repeal of the orders had not produced the expected effect. The act of Congress of 2d January, 1813, remitting certain fines, forfeitures, &c., has fixed upon the 15th of September as the period when it was known in England that this effect had not been produced. This vessel sailed on the 16th of August preceding. We insist, therefore, that notwithstanding the existence of hostilities was known in England at the time the Thomas Gibbons sailed, yet she sailed in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council.

The expression in Mr. Munroe's letter of 31st August was probably accidental—certainly incidental, and not a particular object of the letter.

The expression "British merchandise," in the instruction of 28th August, was not intended to designate the right of property, but the kind of goods. It was the policy of government to 426] protect British as well as *American property shipped under the particular circumstances mentioned in the instruction.

Pinkney, on the same side.

The President cannot coerce the privateers of the United States to do what he pleases, but he may restrain them as he thinks proper.

It has been said that the license under which this vessel sailed was issued after knowledge of the war in England. This must be a mistake. It is dated on the 21st of July, 1812, when the war was not known in England; and it is to be presumed that it was issued at the time it bears date. Being issued, therefore, before knowledge of the war, it does not give a hostile character to the vessel.

Harper. The property is vested in the captors only when legally taken, it is vested sub modo.

STORY, J. That is the rule as laid down in the opinion of the court delivered this morning in the case of The Sally. The prize act vests only property lawfully captured.

Jones, in reply.

The captors may be punished, if guilty; but the captured property must vest in them notwithstanding. The instruction applies only to American vessels; but the license, we still contend, gave the vessel in question a hostile character.

Where the instruction speaks of British merchandise, the meaning is, British merchandise belonging to American citizens. This construction is consistent with all the acts of Congress on the subject, especially the act of 2d January, remitting forfeitures, &c. It is consistent also with Mr. Russell's declarations to the British merchants. (See 2d vol. of reports of committees, p. 30.)

Wednesday, March 16th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J., and JOHNSON, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

*The ship Thomas Gibbons, laden [427 with a cargo of British manufactures, on account of British and American merchants, sailed from Liverpool, in Great Britain, on the 16th August, 1812, bound for Savannah, in Georgia, and was captured on the 12th of the ensuing October, on the high seas, off Tybee light-house, by the private armed vessel Atas, Thomas M. Newhall, commander, and, on the same day brought into Savannah as prize of war. The ship sailed from Liverpool, under the protection of a special license, dated the 21st of July 1812, granted by Lord Sidmouth, by order of the privy council, whereby the ship and cargo were protected from British capture, not only on the voyage to the United States, but also on the return voyage to Liverpool, in case the master should not be permitted to land the cargo in the United States; and the master was further allowed, in case of return, to receive his freight, and proceed in ballast to any port not blockaded.

The commission of the Atas was granted on the 24th of September, 1812, accompanied by a copy of the President's instruction of the 28th of August, 1812.

A libel was filed in the District Court of Georgia, upon which regular proceedings were had against the ship, as prize of war. The respondents interposed their claims and the District Attorney also interposed a claim in behalf of the United States. At the hearing, the District Court dismissed the libel of the captors, and upon appeal, the decree was affirmed in the Circuit Court.

The principal question which has been moved at bar is, whether the capture of the ship was lawful; and that depends upon the authority of the President to issue that instruction, and upon the true construction of it, if rightfully issued.

As to the authority of the President, we do not think it necessary to consider how far he would be entitled, in his character of Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of the United States, independent of any statute provision, to issue instructions for the government and direction of privateers. That question would deserve grave consideration; and we should not be disposed to entertain the discussion of it, unless it become unavoidable. In the case at 428*] *bar, no decision on the point is necessary, because we are all of opinion that, under the eighth section of the prize act of 1812 (ch. 107), the President had full authority to issue the instruction of the 28th of August. That section provides, that the President shall be authorized "to establish and order suitable instructions for the better governing and directing the conduct" of private armed vessels commissioned under the act, their officers and crews. The language of this provision is very general, and in our opinion it is entitled to a liberal construction, both upon the manifest intent of the legislature, and the ground of public policy.

It has been argued, that privateers acquire by their commissions a general right of capture under the prize acts, which it is not in the President's power to remove or restrain, while the commission is in force; that therefore his right to issue instructions must be construed as subordinate to the general authority derived from the commission; and that, in this view his instructions should extend only to the internal orginization, discipline and conduct of privateers.

We cannot, on mature deliberation, yield assent to this argument. It is very clear that the President has, under the prize act, power to grant, annul and revoke, at his pleasure, the commissions of privateers; and by the act declaring war, he is authorized to issue the commission in such form as he shall deem fit. The right of capture is entirely derived from the law. It is not an absolute, vested right, which cannot be taken away or modified by law. It is a limited right, which is subject to all the restraints which the legislature has imposed, and is to be exercised in the manner which its wisdom has prescribed. The commission, therefore, is to be taken in its general terms, with reference to the laws under which it emanates, and as containing within itself all the qualifications and restrictions which the acts giving it existence have prescribed. In this view, the commission is qualified and restrained by the power of the President to issue instructions. The privateer takes it subject to such power, and contracts to act in obedience to all the instructions which the President may lawfully promulgate.

Public policy, also, would confirm this con-
429*] struction. *It has been the great object of every maritime nation to restrain and regulate the conduct of its privateers. They are watched with great anxiety and vigilance, because they may often involve the nation, by irregularities of conduct, in serious controversies, not only with public enemies, but also with neutrals and allies. If a power did not exist to restrain their operations in war, the public faith might be violated, cartels and flags of truce might be disregarded, and endless embarrassments arise in the negotiations with foreign powers. Considerations of this weight and importance are not lightly to be disregarded; and when the language of the act is so broad and comprehensive, we should not feel at liberty to narrow or weaken its force by a construction not pressed by the letter, or the spirit, or the policy of the clause. On the whole, we are all of opinion that the instruction of the President of the the 28th of August, is within the authority delegated to him by the prize act.

But it is argued that, admitting its legal validity, this instruction cannot protect the ship and cargo from capture as prize of war, because the cargo was shipped after a full knowledge of the war, and not "in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council."

We are of a different opinion. We think that a shipment made, even after a knowledge of the war, may well be deemed to have been made in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, if made within so early a period as would leave a reasonable presumption that the knowledge of that repeal would induce a suspension of hostilities on the part of the United States. Congress have evidently acted upon this principle; and have themselves fixed the time (the 15th of September, 1812), before which, shipments might be reasonably made upon the faith of that presumption. (Act of 2d January, 1813, ch. 149.) We are not inclined to hold a less liberal construction in favor of the acts of individuals proceeding from a confidence in the avowed intentions of the government.

It is further argued, that the ship was not within the description of vessels intended by the instruction to be exempted from capture, because she was engaged in an illicit intercourse with the enemy, under an enemy passport, and therefore was quasi enemy property. We cannot assent to this argument. The ves- [
430 sels exempted from capture are "vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, coming from British ports to the United States." The ship, in this case, was duly documented as an American, was coming to the United States, and from a British port. How can it be possible to bring a case more perfectly within the terms of the description? The argument proceeds upon the supposition that by the mere act of illicit intercourse, the property of an American citizen becomes divested ipso facto; but, in point of law, this is not the operation of the rule. The property is only liable to be condemned as enemy property, or as adhering to the enemy, if rightfully captured during the voyage. But it has never been supposed that the documentary character of the ship itself, or the character of the owner, was completely changed for every other purpose. It is sufficient, however, in our opinion, that no such distinction as that assumed in the argument is to be found in the instruction itself; and we therefore hold the case within the natural and ordinary import of the language.

It is further argued that, at all events, the property intended to be protected by the instruction from capture was American property, and not British property; and therefore that, as to the latter, the capture was rightful. This is a question of some difficulty; but, on full consideration, a majority of the court are of opinion that the instruction meant to protect all British merchandise on board an American ship, without any exception on account of British proprietary interest. It was supposed that British as well as American merchants might, upon the repeal of the orders in council, be induced to make shipments, upon the faith that such repeal would suspend the further operations of hostilities. The government meant to reserve to themselves the ultimate disposal of sueh property, in order that they might restore or eondemn it, as publie poliey or the natioual interests might require. This eonstruetion is supported aud eonfirmed by the act of Congress, of 13th July, 1813 (ch. 10), which, after relinquishing to eaptors all the right and title of thc United States, to the property of British subjects, captured on the high seas and shipped from British ports sinee the deelaration of war, expressly excepts such property as had been captured in violation 431] *of the Presideut's instruction of the 28th of August, 1812. In giving this eonstructiou, therefore, we are satisfied that we eonform to the import of the language of the instruction, and do not contravene any poliey avowed by the govcrnment itself.

On the whole, we are of opinion that the decree of the Cireuit Court, dismissing the libel of the captors, ought to be affirmcd, and that the eause should bc remanded to the Cireuit Court for further proeeedings as between the United States and the claimants.

In case of insolvency, the United States are not entitled to priority of payment, unless the insolvency be a legal and known insolvency manifested by some notorious act of the debtor pursuant to law.

ERROR to the Supreme Judieial Court of Massaehusetts, in an aetion of trover in which was involved the coustructiou of the acts of Congress, giving to the United States a right of priority in payment of the debts due by insolvent debtors.

The case was submitted to the eourt without argument, and is fully stated in the opinion which was delivered as follows. by

DUVALL, J.:

The material faets upon the record are these:

Ou the 4th of June, 1810, sundry goods, wares and merchandise, the property of Wellman & Ropes, were attached by the deputy of Bailey Bartlett, sheriff of the eounty of Essex, state of Massaehusetts, by virtue of eertain writs of attaehment sued out by several creditors of Wellman & Ropes.

On the 18th day of September, 1810, two several exeeutions issued on judgments recovered by the United States against Wellman & Ropes, at the September term, 1810, of the District Court held at Salem, on their joint and several bond for duties at the custom-house. Thc aetions in whieh these judgments in favor of the United States were rendered, were first eommenced on *the day of August, 1810; [432 but no attaehment of property was made thereon. On the 19th day of September following, two suits of attachment, in favor of the United States—one against Wellman and one against Ropes—issued in due form of law, direeted to the marshal of the district or his deputy, returnable to the District Court to be held in December theu next ensuing.

Ou the 11th of October, in the same year, the goods, wares and merehandise before mentioned being in eustody of Bartlett, a sheriff, of the county, and in a store hired by him for the purpose, Sprague, one of the appellants, and deputy of Prinee, the marshal, after the refusal of the sheriff to open the store, forcibly broke into it, and seized, attached and conveyed away the property whieh had been attaehed by the sheriff in the manner before stated, by virtue of the executions and writs of attachment in behalf of the United States, and disposed of it iu satisfaetion of the judgments.

Wellman & Ropes continued in business until the aforesaid 4th day of June, and then failed; and then were, and ever sinee havc continued to be, debtors unable to pay their debts. Wellman has continucd at his usual place of abode in Salem ever since his failure, and has not for any whole day confined himself within his house, but has sometimes kept his person within doors, aud had his doors fastenecd, and oeeasionally used other vigilance and caution to avoid any arrest of his person for two or three weeks next following the said 4th day of June, but has never beeu arrested by any officer, or pursued for that purpose. Ropes has always eontinued at large in Salem, and has never confined or eoncealed himself from his ereditors at any time.

An aetion of trover was commenced by Bartlett, the sheriff, for the property by him attached as aforesaid, against Prince and Sprague,

NOTE.—Mere inability in a debtor of the United States to pay all his debts,or a mere state of insolvency, does not give priority to the United States under the act of March, 1797, § 5, 1 Stat. at L. 512, unless there has been a voluntary assignment of all the debtor's property for the henefit of his creditors, leaving him in a state of legal, or technical, insolvency. U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358; U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, 73.

The word insolvency in the act, means a legal insolvency. Thclusson v. Smith, 2 Wheat., 396.

If, before the right of preference has accrued to the United States, the debtor has made a bona fide conveyaucc of his cstate to a third person, or has mortgaged it to secure a debt, or if his property has heen seized uuder execution,the property is devested out of the debtor, and cannot he made liable to the United States. Thelusson v. Smith, 2 Wheat., 396; Conrad v. Atl. Ins. Co., 1 Pet., 386, 439; U. S. v. King, Wall. C. C., 313; Mott v. Maris, 2 Wash. C. C., 196; U. S. v. Clark, Paine, 629.

A deed made hy a debtor of the U. S. of all his property to trustees for payment of his debts, not including the debt to the U. S., is an act of insolvency, within the act giving priority to debts due the United States. U. S. v. Marshall, of N.C., 2 Brock. Marsh., 488.

Where a firm, heing indebted to the United States, made an assignment of all their effects, for the payment of their debts; held, that this was an act of insolvency, under the act giving the U. S. a preference. U. S. v. Shelton, 1 Brock. Marsh., 517.

To give the United States priority the assignment must be of all the debtor's property. A mortgage of part of his property, as indemnity, is valid against the U. S. U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, 73.

And it is incumhent on the United States, if they claim a priority to establish that the assignment does in fact contain all the debtor's property, where the assignment does not on its face purport to he of all. Conard v. Atl. Ins. Co., 1 Pet., 386; U. S. v. Hunter, 5 Mason, 229.

If, however, a small portiou of his estate should be left out, in order to evade the act, it would he considercd a fraud on the law and void. U. S. v. Langton, 5 Mason, 280; U. S. v. Marshal of N. C., 2 Brock. Marsh., 488; 1 Pet., 386; U. S. v. Del. Ins.Co., 4 Wash. C. C., 418.

who had thus forcibly dispossessed him of it, in the Court of Common Pleas in Essex county, where, upon trial, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants. An appeal was prayed and granted to the Supreme Judicial Court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and at November term, 1811, the cause came on to be tried upon the facts before stated. Upon the 433] plea of not guilty and issue, *the counsel for Prince and Sprague insisted that the several matters so alleged and proved in evidence on their part was sufficient to maintain the issue on their part, and to bar the plaintiff of his action. This was denied by the counsel for the plaintiff, and the judge who sat on the trial delivered his opinion to the jury, that the several matters produced and proved on the part of the defendants, were not upon the whole case sufficient to maintain the issue on the part of the defendants, and to bar the plaintiff of his action. With this direction the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and $10,240.69 damages.

To this opinion of the court an exception was taken, and the proceedings removed by writ of error to this court.

The sole question for the consideration of this court is, whether the priority to which the United States are entitled by law attaches in this case.

This priority is given by the 5th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1797 (ch. 74). It is also given by the 65th section of the collection law in the words following: "And in all cases of insolvency, or where any estate in the hands of the executors, administrators or assigns shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the debt or debts due to the United States on any such bond or bonds shall be first satisfied." In the same section the legislature explain their meaning of insolvency by declaring that it shall be deemed to extend as well to cases in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall have made a voluntary assignment thereof, for the benefit of his creditors, or in which the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed or absent debtor, shall have been attached by process of law, as to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall have been committed.

At present there is no existing bankrupt law in the United States; but in many of the states provision is made by law for the relief of insolvent debtors. In the act of Congress of the 4th of August, 1790, the word "insolvency" only is used. In the acts lately passed on the same subject the words insolvency and bankruptcy 434] *are both adopted and appear to be used as synonymous terms.

It is admitted that the property seized by the attachments and executions before stated was insufficient to satisfy the several claims exhibited, and that Wellman & Ropes were unable to pay their debts, but it does not appear that their property was attached as the effects of absconding, concealed or absent debtors; nor does it appear, or is it even alleged, that they or either of them have made a voluntary assignment of their property for the benefit of their creditors; nor is it alleged that either of them has committed an act of legal bankruptcy. It appears to be the true construction of the act to confine it to the cases of insolvency specified by the legislature. Insolvency must be understood to mean a legal and known insolvency manifested by some notorious act of the debtor pursuant to law—not a vague allegation, which, in adjusting conflicting claims of the United States and individuals, against debtors, it would be difficult to ascertain.

The property in question being in the possession of the sheriff by virtue of legal process, before the issuing the writ on behalf of the United States, was bound to satisfy the debts for which it was taken; and the rights of the individual creditors thus acquired could not be defeated by the process on the part of the United States subsequently issued.

The court is of opinion that priority does not attach in this case, and that there is no error in the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ST. LAWRENCE, WEBB, MASTER.

A vessel sailing to an enemy's country after knowledge of the war, and taken bringing from that country a cargo consisting chiefly of enemy goods, is liable to confiscation as prize of war. Suppression of papers, where it appears to have been intentional and fraudulent, and attended with other suspicious circumstances, is good cause for refusing further proof. But where the suppression appears to be owing to accident or mistake, and no other suspicious circumstances appear in the case, further proof may be allowed.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the United States Circuit Court for the District of New Hampshire.

*The material facts of the case were [435 as follow:

The ship St. Lawrence, Silas Webb, master, was captured on the 20th of June, 1813, by the private armed vessel America, and, with her cargo, libeled as prize, in the District Court of New Hampshire. On the proceedings which were had there, it appeared that the St. Lawrence, owned by Robert Dickey, of New York, and Hugh Thompson, of Baltimore, arrived at Liverpool from Sweden in April, 1813, with a cargo of iron and deals. In the month of May, 1813, the agent of Dickey & Thompson entered into a contract for the sale of the St. Lawrence, with the house of Ogden, Richards & Selden, of Liverpool, the contract to be ratified or disaffirmed by Dickey & Thompson, and the bill of sale to be executed by them, in case of affirmance, to Andrew Ogden and James Heard, of New York, or either of them. On the 5th of May, 1813, a license was granted by the privy council of Great Britain to Thomas White, of London, and others, permitting them to export, direct to the United States, an enumerated cargo in the St. Lawrence, provided she cleared out before the last day of that month. On the 30th of May, 1813, she sailed from Liverpool for the United States, with the cargo specified in the license. Mr. Alexander M'Gregor and his family were passengers on board.

Upon the return of the monition in the District Court, Andrew Ogden interposed a claim, in behalf of himself and M'Gregor, to the ship and part of the cargo. He also claimed another part of the cargo as his sole property. He likewise interposed a claim in favor of Selah Strong & Son; of John Whitten; of the firm of Howard, Phelps & Co.; of Abraham & George Smedes; of Peter and Ebenezer Irving & Co.; of Henry Van Wart; of Irving & Smith; of Jabez Harrison; of Hugh R. Toler; and of Thomas C. Butler. This claim was an affidavit of Mr. Ogden, in which he swore that he had not a full knowledge of the concerns of all the persons for whom he claimed, but verily and fully believed that many of the said goods on board the St. Lawrence were sent in payment of debts due, previous to the war, to several of the persons for whom he claimed. This claim was filed on the 17th of August, 1813.

436*] *William Penniman, of Baltimore, also interposed a claim for five chests of merchandise, which he swore were purchased for him by John Barnet, of London, prior to the war, with funds which he had in England eighteen months before the declaration of war, and in pursuance of orders given by him nine months previous to that event. He also swore that he had, at Baltimore, the original invoice of the purchase of said goods, and other documentary evidence to prove the aforesaid fact.

There was also a claim of the master for two cases and five trusses of merchandise, and six bolts of Russia duck.

In none of these claims was there a designation of the marks or numbers of the casks, bales, or cases which belonged to the different parties for whom the property was claimed.

The master, in answer to the 12th standing interrogatory, said, that for the names of the respective laders he referred to the bills of lading. That the goods were mostly, if not all, consigned "to order." That the goods were to be delivered to order, at such place as the owners or consignees should appoint; but that he did not know what interest any of the consignees or the shipper might have in the goods.

In answer to the 16th interrogatory, the captain stated that his letter bags, two in number, had been taken possession of, and sent to the custom-house; and that, as to any letter he had directed to the consignees or owners, he had done what he had a right to do; and that all his other papers had been forcibly taken away.

By Mr. M'Gregor's answer to the 9th interrogatory, it appeared that he was interested one-half part in the ship; that his sole object in becoming interested in the ship was that of returning to the United States; that he also owned one-half of the copperas and of the earthenware on board, shipped by Ogden, Richards & Selden, and, as he believed, one-half of the coal, but that, as to the last article, he was not positive, no invoices of said goods having been delivered to the deponent.

437*] *In relation to the vessel, Mr. M'Gregor deposed, that the only document relative to the sale of the ship, he believed to be a letter to the former owners from their agent, requesting them to make a bill of sale transferring said ship to Andrew Ogden and James Heard, or either of them, which he gave to Andrew Ogden.

It appeared further, from the examination of Mr. M'Gregor, that he was born in Scotland, was naturalized in the United States in 1795, had lived, the last seven years, in Liverpool, and was returning in the St. Lawrence, with his family, to the United States.

The goods claimed by Ogden as his sole property were shipped by the house of Ogden, Richards & Selden. The two gentlemen last named resided at Liverpool.

The District Court condemned the St. Lawrence and all the cargo, except the parts claimed by M'Gregor and the master. Both parties appealed from this decree to the Circuit Court, where the ship and whole cargo were condemned. From this decree the claimants appealed to the Supreme Court, where the cause was argued by Irving and Webster for the claimants, and Pitman for the captors.

Irving, for all the claimants except M'Gregor and Penniman.

It is contended, on the part of the claimants generally,

1. That the ship St. Lawrence, being an American vessel, owned and navigated wholly by citizens of the United States, and being on her return to the United States, with a cargo owned wholly by American citizens, could not legally be subject to capture by American cruisers.

2. That the character of an American citizen, whether native or naturalized, is not rendered hostile by his residence in a hostile country, if, within a reasonable time after the declaration of war, he withdraws with his funds from the hostile country and returns to his own; and that he has a right so to withdraw.

*3. That a citizen of the United [438 States, not resident in the enemy country, has also a right, after the declaration of war, to withdraw his funds, within a reasonable time, from that country.

4. That if the courts below were not satisfied that the property claimed was, bona fide, property of American citizens, fairly purchased and shipped, the said courts ought to have let the claimants into further proof fully to establish that fact; and, as they refused so to do, that the claimants are entitled, in this court, to the same privilege.

The argument will be confined to this last point.

It will probably be urged, on the part of the captors, that the secreting of papers by the master is good ground for refusing us further proof. We contend, that as the master was only the agent of the claimants to navigate the ship, his act is not sufficient to justify the court in such refusal. On this point the court is referred to the following authorities: 1 Rob., 100, 119, The Concordia; Id., 109, 129, The Hoop, De Vries, master; Id., 86, 102, The Bernon; 2 Rob., 296, 362, The Polly; Chitty's Law of Nations, App., 303; 2 Rob., 87, 104, The Rising Sun. The last case goes also to show that a claim may be made by an agent; and that, too, without clearly distinguishing the rights of each particular claimant. (See also, Doug., 614, Le Caux v. Eden).

Webster, for M'Gregor and Penniman—several claimants.

1. M'Gregor claims half the ship and part of the cargo.

We contend that a distinction is to be taken between an American citizen, domiciled in England at the breaking out of the war, withdrawing his funds, and an American citizen who goes to England, after the declaration of war, for the same purpose. That the former, whether a native or naturalized citizen, has a right (and perhaps it is his duty) to return to the United States with his effects. If he has no such right, why should the law of nations have provided a reasonable time for removing in case of war? This rule of the law of nations has 439*] *been founded upon the necessity of the case, and upon the hardship which would attend the want of such a rule. A citizen of one country may lawfully go to any other country, in time of peace, and take up his residence there; and it would be very hard if he must suffer by the sudden and unexpected breaking out of a war—an event over which he had no control. A neutral would be permitted to withdraw his funds in such a case; and if we should allow the privilege to neutrals, why should we deny it to our own citizens? (1 Rob., 1, The Vigilantia; 1 Bos. & Pul., 355, Bell v. Gilson.)

The case of Escott, cited in The Hoop (1 Rob., 165, 196), may perhaps be thought to make against our claim. But the cases are not alike. In that case, Escott sent for his property; here, M'Gregor came with his.

A character gained by residence is lost by non-residence. When M'Gregor ceased to reside in England, his character, if hostile before, no longer continued hostile. That it was not his intention to continue his residence in England, is clearly evidenced by his actual return to the United States with his family.

With regard to his half of the ship, we contend that if he had a right to return, he had a right to use the means necessary for that purpose—he had a right to purchase a ship for the conveyance of himself and his family. So, if it was lawful for him to withdraw his funds, he might lawfully invest those funds in merchandise, if he could not otherwise withdraw them. (4 Rob., 161, 195, The Madonna delle Gracie; 3 Rob., 17, 12, The Indian Chief; 5 Rob., 248, The President; 5 Rob., 84, 90, The Ocean; 5 Rob., 60, The Diana.)

2. As to Penniman's claim, we shall, at present, merely ask the court to allow us further proof.

Pitman, contra, contended,

1. That there was no legal evidence that the cargo belonged to the claimants, as claimed.

2. That from the origin and character of the voyage, and suppression of papers, concealed enemy interests were to be presumed; that, 440*] therefore, all right to further *proof was forfeited, and that condemnation of the whole, as enemy's property, must ensue.

3. That the ship, at the time of capture, belonged to Dickey and Thompson, and was liable to condemnation on the ground of having gone to Liverpool in April, 1813, with a cargo of iron and deals, as well as from the circumstances of the voyage upon which she was captured.

4. That the ship and cargo, whether belonging to citizens or enemies, being taken in trade with the enemy, were clothed with a hostile character, and therefore liable to condemnation.

Some other points were also touched upon in the course of the argument, viz.:

The want of proper claimants, of definite claims, and the requisite affidavits to support them.

The connection of Ogden with a house of trade in the enemy country; the presumption that the partnership was, in fact, interested in what he claimed as his sole property; and that he must be considered as a British merchant, in regard to those transactions originating with his house in Liverpool.

The national character of M'Gregor, which presents itself in the case of the Venus.

The presumption that Van Wart resides in England, the claim being by Ogden for Irving & Smith, of New York, his consignees; and,

The effect of the license.

Tuesday, March 15th. The case was submitted without further argument.

Wednesday, March 16th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

LIVINGSTON, J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

*From the manner in which the ap- [441 pellants have argued this cause, it does not appear that they are very sanguine in their expectations of our reversing the decree of the Circuit Court, on the evidence on which that court and the District Court proceeded; but that their chief hope is derived from the further proof which they have it in their own power to produce, provided an opportunity be afforded them for that purpose. Except as to the property claimed by Mr. Penniman and Mr. M'Gregor, this court does not perceive how the Circuit Court could have done otherwise, upon the proof before it, than confiscate the cargo of the St. Lawrence as prize of war. Without meaning to decide, at present, on the right of an American citizen having funds in England, to withdraw them after a declaration of war, or of the latitude which he may be allowed in the exercise of such a right, if it exists, we think the evidence would have justified the court in considering this property as belonging to enemies of the United States.

The St. Lawrence had gone to England after the war was known, and had sailed from a British port, nearly one year after war had been declared; she was loaded in the country of the enemy, and by persons carrying on trade there; she was furnished with a British license, which extended both to British and American property; and the bills of lading, not being in a very common form, were well calculated to excite suspicion. But these circumstances, strong as they are, might, if everything had been fair, have been so explained as to have convinced the court that the property was truly American. Was this done, or even attempted? If we look at the conduct of the master and the claimants, we find them both acting in a way which left the court no other safe conclusion but that the cargo of the St. Lawrence was enemy property. The captain, instead of delivering to the captors, or bringing into court the letters to the consignees, which, no doubt, covered invoices and bills of lading, lets us know, in a way not to be misunderstood, that he had delivered or sent them to the parties to whom they were addressed. Taking his examination with the usual course of business, which is to accompany every shipment with a letter, no doubt can remain that such letters were not only on board, but that they have been regu-442*] larly received by the respective *consignees; for it is not pretended by the master that they were taken from him by the captors. Here, then, is not only a subduction of very important papers by the master, but an acquiescence in such conduct, on the part of the consignees, and a continued suppression of the same papers, to this day. The only proof, then, which the court had of the interest of the claimants, except of Mr. Penniman's, the master's, and Mr. McGregor's, is in the claim of Mr. Ogden, who states that he is not acquainted with their concerns, but believes they had an interest in the cargo; without, however, attempting to designate the packages belonging to either of them. The court below, therefore, might fairly consider the claimants as having not only failed in making out a legal title to the property, but as concealing papers which would have shown a title elsewhere.

But if there was defect of proof below, it is thought the claimants are entitled to time for further proof; and that, if this be allowed, they will be able to show that the property in question was purchased with American funds which were in England previous to the war, and that the claimants were the true and bona fide owners thereof. It is certainly not a matter of course, in this court, to make an order for further proof. When the parties are fully apprized of the nature of the proof which their case requires, and have it in their power to produce it, an appellate court should not readily listen to such an application; but when it appears that the parties who ask this indulgence have most pertinaciously withheld from the court letters and other documentary testimony, which must be supposed, in this particular case, to have been in their possession, they come with a very ill grace to ask for any further time to make out their title. But if we examine the affidavits which have been made to obtain further time, we shall find them all silent as to the papers which they must have received by the St. Lawrence; for in not one of them is a letter of that kind or an invoice mentioned; nor do they deny that such letters or invoices were received by them. Under such circumstances, this court thinks that it cannot, consistently with the circumspection with which such applications ought always to be received, allow the appellants time for further proof. The master's adventure, it is said, has been given up.

443*] *Of Mr. Penniman's claim the court thinks more favorably. In the claim which he filed personally, he not only swears that the property belongs to him, but states very particularly how and when it was purchased. He states, further, that the original invoice and other documentary evidence were at Baltimore; and in the affidavit made by Mr. Campbell, during the present term, there is such a full and distinct history given of this whole transaction, founded upon original letters and bills of exchange, that it is impossible to harbor one moment's doubt that the five chests of merchandise claimed by Mr. Penniman did, at the time of shipment, and long before, belong to him. To this affidavit is also annexed the original letter and invoice which he received by the St. Lawrence, which must dissipate every doubt on the question, if any had previously existed.

Where so strong a case is made out, the court is willing to impute to accident or mistake the non-production of these papers below. Perhaps Mr. Penniman thought he did sufficient in stating they were in his possession. Certain it is, he could have no motive for suppressing papers which would have established so conclusively his title to the merchandise which he claimed. The court, therefore, allows him until next term to make proof, by affidavit and the production of documents, of his right to the property claimed, at the time of its shipment at Liverpool; and the same indulgence is allowed to the captors.

In regard to the claim of M'Gregor to a part of the cargo, there is also some difference between his case and that of many others of the claimants. He swears positively to his interest, but that no invoice was delivered to him by the shippers, Ogden, Richards & Seldon. Ogden, also, swears to the interest of Mr. M'Gregor. Perhaps this testimony is sufficient to satisfy a court, as it did satisfy the District Court, that the property really belonged to Mr. McGregor. But if that be the case, other questions will arise of too much importance to be decided on the last day of the term, and when the court is not full. Whether an American citizen has a right to withdraw his funds form the country of a belligerent, after a war; or if he have, whether he have a right to charter a vessel for that purpose; and if he may go thus far, whether he may bring British *goods, on freight, to [*444 this country, without affecting thereby the safety of his own goods; are questions which the court does not now decide, and will therefore suspend, at present, giving any final opinion on the claim of Mr. M'Gregor to a part of the cargo; who, in the meantime, is also at liberty to make further proof on the same points with Mr. Penniman; the captors having the same right.

It may be well doubted whether Mr. Ogden and Mr. M'Gregor have any title to the St. Lawrence; but whether she belong to them or to Messrs. Dickey & Thompson, her fate seems necessarily involved in the decision of the Rapid, which was made this term. She went to England since the war; and is taken bringing a cargo from that country. If the whole of the cargo had belonged to Mr. M'Gregor, or any other American returning with his property to the United States, the court means not to say whether it would or would not have been cause of forfeiture; but when we find but a small portion of the cargo in that predicament, there can be no escape for her. The St. Lawrence was certainly guilty of trading with the enemy; and, being taken on her way from one of his ports to the United States, she is liable, on that ground, to be confiscated as prize of war, to whomever she might belong at the time.

Upon the whole, the sentence of the Circuit Court is affirmed in all its parts, with costs; except so far as it condemned those portions of the cargo which were claimed by Mr. Penniman and Mr. M'Gregor, respecting which this court will advise until the next term.

Aff'g—S. C. 1 Gall., 467; S. C. 9 Cranch, 120.

THE HIRAM, BARKER, MASTER.

Sailing on a voyage under the license and passport of protection of the enemy, in furtherance of his views or interests, constitutes such an act of illegality as subjects the ship and cargo to the condemnation as prize of war.

Sailing with a cargo of provisions to the port of a neutral, who is the ally of our enemy in his war with another power, is such a furtherance of the views of our enemy.

THIS was a case of capture, as prize, by the private armed brig Thorn, duly commissioned by the President of the United States, and commanded by Asa Hooper, Esq.

445*] *The Hiram, owned by Samuel G. Griffith, an American citizen, sailed from Baltimore on or about the 24th of September, 1812, with a cargo of flour and bread, on a voyage to Lisbon. She was captured on the 15th of October following, and sent into Marblehead, in the District of Massachusetts, for adjudication. She was libeled in the District Court for the said district, by the captors. The vessel was claimed by Barker, the master, in behalf of Samuel G. Griffith; and the cargo by the supercargo, in behalf of said Griffith and various other shippers, American merchants at Baltimore.

Among the papers found on board the Hiram, at the time of her capture, were certain papers commonly called a British license or protection, being a certified copy of a letter from Admiral Sawyer to Andrew Allen, Esq., late British Consul at Boston, and an additional letter of safe conduct from Mr. Allen. It appeared from the evidence that this license was purchased from a citizen of the United States, and that a part of it was not filled up at the time of the purchase; and that such licenses were a common article of sale in Baltimore and other places.

There was also found on board, the owner's letter of instructions, in which the supercargo was directed to remit the proceeds of the cargo in bills of exchange or government bills to the shipper's correspondents in Liverpool; and moreover to sell the vessel at Lisbon, if an advantageous sale could be made, and remit the proceeds to England.

It appeared from the evidence in the cause that such remittances in bills of exchange were common among merchants.

The captors claimed condemnation of the vessel and cargo,

1. Because of the British protection or license.

2. Because the remittances were directed to be made in England in bills of exchange.

The District and Circuit Courts both decided 446] that *neither the vessel nor cargo were liable to condemnation; but allowed the captors their expenses. From the decree of the Circuit Court both parties appealed.

Swann, for claimants.

The opinions delivered in the cases of The Aurora and The Julia may, perhaps, upon first view, be considered as deciding the present case; but upon a closer examination, it will be found that the facts in this case differ materially from those which appeared in the two former.

In the first place, in the case of The Aurora, there was an intent to supply the enemy—there was an intent to trade with the enemy; there was a direct violation of the act of Congress of 6th July, 1812; but here, there was no such violation. The license, in this case, was merely to trade with the neutral ports of Spain and Portugal. The present case differs from that of The Julia, inasmuch as the claim here is for the cargo only, and the license is for the vessel; whereas there, the license extended as well to the cargo as the vessel.

But these papers do not, in fact, import a license; they only intimate an intended forbearance, on the part of Great Britain, to molest a lawful trade to Spain and Portugal. Here was no sailing under the protection of Great Britain.

Again, this license, as it is called, was purchased as an article of commerce from a private individual; not from Admiral Sawyer nor from Mr. Allen; it is only a copy of Admiral Sawyer's letter certified by Allen. The obtaining such a copy of the letter was not unlawful.

Besides, there is no evidence that Admiral Sawyer ever gave the directions mentioned in his letter to the commanders of the squadron under his command, not to molest American vessels laden and bound as therein described. Indeed, his power to give such instructions does not appear; and if further proof be allowed, we can prove that licenses of this description were, in fact, disregarded in other cases.

Dexter*, contra. [*447

In answer to the argument that the license in this case related to the vessel only, while the claim is for the cargo alone, it may be observed that the owners of the cargo were the owners of the license, which ought therefore to be considered as extending to the cargo as well as to the vessel. The license was undoubtedly intended as a protection. The voyage was clearly undertaken in furtherance of the views of the British government, as expressed in Admiral Sawyer's letter annexed to the pass; and I understand the ground of the decision in the case of The Aurora to be, that she sailed under the protection and in furtherance of the views of the enemy.

But if the court should not consider the sailing under the license sufficient cause of condemnation, we contend that this was also a case of indirect trade with the enemy; inasmuch as the proceeds of the cargo were directed by the owner to be remitted from Lisbon to Liverpool in bills of exchange.

Swann, in reply.

Buying a bill of exchange on England is not trading with the enemy. A man may, in an enemy country, purchase a ship from a neutral. (4 Rob., 232, 283, The Countess of Lauderdale.) Sailing under an enemy's pass, without trading with the enemy, is no cause of condemation.

There was not, in this case, such a subserviency to the views of the enemy, as ought to subject the property in question to the sentence prayed for by the captors. It is certainly lawful for the enemy to relax the rights of war; he may lawfully declare that he will suffer certain vessels to pass; and we conceive that if those vessels sail under the faith of such a declaration, it is no cause of condemnation. The enemy might have declared that he would not capture any vessel navigated wholly by Boston seamen; but surely our government would not condemn a vessel for sailing under the faith of such a declaration.

448*] *Wednesday, March 16th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This vessel was the property of Samuel G. Griffith, an American citizeu. On or about the 24 of September, 1812, she sailed, with a cargo of flour and bread, from Baltimore to Lisbon; aud on her voyage thither, was captured, on the 15th of October following, by the privateer brig Thorn, and brought into the District of Massachusetts, where she and her cargo were libeled as being enemics' property.

The brig was claimed by the master, in behalf of Griffith, and the cargo by the supercargo, as belonging to the said Griffith, and other shippers, being American merchants of Baltimore. Among the papers found on board of this vessel at the time of the capture, was a letter from Admiral Sawyer, dated the 5th of August 1812, addressed to Andrew Allen, Jun., as British Consul for the states of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut, which states that, being aware of the importance of insuring a constant supply of flour and other dry provisions to Spain and Portugal, and to the West Indies, he should give directions to the commanders of His Majesty's squadron under his command, not to molest American vessels unarmed and so laden, bona fide bound to Portuguese or Spanish ports, whose papers should be accompanied with a certified copy of that letter under the consular seal of the said Allen; also a letter from the said Allen, dated 15th September, 1812, addressed to all the officers of His Majesty's ships of war, or privateers belonging to subjects of His Majesty, recitiug that it is of vital importance to continue a full and regular supply of flour and other dry provisions to the ports of Spain and Portugal, or their colonies, and that, in consequence thereof, it has been thought expedieut by His Majesty's goverument that every degree of protection and encouragement should be given to American vessels so laden, and bound to the ports of Spain and Portugal or their colonies, and that, in furtherance of these views of His Majesty's government, Admiral Sawyer had directed to him a letter dated the 5th of August, 1812 (a copy of which is annexed), with instructions to furnish American vessels so laden and destined, 449*] *with a copy of his letter certified under his, the said Allen's, consular seal, which documents are intended to serve as a perfect safeguard and protection to such vessel iu the prosecution of her voyage; and that, in compliance with such instructions, he has granted to the American brig Hiram, whereof John B. Barker is master, now lyiug in the port of Baltimore, and laden with flour and bread, bound bona fide to Lisbon, a copy of the said Admiral Sawyer's letter certified under his consular seal, requesting all officers of His Majesty's ships of war, or of private armed vessels belonging to subjects of His Majesty, not to offer any molestation to the said vessel, but, on the contrary, to grant her all proper assistance and protection on her passage to Lisbon, and on her return from thence to her port of departure, laden with salt or in ballast only.

Under an order calling upon the different claimants to give further proof relative to the British license found on board the brig, when aud where it was obtained, of whom, and by whom, and on what terms, and, generally, relative to all facts aud circumstances concerning the procurement of the same, William Hartshorn made an affidavit stating that he purchased for Mr Griffith, the owner of the vessel, in September, 1812, from John R. Waddy, of Virginia, but then in Baltimore, a citizen of the United States, a license to protect a vessel laden with provisious aud bound to Lisbon, from capture by British cruisers, for which he was to pay one dollar per barrel for what the vessel would carry, payable $500 in cash, and the balance on the safe arrival of the vessel at Lisbon; that the said license was in blank, for inserting the names of any vessel aud master, and that the blanks in the said license were filled up in his presence. This witness, as well as others, states that these licenses form an article of traffic in market, as much so as flour.

The vessel and cargo were acquitted in the District Court, and a pro forma decree of affirmance made in the Circuit Court; from which decree an appeal to this court was taken.

In the case of The Julia, decided at this court, it was laid down in general terms, "that the sailing on a voyage under the license and passport of protection of the *enemy, in [450 furtherance of his views or interests, constitutes such an act of illegality as subjects the ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war;" and, as explanatory of the general reasons for that opinion, a reference was made to the opiuion of the learned judge who decided that case in the Circuit Court.

It is contended by the counsel for the claimants, that the facts in this case differ so materially from those which appear in the case of The Julia, that the principles of law which ruled that case are inapplicable to this, and, consequently, ought not to govern the decision of the court upon it.

There certainly are some differences in the two cases; and these were considered sufficiently strong by the district judge who acquitted this vessel and cargo to condemn the Julia and her cargo.

The important circumstance which appears to have influenced the decision of the district judge in that case, was, that the license contemplated the means of insuring a constant supply of dry provisions to the allied armies in Spain and Portugal, and, consequently, an unlawful conuection with the enemy to supply his armies, and a subserviency to the interests of that enemy. In this case, no such views are expressed in the license of Admiral Sawyer; yet the court must be wilfully blind not to see that this was, in reality, the object of Admiral Sawyer and of Mr. Allen, and that it must have been so understood by those who sailed under this license.

In both cases, the allied armies were to be supplied, not by sales made directly to their agents (for this is uot required by either), but by carrying supplies to the Peninsula, which would indirectly come to their use. The license, as well as the letter of Allen accompanying it, points out the great importance of such supplies being sent to Spain and Portugal; and the latter adds, that, in furtherance of these views of His Majesty's government, he had been directed by Admiral Sawyer to furnish a copy of his letter to vessels so laden and destined. Can it be said that an American citizen, sailing under the protection of papers professing such to be the views of the British government, does not act in such a manner as to subserve the 451] *views and interests of the enemy? Upon the whole, the court is of opinion that there is no substantial difference between this case and that of The Julia; and that this is fully within the principle laid down by this court in deciding that case, and the reasoning to which it refers.

It was stated, on the behalf of the claimants of the cargo, that they ought not to be affected by the illegal act of the owner of the vessel in sailing under the protection of this license. It is a sufficient answer to this argument to observe that, in this case, the court must presume that the license was known to the owners of the cargo, if it was not the joint property of all. It is inconceivable that the owner of the vessel should expend about $1,600 for the protection of a cargo in which it appears he was not largely concerned, without communicating such an advantage to his shippers, and even requiring some reimbursement, either by demanding higher freight or compensation in some other way. But what is conclusive on this point is, that an order for further proof in relation to this license was made, and yet no affidavit or proof is offered by any of the owners, denying a knowledge of these documents being on board.

The decree must be reversed, and the vessel and cargo condemned to the captors as prize of war.

THE JOSEPH, SARGEANT, MASTER.

Case of hostile trade. Not excused by the necessity of obtaining funds to pay the expenses of the ship; nor by the opinion of an American minister, expressed to the master, that by undertaking the voyage he would violate no law of the United States.

If an American vessel be captured on a circuitous voyage to the United States, in a former part of which voyage she has been guilty of conduct subjecting her to confiscation, though at the time of capture she is committing no illegal act, she must be condemned.

Where the termini of a voyage are already fixed, the continuity of such voyage cannot be broken by a voluntary deviation of the master, for the purpose of carrying on an intermediate trade.

A capture as prize of war may lawfully be made within the territorial limits of the United States, at any place below low water-mark.

THIS was the case of a vessel, the Joseph, owned by American citizens, captured by the privateer Fame, on the 16th of July, 1813. The Joseph sailed from Boston with a cargo of freight, on or about the 6th of April, 1812, on a voyage to Liverpool and the north of Europe, and thence directly or indirectly to the United States. She arrived in Liverpool, and there discharged her cargo; and, on the 30th of June following, with another cargo, of mahogany, taken in at Hull, sailed for St. Petersburg under the protection of a British license, granted on the 8th of June, 1812, authorizing the *export of mahogany to St. Petersburg, [452 and the importation of a return cargo to England. The brig arrived at St. Petersburg, and there received news of the war between the United States and Great Britain. About the 20th of October, 1812, she sailed from St. Petersburg for London, with a cargo of hemp and iron on freight, consigned to merchants in London; and, having wintered in Sweden, in the spring of 1813 she sailed, under convoy instructions from the British ship Ranger, for London, where she arrived and delivered her cargo. About the 29th of May she sailed for the United States, in ballast, under a British license; and was captured on the 16th of July, at no great distance from Boston light-house. She was sent into the port of Salem for adjudication, as prize.

In the District Court of Massachusetts the claim of the owners, Messrs. Dall & Vose, was rejected, and the property condemned to the United States. From this decree the captors and claimants appealed.

In the Circuit Court the property was condemned to the captors. From this decree the claimants and the United States appealed.

It was contended, on the part of the claimants,

1. That it was lawful, in June, 1812 (before the war), to take the license to go from England to the north of Europe, and to bring back a cargo to England.

2. That the taking a freight from the north of Europe to England was from necessity to obtain funds to pay the debts of the ship, the master not having been able to sell the cargo at St. Petersburg for any price.

3. That the opinion of the minister of the United States at St. Petersburg, who told the captain of the Joseph that there was no law against his returning to England under the protection of his license, and who also sent dispatches by the Joseph to the government of the United States, though he knew of the intention to return to England and thence to the United States, was, in effect, a license, especially as to the claim of the United States.

*4. That there was no trade with the [453 enemy, but with neutrals only; the freight having been taken on neutral account, in a neutral territory, and delivered to a neutral house in Great Britain.

5. That if any offense was committed, it was completed upon the delivery of the freight in Great Britain; and that therefore the vessel was not liable to capture or seizure, on that account, in a subsequent voyage from Great Britain to the United States.

6. That if she was liable to seizure for having adopted the character of an enemy vessel by any act contrary to the allegiance of the owners, yet she was not to be condemned as prize to the captors, as she was voluntarily returning to the United States and her port of discharge, and had actually arrived within the District of Massachusetts. That the capture, therefore, was not the occasion of her being brought in; so that if she was liable at all, even as enemies' property, the condemnation must be to the United States as a droit of admiralty. But,

7. That the vessel was not liable to be condemned to the United States, because the declaration of war was, in effect, an invitation, if not a command, to the citizens of the United States, abroad at the time, to return home, and the law allowed a reasonable time and way to effect that return.

Pitman, for the captors, contended,

1. That the facts appearing in the case proved a trading with the enemy, which subjected the vessel to confiscation as prize.

2. That the vessel was not captured within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States; that this appeared from the preparatory examinations of the master and the mate, the first of whom stated "that he was captured in sight of Half-way-rock, off Salem harbor," which was a marine league from the shore; and the latter, "that the vessel was captured about two leagues east from the Boston light-house."

454*] *3. That, though the fact be admitted as contended for by the claimants, yet the captors were authorized by their commission to capture within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States on the high seas, which were stated in their instructions as extending to low water-mark.

Wednesday, March 16th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

WASHINGTON, J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the following opinion of the court:

After the decision of this court in the cases of The Rapid and of the ship Alexander, it is not to be contended that the sailing with a cargo, on freight, from St. Petersburg to London, after a full knowledge of the war, did not amount to such a trading with the enemy as to have subjected both the vessel and cargo to condemnation as prize of war, had she been captured whilst proceeding on that voyage. The alleged necessity of undertaking that voyage to enable the master out of the freight to discharge his expenses at St. Petersburg, countenanced, as the master declares, by the opinion of our minister at St. Petersburg, that by undertaking such a voyage he would violate no law of the United States, although these considerations, if founded in truth, present a case of peculiar hardship, yet they afford no legal excuse which it is competent to this court to admit as the basis of its decision. (See The Hoop, 1 Rob; Potts & Bell, 8 T. Rep.)

The counsel for the claimants seemed to be aware of the insufficiency of this ground, and applied their strength to show that the vessel was not taken in delicto, having finished the offensive voyage in which she was engaged, at London, and being captured on her return home and in ballast. It is not denied that if she be taken during the same voyage in which the offense was committed, though after it was committed, she is considered as being still in delicto, and subject to confiscation; but it is contended that her voyage ended at London; and that she was, on her return, embarked on a new voyage. This position is directly contrary to the facts in the case. The voyage was an entire one from the United States to England, thence to the north of *Europe, and thence [455 directly or indirectly to the United States. Even admit that the outward and homeward voyages could be separated, so as to render them two distinct voyages, which is not conceded, still it cannot be denied that the termini of the homeward voyage were St. Petersburg and the United States. The continuity of such a voyage cannot be broken by voluntary deviation of the master for the purpose of carrying on an intermediate trade. That the going from St. Petersburg to London was not undertaken as a new voyage, is admitted by the claimants, who allege that it was undertaken as subsidiary to their voyage to the United States. It was, in short, a voyage from St. Petersburg to the United States by the way of London; and, consequently, the vessel, during any part of that voyage, if seized for conduct subjecting her to confiscation as prize of war, was seized in delicto.

Another objection relied upon by the claimants is, that this vessel was captured within the territorial limits of the United States. The fact upon which this objection is raised is not clearly established one way or the other. But admit it to be as contended for by the claimants, the law is nevertheless against them. The commission granted to privateers authorizes them to seize and take any British vessels found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewere on the high seas, and to bring them in for adjudication; and also to detain, seize and take all vessels and effects, to whomsoever belonging, which shall be liable thereto according to the law of nations and the rights of the United States, as prize of war. The first instructions given by the President to the private armed vessels of the United States, define the high seas, referred to in the commission, to extend to low water-mark, with the exception of the space of one league, or three miles, from the shore of countries at peace with Great Britain or the United States. The general expressions of the commission, explained by these instructions, and containing no exception but in relation to friendly powers, prove incontestibly that all captures as prize of war may lawfully be made within the territorial limits of the United States, at any place below low water-mark.

The court is also of opinion that there is no weight *in another objection made by [456 the claimants, that this vessel was on her way and near to an American port at the time she was captured. The right of the captor to the property which he may seize as prize of war is derived under his commission, which is general and unqualified as to place and circumstances, and not from any peculiar merit which he may claim in any particular case. It is not for him to know whether a vessel which has offended against the law of nations, and is apparently destined to a port of the United States, will certainly enter the port; and certainly he is bound by no law to forego the opportunity which chance or his own vigilance may have presented to him to acquire property which, under his commission, he is authorized to appropriate to himself.

Decree affirmed.

THE GROTIUS, SHEAFE, MASTER.

Question as to the validity of capture; one man only having been put on board; the ship's papers and the navigation of the vessel being left to the master. Further proof ordered.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The Grotius, an American ship owned by Thomas Sheafe and Charles Coffin, the claimants, sailed from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, March 2d, 1812, on a voyage, according to the shipping paper, from Portsmouth to one or more southern ports, and from thence to one or more ports in Europe, and back to her port of discharge in the United States, and to Portsmouth if required. She arrived at New York, and sailed from thence with a cargo for St. Petersburg, and arrived at Cronstadt on the 17th of June, 1812. The cargo was owned by American merchants, and was consigned to a house at St. Petersburg. The consignees furnished a return cargo on the credit of the outward cargo. After the return cargo was put on board, the French armies having entered Russia and threatening to approach St. Petersburg, the consignees were apprehensive that their security for the return cargo might be lost. They arrested the ship and cargo, and 457*] would not permit her to *depart, but on condition that she should proceed to London with the cargo then on board, and that the captain should sign bills of lading to deliver the property in London to the order of the consignees; they stipulating that if they should have obtained payment from the proceeds of the outward cargo, the bills of lading should be given up to their owners or agents in London, and the cargo then to be at the disposition of the captain.

The news of the war between the United States and Great Britain having reached St. Petersburg, the American ships in that port (fifty or sixty in number), with the knowledge and approbation of Mr. Adams, the American minister at the Court of St. Petersburg, sailed for England with British licenses. This was resorted to as the only course in which it was possible to get home. The Grotius sailed, among others, with such license. Owing to the lateness of the season, she put into Carlscrona, Sweden, where she lay from the 28th of November, 1812, until the 25th of March, 1813. On the 2d day of May following she arrived at London, and there discharged her cargo, consisting of iron, hemp and cordage, and, on the 17th of June following, departed for the United States, in ballast. On the 29th of July she was captured by the privateer Frolic, John O'Dionne, commander, who put one man on board of her from the privateer. The captain of the Grotius kept his papers and the command of his ship, and navigated her to Boston. On her arrival, she was libeled in the District Court of Massachusetts.

In this court a question was made by the claimants as to the fact of capture.

The master, in answer to the 2d interrogatory, swore that he never considered the ship Grotius to have been taken or seized as prize; that he was present when an armed schooner under English colors met with her, the commander of which represented her to be a British privateer called the Bream, and requested him to take on board a man and treat him as a gentleman until he arrived in the United States, to which he consented.

Gilman, the mate, in answer to the 2d and 3d interrogatories, stated that, until his arrival, he never knew *that the Grotius had [*458 been taken as prize; that the master had been ordered on board the schooner, and returned with Very, the man who had been taken on board the Grotius.

Chambers, a seaman, in answer to the 3d interrogatory, stated that the Grotius was met by an armed schooner under English colors which obliged the mate of the ship to go on board her, and afterwards sent him back with a man who, on the next day, declared himself to be put on board as prize-master, saying that if they should fall in with a French vessel he should be obliged to show his commission.

The affidavit of Very, the alleged prize-master, confirms the statement of the mate—that the captain was ordered on board the privateer, and that he, Very, was directed by his commander, in presence of the captain of the Grotius, to go on board as prize-master; but that the master of the ship was to keep possession of the papers, and to navigate her into port.

In the District Court the ship was condemned to the United States. From this decree the captors and claimants appealed.

In the Circuit Court the decree of the District Court was affirmed, pro forma, by consent of parties.

Webster, for the claimants, contended.

1. That, in this case, the ship was not captured, only one man having been put on board. That this case was not affected by the decision in the case of The Alexander. That a capture, as well as the bringing the vessel into port after the capture, must be the effect of power either actual or constructive. That the master of the ship did not know of the intention to capture, nor had he any idea that his vessel was captured, till long after the alleged prize-master was put on board. That there was no agreement to consider it as a capture. And, lastly, that there was no bringing in.

2. That the proceeding to London, under the circumstances of this case, was not such a trading with the *enemy as induced a for- [*459 feiture of the ship. That it was an act justified by the necessity of the case, there being no other way to get the ship home. That the master was further justified in acting as he did, by the advice of Mr. Adams, the minister at St. Petersburg, where the ship was when the war was first known there. (1 Rob., 184, 220, The Betty Cathcart.)

3. That the ship was not taken in delicto; that there was no trade with the enemy; that the master merely delivered the cargo in London; that the voyage was not to be considered as a continued voyage from the United States to Russia, from Russia to England, and from England to the United States, but merely as a voyage from Russia to London.

4. That the privateers of the United States had no authority, either under the prize act or their commissions, to capture American vessels found in circumstances like those of the Grotius; that is to say, bound directly to the United States, and within two or three days' sail of her destined port. That if she was to be condemned at all, it must be as a droit of admiralty, not as prize to the captors. That privateers claim under a grant from the United States, and must be limited by the express terms of such grant, which ought to have a fair construction, and cannot be supposed to extend to cases where there is no risk, no trouble, no labor on the part of the captors. That the grant is to be considered as a reward for their services. That if a vessel is in port, either voluntarily or by stress of weather, she is no subject of capture.

Pitman, contra, for the captors,

Contended, that the Grotius was liable to condemnation for having sailed from Russia to England with a British license, after knowledge of the war between Great Britain and the United States, and with contraband of war on board; that the voyage was to be considered as one continued voyage from Russia to the United States; that the vessel, therefore, if taken at any time before her arrival in the United States and in a place of safety, must be considered as captured in delicto. That the case was analogous to that of a vessel captured 460] *while coming out of a blockaded port into which she had previously slipped by stealth. (1 Rob., 126, 150, The Vrow Judith; Id. 72, 86, The Frederick Molke.) That physical force was not necessary to constitute capture; that it had been so decided in the case of The Alexander; and that, if any doubt existed in the mind of the court with regard to the capture, it was a case for further proof. That the privateers of the United States were authorized to capture even within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Dexter, in reply,

Urged that although the master of the Grotius had heard of the war, he had also heard of the repeal of the orders in council, and that an armistice was about to be agreed upon, if it had not already taken place; that, therefore, it was as if they had not heard of the war at all. That, in order to subject a vessel to condemnation, she must be captured in the prosecution of the voyage in which she was guilty of the offense; that the Grotius was not captured on that voyage; that the voyage from Russia to England was to be considered as a distinct voyage, after the completion of which the vessel was not liable to condemnation for any offense committed on that voyage. That even if the proceeds of the cargo previously deposited in England had been on board at the time of the capture, it would have been no cause of condemnation. That when the cargo was deposited, the offense was deposited with it. (Park, 239, Amer. Ed.; 1 Rob., 193, 230, The Rebeckah, note; 2 Br. Civ. Law, 58; Id. 250; Id. 262.)

Wednesday, March 16th. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court in this case, as follows:

This case differs in no material respect from that of The Joseph, just decided, except that in this a question arises as to the validity of the capture. The master of the Grotius, in answer to the second standing interrogatory, swears that he hath never considered the ship to have been taken or seized as prize. That he was present when an armed schooner under English colors met with her, the commander of which represented her *to be a British privateer called the Bream, and requested him to take on board a man, and treat him as a gentleman until he arrived in the United States; to which he consented. This testimony of the captain is confirmed by Gilman, the mate, in answer to the 2d and 3d interrogatories, who adds, that Very, the man who was put on board, never conducted as prize-master, nor in any other manner than a passenger would, during the voyage. Pierce, one of the seamen, who accompanied the captain on board the schooner, swears that he never knew the ship was seized as prize until after her arrival within the Boston light-house. Chambers, another seaman belonging to the Grotius, in answer to the third interrogatory, says that she was met by an armed schooner under English colors which obliged the mate of the ship to go on board her, and afterwards sent him back with a man who, on the next day, declared himself to be put on board as prize-master, saying that if she should fall in with a French vessel, he should be obliged to show his commission. That he knows not upon what pretense or for what reason she was taken, not knowing, in fact, that she was made prize of, until her arrival at Boston. [*461

Daniel J. Very, the alleged prize-master, has deposed on oath that he was present at the capture of the Grotius by the Frolic; that the captain of the ship was ordered on board the schooner with his papers, and that he, Very, was directed by his commander to go on board as prize-master, and this in the presence of the captain of the Grotius; that the master of the ship was to keep possession of the papers, and to navigate her into port. That he accordingly went on board as prize-master, carrying with him a copy of the commission of the Frolic; and instructions, in writing, from the commander to him (Very) as prize-master. That the captain of the Grotius informed his crew that in case a British cruiser should board the Grotius, and they should be asked respecting the said Very, they were to answer that he was a passenger.

Without giving any opinion as to the regularity of admitting the affidavit of the prize-master as a part of the preparatory evidence, the court is of opinion that the facts necessary for deciding upon the validity of the capture *are not sufficiently clear; and that it will be proper to make an order for further proof, to be furnished by the captors and the claimants, with respect to all the circumstances of the capture. [*462

This point appears not to have been made or considered in the court below.

ALEXANDER AND OTHERS v. PENDLETON.

If the case be clear, a court of equity will interpose to quiet the title. A purchaser with notice is protected by his vendor's want of notice. An adversary possession of 50 years, though with knowledge of a better title, constitutes a good defense against that title. A purchaser without notice has a right to join his adversary possession to the ostensible adversary possession of his vendor, so as to give himself the benefit of the statute of limitations.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, as a Court of Equity.

The case, as stated by MARSHALL, Ch, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, was as follows:

This suit was brought in the year 1806, in the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, for the purpose of quieting the title of Nathaniel Pendleton, the plaintiff in that court, to 83 acres of land contiguous to the town of Alexandria which have been in his possession, and in the possession of those under whom he claims, from the year 1732, to the present time.

Robert Alexander, being seized of a large tract, on part of which the the town of Alexandria now stands, on the 17th of January, in the year 1731–2, executed to Dade Massey, then about to intermarry with his daughter Parthenia Alexander, his bond in the penalty of £800 with a condition that he would convey to his daughter Parthenia and her heirs, on demand, four hundred acres of land lying on Potomac, "beginning on the river side, and from thence running to his back line, making a long square so as to have the same breadth on the river as on the back line."

The marriage soon afterwards took effect, and she was put into possession of the land by the following bounds, that is to say: "Beginning at the mouth of Goings gut, on the river Potomac, and extending down the river so as to 463] *include four hundred acres of land between the river and the back line."

The back line called for in the patent was a due north course; that by which Robert Alexander then held was north 6 west. Claims have been since successfully asserted which would vary the back line so as to run north 17 west. The appellants insist that those who hold under Parthenia shall be compelled to extend to the back line, as now established, and proportionably to contract their line down the river, so that the parallelogram shall still comprize four hundred acres. Pendleton, who is a purchaser under Parthenia, insists on being limited on the west by the line north 6 west, which was the back line when the title of Parthenia accrued.

In the year 1735, Robert Alexander departed this life, having first made his last will in which he devised as follows: "Item—I give to my daughter Parthenia Massey four hundred acres in Prince William county, according to my bond. Item—I give to my daughter Sarah Alexander, four hundred acres joining Parthenia Massey, the same length on the back line and the same breadth on the river."

Parthenia survived her husband, Dade Massey, and intermarried with Townshend Dade. Sarah intermarried with Baldwin Dade, and was put into possession of the land devised to her.

John and Gerard Alexander were the only sons of Robert, and were the co-devisees of the bulk of his estate. In April, 1740, John instituted a suit against Gerard for partition; and to this suit Townshend Dade and Parthenia, his wife, and Baldwin Dade and Sarah, his wife, were parties defendants. A decree of partition was made, directing that the lands of the Dades also should be allotted to them to be held in severalty. Commissioners were appointed to execute this decree, with directions to report their proceedings to the court.

Under this interlocutory decree the land was surveyed by Joseph Berry, and a division made. Four hundred acres were allotted to Townshend Dade and Parthenia, his wife, and the same quantity to Baldwin Dade and *Sarah, [464 his wife. This allotment was made on the idea that north 6 west was the true back line. But as the Alexanders intended to institute suits for the purpose of recovering lands lying west of the north 6 line, it was agreed between all the parties that the partition then made should not be conclusive, but should depend on the suits about to be instituted. In consequence, as is presumed, of this verbal agreement, the survey and proceedings under this interlocutory decree were not returned; and in May, 1741, the suit was dismissed agreed.

Townshend Dade and Parthenia, his wife, remained in quiet possession of the four hundred acres devised to Parthenia by her father, according to those boundaries which had been marked out on the idea that north 6 west was the true back line.

Sarah Dade died without issue; on which event her land was limited to her two brothers John and Gerard, who entered thereon and continued to hold it according to Berry's survey.

John Carlyle claimed the land west of north 6 west; and, in April, 1766, commenced an ejectment against Alexander, who appears to have recovered part of the land between north 6 and north 17 west in a previous ejectment against one of his tenants. In May, 1771, a verdict and judgment were rendered in his favor.

In the year 1774, Townshend Dade and Parthenia, his wife, instituted a suit against John Alexander for a title to the land mentioned in the bond of Robert Alexander. To this suit John Alexander filed his answer, stating the death of Dade Massey leaving a son by Parthenia, her subsequent marriage with Townshend Dade, and the doubt who was entitled to the land, as the reasons for its not having been previously conveyed.

In the same year Charles Alexander, son and heir of John, filed his answer, in which he states the doubt respecting the back line, admits the north 6 west to be the present back line, and prays that, should a more western boundary be at any time established, he and his heirs might be at liberty to vary the boundaries of Parthenia's land so as to conform to such future back line.

*In 1776, a deed was executed by [465 Charles Alexander to Parthenia Dade conveying 400 acres of land according to the bond of Robert Alexander. This deed specifies no boundaries and contains no stipulation respecting the future change of the back line. It would confirm the will of Robert Alexander, if that will wanted confirmation. In the year 1779, this suit was dismissed, neither party appearing.

In May, 1778, Parthenia Dade conveyed this tract of land with no other description of the metes and bounds that was expressed in the bond and will of her father, to William Hartshorne, who took possession of the land and held it according to Berry's survey, which makes north 6 west the back line.

William Hartshorne laid off the northern part of the tract from the river to north 6 west in twenty-three lots, which he sold to various persons; and then, in May 1779, conveyed the residue of the land, which includes that in controversy, to William Harman, of Pennsylvania, by metes and bounds taking north 6 west to be the true back line.

In the year 1786, Mordecai Lewis, executor of William Harman, conveyed this land to Elisha Cullen Dick, who, in 1796 conveyed eighty-three acres, the land now in dispute, to Henry Lee, who, in June, 1797, conveyed to Baldwin Dade, who, on the 29th day of December, in the year 1801, conveyed to Philip Fitzhugh, who, on the 18th of February, 1802, conveyed to Nathaniel Pendleton. In the same deed Fitzhugh conveys also to Pendleton three acres of land, other part of the tract of 400 acres, with notice that Charles Alexander claims north 17 west as the back line.

Previous to the conveyance from Baldwin Dade to Philip Fitzhugh, the said Dade had conveyed the land in controversy to Thomas Swan to secure a debt due to William Hodgson. Swan conveyed to William B. Page, in trust for Hodgson, who conveyed to Hodgson, who, in July, 1803, conveyed to Pendleton.

Soon after the decision in favor of Carlyle in May, 1771, Charles Alexander brought an [466*] ejectment for the *same lands, and in 1790 a verdict was given in his favor, on which a judgment was rendered, which was affirmed on appeal in 1792. In 1796, Charles Alexander instituted a suit in the Court of Chancery in Virginia, for the purpose of altering the boundaries by which the land of Parthenia had theretofore been held, and of laying off that tract so as to extend it to north 17 west, thereby narrowing its breath where it stretches towards the town of Alexandria, and giving it more length. To this suit, those under whom Pendleton claims, with others, were made defendants.

Charles Alexander departed this life in the year 1806, and the suit has not been revived.

Nathaniel Pendleton being about to sell the land in controversy, tendered to Charles Alexander a deed for quieting the title; and, on his refusing to execute it, instituted a suit to compel him so to do. After the death of Charles Alexander this suit was brought against the defendant, his widow and children.

In the Circuit Court a decree was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendants have appealed to this court.

The cause was argued last term by Swann and Jones, for the appellants, and by E. I. Lee and C. Lee, for the appellee.

Swann, for the appellents.

The only question is, whether the long possession according to metes and bounds gives a good title, notwithstanding the claim of Alexander to carry his back line so as to run north 17 degrees west; instead of north 6 degrees west.

The bond to convey to Parthenia in 1731–2, calls simply for the back line; R. Alexander's will, in 1735, devises the land to her by the same description; and the deed of confirmation from Charles Alexander in 1776 still refers to the back line. Whatever should be the back line to Alexander's tract was to be the western boundary of Parthenia's 400 acres. In 1740 a suit was *instituted for partition, in [467 which Parthenia was a party. A survey and partition was made, but was not acted upon by the court, because the parties all understood that the back line was unsettled, and the partition then made was agreed to be temporary, and to be reformed if the back line should be carried farther to the westward than north 6 degrees west. This agreement, although verbal, was binding on Parthenia, at least so far as to prevent her possession from being considered as adversary to Alexander as to that part of the land which might be taken away upon settling the back line.

There was therefore no adverse possession until 1778, when Parthenia sold to Hartshorne. From 1778 to 1796, when C. Alexander instituted his suit in the Court of Chancery in Virginia, to alter the boundaries of the tract, there had not been twenty years of adverse possession. If Pendleton had looked back to his title he would have found that it was never conveyed by metes and bounds, prior to 1778, and that the question of boundary was still unsettled. He purchased while that suit was pending, and therefore must be presumed to have had notice of the claim.

E. I. Lee and C. Lee, contra.

This case is not affected by the question, which was the true back line of Alexander's land. Neither Parthenia nor those claiming under her were parties to any suit in which that question was litigated, and cannot therefore be bound by any decision on that point. At the date of the bond, and of Robert Alexander's devise to Parthenia, he held only to the line north 6 west. The conveyance is to be taken most strongly against the grantor. In 1776, when C. Alexander made the deed to Parthenia, he held only to the same line, and it had been at that time established as his back line by a judgment in the year 1771.

If there were sufficient evidence of a parol agreement, it could only be an agreement to reconvey the land, if the back line should be settled further to the westward. Being a parol agreement to convey land, it would have been void by the statute of frauds.

*If Pendleton had notice of the pend- [468 ency of C. Alexander's suit in chancery to alter the boundaries, yet that suit was afterwards discontinued, and there is no evidence that Hartshorne, or those claiming under him, had notice of the claim until after they had made their purchases. Pendleton holds their rights, and can protect himself by their want of notice.

Jones, in reply.

There was nothing in the title to deceive purchasers. There was sufficient evidence on the face of the deed to show that the possession was temporary. They all referred to the back line of Howsen's patent; and every purchaser would necessarily inquire where that line was. Upon the inquiry he would find either that the line was in dispute and unsettled, or that it had been settled at north 17 degrees west.

The agreement was merely evidence of the nature of the possession, and was no more affected in this respect, by the statute of frauds, than would be a simple declaration of the tenant; that he held not adversely to, but under R. Alexander.

If the title is to be quieted, it must be upon the principle that long possession by certain metes and bounds induces a presumption that some deed had been made conformable to the possession. But such a presumption is rebutted by the agreement.

March 12th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"This being an application to restrain a person from the assertion of title in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the prayer of the bill ought not to be granted in a doubtful case; but if the case be a clear one, the interposition of equity is allowable; and the situation of the land adjoining a growing city, the number of persons who are consequently interested in the settlement of the question, and 469] the numerous titles which depend *on it, give it peculiar claims to the attention of the court.

By the laws which govern this case, a possession of thirty years under some circumstances, and of fifty years under any, constitutes a title against all the world. The appellee claiming under a possession perhaps from the year 1732, certainly from the year 1741, has a complete title, unless something can be alleged by the plaintiffs in error which shall deprive him of the advantages of that possession.

It is urged that the contract of 1741, between the Alexander's and the Dade's, made the latter trustees for the former with respect to that portion of the land included in Berry's survey, which they had agreed to surrender in the event of establishing a more western back line. And that, therefore, in computing time, we must commence with the sale from Parthenia Dade to William Hartshorne, in May, 1778.

Had the land continued in possession of Parthenia Dade and her heirs, the question whether this contract was of unlimited duration, or contemplated some particular suit then intended to be brought, would merit consideration. But as the contract does not appear on the title papers, but was verbal, a purchaser for a valuable consideration could not be affected by it unless he was a purchaser with notice. Finding Parthenia Dade in the quiet and undisturbed possession of four hundred acres of land, forming a parallelogram, limited on the west by the line north 6 west, he had a right to consider that line as established, so far as respected the land of Parthenia. He was not bound to know that a private parol agreement existed, which would control the possession. This trust, therefore, no more passed with the land to Hartshorne than would any other secret trust of which he had no knowledge.

The various suits which have been instituted by, and against the ancestors of the appellants cannot affect this cause. A suit not prosecuted to a decree or judgment is not constructive notice to a person not a pendente lite purchaser; and were the law otherwise, those suits, until that instituted in 1796, would convey no notice 470] of the *private agreement made in 1741. A knowledge of the suits, therefore, would not imply a knowledge of the trust; and possession for fifty years, though with knowledge of a better title, if adversary, constitutes a good defense against that title.

In 1796, Charles Alexander instituted a suit against sundry persons claiming the land in controversy for the purpose of altering the boundaries which had been held by Parthenia, and those claiming under her, from the year 1732, and which had been surveyed under an interlocutory decree made by the Court of Chancery in the year 1741. In defending themselves against this claim, the purchasers of the land had a right to unite the possession of Parthenia Dade to their possession, without being affected by a secret trust of which they had no notice. If, upon the trial of that suit, a possession of fifty years could not have been established, and if the court should have been of opinion that this was not a case in which an adversary possession of thirty years would have constituted a bar, the merits of the title would have been necessarily investigated. But if Charles Alexander had permitted that suit to be dismissed, and had filed a new bill, he would not have been at liberty, in the computation of time, to avail himself of the pendency of the former suit, unless he could have connected the two suits together. The law is the same where a suit terminates by abatement and is not revived; such a suit takes no time out of the act of limitations. The title of Pendleton, therefore, has from that act all the benefit which can be derived from a possession from the year 1741—when a possession ostensibly adversary by metes and bounds unquestionably commenced—to the institution of this suit in the year 1806. The deduction which the laws of Virginia make from all computations of time in consequence of the war of the revolution, will not be sufficient to take this case out of the act of limitations. The appellee's title, being secured by a possession of more than fifty years, is unquestionably good, and it is proper that the doubts which hang over it should be removed.

There is no error in the proceedings of the Circuit Court, and the decree is affirmed.

CARROLL

After a lapse of seven years, the court will refuse to decree a specific performance of a contract, in the part execution of which the complainants, or those under whom they claim, have expended large sums of money, although the first default was on the part of the defendant, and although it be probable that the failure of the defendant in that respect has prevented the completion of the execution of the contract on the part of the complainants

NOTE.—If the plaintiff has been guilty of gross laches, or if he has not applied for relief until after a long lapse of time, unexplained by equitable circumstances, his bill will be dismissed. A court of equity will not administer relief to gross negligence any more than a court of law. Brashier v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 528; King v. Hamilton, 4 Peters, 311, 329; 1 Madd. Ch. 414, 415; Finch v. The party, to entitle himself to the aid of the circumstances having so changed that neither party could derive, from the execution of the contract, all the benefits which were at first expected.

THIS case appears to be fully stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, whereby a bill brought by the plaintiffs for the specific performance of a contract was dismissed. The material facts are these:

Daniel Carroll, the defendant, was, previous to the establishment of the city of Washington, proprietor of a large tract of land, part of which lies within its present limits. This part was conveyed to trustees, one moiety for the use of the public, and the other moiety for the use of the said Carroll.

After the place for the seat of government had been selected, and the boundaries of the city marked out, the legislature of Maryland authorized the appointment of commissioners to superintend the affairs thereof, and, among other powers, authorized them to divide the lots in the said city between the public and the original proprietors, and declared that such divisions made in a specified form and certified by them should revest in the original proprietors the legal estate whereof they were formerly seized in the lots and squares assigned to them respectively. The commissioners were also authorized to sell the lots retained for the public use, and on receiving the purchase money, to convey to the purchasers. On the 23d of September, 1793, James Greenleaf purchased from the commissioners three thousand lots lying in that part of the city which had been conveyed by Carroll; and on the 24th of December, 1793, James Greenleaf and Robert Morris made from the commissioners an additional purchase of three thousand lots. Neither the purchase money being then paid nor a division made, the legal title remained in the trustees, and was a security for the purchase money. These contracts, if executed by conveyances, would have 472] *vested in Greenleaf and Morris all the public lots which were intermingled with those hereinafter stated to have been purchased by Greenleaf from Carroll.

On the 26th day of September, in the year 1793, the said Daniel Carroll and James Greenleaf entered into articles, whereby Daniel Carroll covenanted in consideration of £5 and of the covenants thereinafter mentioned, to convey to the said Greenleaf twenty lots of ground in the city of Washington, fronting on South Capitol street, in all convenient speed after the lots in that part of the said street should be divided between the said Carroll and the Commissioners of the Public Buildings. The said conveyances to be on condition to be void in case the said Greenleaf should not, within three years from this date, erect a good brick house on each lot at least 25 feet front, 40 feet deep, and two stories high. And the said Carroll further covenanted, that after the division, to be made of the land lying between the fork of the canal, between him and the commissioners should be completed, he would sell to the said Greenleaf every other lot belonging, after such division, to the said Carroll, for the consideration afterwards mentioned in the said articles; and would lay out the whole amount of the purchase money, when received, in building houses as near as well might be to those erected and erecting by the said Greenleaf; and in case of selling any of his property, he would cause buildings, to the amount of the purchase money, to be erected thereon. The said Greenleaf agreed to erect, on each of the first-mentioned twenty lots, one good brick house, at least 25 feet front, 40 feet deep, and two stories high, within three years from the date, and to reconvey any of the said 20 lots not built upon within the time, and pay £100 for each of the said lots not so built upon; to pay £30 for each of the other lots to be purchased; to lay out on the last mentioned lots the sum of £3,000 within two years, and the further sum of £3,000 within four years; to pay one half of the amount of the purchase money with interest within two years, and the remainder, with interest, within four years. Carroll to make deeds for the last mentioned lots purchased as the money should be paid. The parties bind themselves each to the other in the penal sum of £20,000.

*On the 8th June, 1795, it was agreed [473 between the same parties to change the contract so far as that the said Greenleaf should build twenty brick houses of such description as he should judge proper, provided they are two stories high, and cover an equal extent of ground with the houses before mentioned, and of which the one moiety or ten houses shall be built on the south part of the square numbered 651, and the residue on the east side of said square.

In July, 1794, a partial division was made between Carroll and Greenleaf, by which the square No. 651 was allotted to the latter. It was on this square that the twenty houses mentioned in the contracts between the parties were intended to be built.

On the 13th of May, 1796, James Greenleaf, in pursuance of articles made July 10th, 1795, assigned his contract with Carroll to Morris and Nicholson, to whom he also transferred his interest in a large portion of the lots purchased from the commissioners. In the summer of 1796 Morris and Nicholson came to the city of Washington, when a division of the lots was completed, which was reported to the commissioners on the 14th of September, by whom it was then ratified. Twenty brick houses were erected on the square 651, and covered in by the 26th September, 1796, the time specified in the contract. Some of them were completed. In May, 1797, Daniel Carroll entered into the square 651, and took possession of the buildings thereon, which he has held ever since, and has permitted them to be greatly injured.

Morris and Nicholson conveyed their property in the city to the plaintiffs, in trust for certain creditors, by deed bearing date the 26th day of June, 1797, and became bankrupts. This bill was filed in December, 1804, claiming a specific performance of the whole contract of September, 1793, or, if the court should be of opinion that the contract ought to be divided, the plaintiffs pray for a specific performance of that part of it which respects the twenty lots, on which they say houses have been erected in conformity with their agreement. They contend that the non-execution on their part of so much of the contract of September, 1793, as 474] remains to be *performed is not to be ascribed to any fault of theirs, but to the failure of Carroll to convey the lots he had stipulated to convey.

On the part of the defendant it is contended that he could not convey until a division should be made and sanctioned by the commissioners, and that it was as much the duty of Greenleaf as of himself to attend to the division. That his great motive for entering into the contract was, by improving that part of the city in which his property lay to increase its value and to give the town that direction. That this, from the failure of the other contracting party to perform his covenants, has become impossible; that the consideration on which he was to convey, cannot now be received; and that it would, therefore, be iniquitous to compel a conveyance.

This court is clearly of opinion that by the contract of September, 1793, Daniel Carroll was bound to convey to Greenleaf the property therein mentioned without waiting for the execution of the contract on the part of Greenleaf. Being so bound, he ought to have taken those steps which were within his power, and which were necessary to be taken in order to enable him to perform his engagements. He ought, therefore, to have obtained from the commissioners that act which would revest in himself the property to be conveyed.

It is true that Greenleaf, having purchased the public lots, must have concurred in the division, and, had he declined coming to one, his default would have excused Carroll. But it is not pretended that he ever declined a division. It is true that his omitting to press one is a proof that, for some time at least, he was not anxious on the subject; and this diminishes the blame which might otherwise attach to Carroll for his inattention to so material a circumstance.

But in July, 1794, a division between Carroll and Greenleaf of several squares was made, and the square on which the twenty houses were to be erected was, among others, assigned to Greenleaf. There is no excuse for the delay of Carroll in enabling himself to convey the lots assigned to Greenleaf in this division. He *alleges that, as the calculations of [475 their contents were inaccurate, the confirmation of this division by the commissioners was necessarily deferred until this matter should be adjusted. But the court cannot admit the sufficiency of this apology. Any inaccuracy in the calculations would be adjusted by allowances in the divisions afterwards to be made of the remaining lots.

It appears that in February, 1796, Robert Morris offered the first payment stipulated in the contract of September, 1793, with the interest which had accrued thereon, and demanded deeds for the twenty lots. In this letter Morris consents that these deeds should be executed as an escrow, to be delivered on their fulfilling that part of the contract by building twenty houses on the said lots, and proposes that separate deeds should be executed, that so many might be delivered as Morris and Nicholson should entitle themselves to. He also demanded a conveyance of so many lots as the money offered would pay for, and required that Carroll should perform that part of his contract which required him to lay out half the money received in improving adjacent lots. This is the substance of Morris's letter, dated 22d February, 1796, directed to Mr. Cranch, the agent of Morris, which appears by Carroll's letter, written on the 29th of the same month, to have been laid before him, although Mr. Cranch does not recollect the fact. The conveyances, however, were not made nor the money paid.

Although the covenant to convey is not a condition precedent on the performance of which the covenant to build depends, yet both from the words of the contract and the nature of the transaction, it was apparently the expectation of the parties that the conveyance would precede the building. Nor was the conveyance an immaterial circumstance. In any state of things it was an important part of the contract, and in the events which have actually occurred, it was so important as to render it probable that the failure of Carroll in this respect has prevented the completion of the twenty buildings. Under this view of the case, had the bill demanding a specific performance been brought immediately after the entry of Mr. Carroll in May, 1797, the claim of the plaintiffs would certainly have been 476] entitled *to serious attention, and might perhaps have prevailed. It was not then too late, by executing the contract, to have effected its great object. But the state of things is now entirely altered. The effort to give the city that direction would now, according to every reasonable calculation, be unavailing. Time, therefore, in this contract was essential; and although, in consequence of the failure of Carroll to convey, the court might have relieved against a forfeiture so long as an execution of the contract could place the parties essentially in the situation in which they would have stood had exact punctuality been observed; yet equity cannot relieve where it is impossible to place the parties in the same situation, and when real fault is imputable to the person praying the aid of the court. So far, then, as Morris and Nicholson have failed to execute the contract of September, 1793, the plaintiffs are too late to be entitled to the aid of this court.

But it is contended that Morris and Nicholson have fully complied with that part of the contract which respected building twenty houses, and are therefore entitled to a conveyance of the twenty lots. The description of the houses to be built is so indefinite as to be satisfied, it is said, by running up the brick walls, and putting on the roofs.

The court is not of that opinion. On fair construction the contract requires that the houses should be fit for the habitation of families. No particular degree or kind of finishing is prescribed; but a building cannot be fairly denominated "a good brick house" until it be rendered a comfortable dwelling, fit for the reception of a tenant. This was certainly contemplated by the parties, and a different construction would tolerate an unfair and fraudulent execution of the agreement.

But, although the twenty houses were not all completed, some of them were, and on examining the contract it appears that Greenleaf and his assigns were entitled to a lot for each house they should build. The contract, with respect to the twenty lots, was not entire. It was not necessary to perform the whole contract, or to forfeit the whole property—that which was, as well as that which was not improved. This will be clearly perceived on a reference to the contract itself.

*Carroll covenants to convey twenty [477 lots with conditions to be void if Greenleaf shall not within three years erect a good brick house of stipulated dimensions on each lot. Greenleaf agrees to erect the houses, and covenants to reconvey any lot not built upon within the time, and to pay £100 for each lot not so built upon. This stipulation obviously severs the contract with respect to each lot. Only those not built upon were to be reconveyed, and for each lot reconveyed there was a forfeiture of £100.

So far as the contract has been executed by Greenleaf or his assigns, he and they ought to be placed in the same situation as if it had been executed by Carroll also. Had it been executed by him, the title of Morris and Nicholson to as many lots as they had erected houses of the description agreed upon, would have been absolute. It could not have been defeated by their failure to perform the residue of the contract. Carroll ought not to enable himself to defeat it by having broken his contract.

The plaintiffs, then, ought to have a conveyance of so many lots as shall be equal to the number of houses they have completed under the agreement of September, 1793, and as Carroll's entry in May, 1797, was so far tortious he ought to be accountable for the injury sustained by the property, and for rents and profits from that time. But as the same contract binds Greenleaf and his assignees to pay £100 for each lot not improved, and as the court does not consider this as a mere penalty, but as damages assessed by the parties themselves, the plaintiffs will not be entitled to a conveyance of the lots which were improved without paying £100 with interest from the 6th of May, 1797, the time when the contract was determined by the entry of Carroll, on each unimproved lot. It is at their election to obtain a specific performance on these terms, or to abandon their claim.

It is the opinion of this court that the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded with directions to take an account of rents and profits which have been or might have been received by the defendant on the houses which have *been completed by Morris and Nichol- [478 son on the twenty lots in the proceedings mentioned; and also to take an account of the money with interest thereon, which was demandable by the defendant on each unimproved lot; and that an issue, to be tried either in Alexandria or Washington, be directed to ascertain what damages have been sustained by the houses built by Morris and Nicholson previous to the 6th of May, 1797, whether finished or unfinished, on those lots which shall be decreed to be conveyed to the plaintiffs, since the entry then made by the defendant; and that on receiving the balance, if any, which may remain due to the said Carroll after deducting the rents and profits before mentioned, and the damages aforesaid, he be directed to convey to the plaintiffs a number of standard lots which shall be equal to the number of houses completed by the said Morris and Nicholson in pursuance of the contract of September, 1793; the said lots to be those on which the houses stand, which may have been completed, and if there be more than one house standing on the same standard lot, so that it may be necessary to convey lots not fully improved in order to make the quantity of ground equal to the superficial contents of the standard lots to be conveyed, then such standard lots are to be laid off by direction of the Circuit Court, in such manner as may be equitable and convenient; provided, that the ground improved or built upon by Morris and Nicholson under the said contract, and re-entered upon by the defendent in May, 1797, be appropriated in the first instance as far as the same shall suffice or be necessary to make up the quantity of ground to be conveyed to the plaintiffs, but so appropriated that no lot shall be divided, unless it be necessary to convey part of a lot in order to make up the full quantity of six standard lots.

NOTE.

The Extra Annotation here following is arranged in the order of the cases in the original reporter's volume which precede it. At the upper outside corner of the page is given the volume and pages of the cases to which the Annotation refers. After the official reporter's volume and page in the heading of each case is given book and page of the present edition, the abbreviation L being used for Lawyers' Edition, or Law. Ed. for brevity, as it is throughout in the duplicate citations of cases from the Supreme Court.

ABBREVIATIONS.

F. C. appended to a citation from the regular reports of the U. S. Circuit and District Courts refers to the series of reprints called the Federal Cases and gives, as its publishers do and recommend, the number of the case in that series.

Fed. Cas. is used when the case is contained in the series of Federal Cases but is not reported in the regular series of U. S. Circuit and District Court Reports, and the citation of such cases is to the volume and page of Fed. Cas., not to the number of the case.

Fed. or Fed. Rep. refers to the well known series Federal Reporter, containing reports of the Circuit and District Court decisions since 1880.

L. R. A. will be readily recognized as the abbreviation for the Lawyers' Reports Annotated, and particular attention should be given to these citations, as in a large proportion of cases the citing case will be found accompanied by a note on its principal point absolutely exhaustive of the authorities thereon.

Am. Dec., Am. Rep. and Am. St. Rep. will be readily recognized as the abbreviations for the well known trinity of selected case reports, The American Decisions, American Reports and American State Reports.

Pennsylvania State Reports (Pa. St.) The New Jersey Law Reports (N. J. L.) and Equity Reports (N. J. Eq.) are distinguished by the number of the series, not by the name of the reporter, while the North and South Carolina Reports, Law and Equity, are cited by the name of the reporter where the reports are so titled and it has been the universal custom.

Duplicate citations are given to the National Reporter System where cases are therein contained, and to the Reporter System alone of cases not, at the date of the preparation of the annotation, officially reported. The usual abbreviations are used, as follows:

Atl.	Atlantic Reporter,	So.	Southern Reporter,
Pac.	Pacific Reporter,	S. E.	Southeastern Reporter,
N. E.	Northeastern Reporter,	S. W.	Southwestern Reporter,
N. W.	Northwestern Reporter,	S. Ct.	Supreme Court Reporter.

We think that in all other respects the abbreviations used are clear and familiar to all who are accustomed to the use of legal reports and text books.

Bank, 18 Blatchf. 36, 1 Fed. 674, holding payment to administrator appointed under statute, where party has been absent, etc., is no defense in action by creditor; United States v. Payne, 4 Dill. 389, F. C. 16,014, holding grant of letters on estate of Indian void; Jochumsen v. Savings Bank, 3 Allen, 93, allowing person to recover deposit, though it had been paid to administrator; Roderigas v. Savings Institution, 76 N. Y. 320, 322, 32 Am. Rep. 311, 312, where 63 N. Y. 469, 20 Am. Rep. 562, is distinguished, and holding letters received by administratrix from clerk on petition upon information void; Blakely v. Frazier, 20 S. C. 155, declaring that appointment by Probate Court of executor not nominated in the will is a nullity. Cited, arguendo, in Hamilton v. Brown, 161 U. S. 267, 40 L. 697, 16 S. Ct. 589. See also notes in 33 Am. Dec. 239; 73 Am. Dec. 126; 79 Am. Dec. 66; 27 Am. Rep. 286; 30 Am. Rep. 748, 749, 752, and 47 Am. Rep. 465, on general subject.

Denied in Roderigas v. Savings Institution, 63 N. Y. 469, 20 Am. Rep. 562, holding that money being paid to administrator is a bar to an action.

Execution.— No title passes by a levy under a judgment, void because obtained against one as administrator who is not such in fact, pp. 29, 30.

Executors and administrators.— Executor who absents himself from the State is still bound to perform all his duties, p. 22.

Rule applied in Edmonds v. Crenshaw, 14 Pet. 169, 10 L. 404, holding that the removal of an executor from the State does not disqualify him from continuing to execute his trust.

Miscellaneous.— Cited dissenting opinion, May v. May, 7 Fla. 231; Hatch v. White, 2 Gall. 162, F. C. 6,209; Walker v. Torrance, 12 Ga. 607, but without particular application.

Bills and notes.— Note payable to A. B., as president of a company, is suable by A. B., in his own name, though the proceeds belong to the company, p. 34.

The case is cited to this point and the rule applied as follows: Bank of United States v. Lyman, 1 Blatchf. 306, F. C. 924, 20 Vt. 675, holding parol evidence inadmissible to show who is real party in interest to a promissory note; Pacific Guano Co. v. Holleman, 4 Woods, 464, 12 Fed. 62, holding proof admissible to show principal is owner of note, and he may sue in his own name; Coursly v. Baker, 7 Harr. & J. 32, holding note given in individual's name for partnership debt may be sued on by him; Hymer v. Ijams, 56 Md. 473, holding that where note was given in name of treasurer, suit should be brought in his name; as also Haynes v. Covington, 13 S. & M. 412, where note was made payable to president of board; Underhill v. Gibson, 2 N. H. 357, where note was to agent of corporation; Hunt v. Van Alstyne, 25 Wend. 611, where action was in name of president, plea as to illegality of corporation not good. See also note in 12 Am. Dec. 710, 715, on general subject. Cited in Blanchard v. Ely, 21 Wend. 345, 34 Am. Dec. 252, arguendo.

Partnership.— Rule prohibiting one partner suing another does not apply where a note was given by one partner to an individual partner, p. 34.

Cited and rule applied in Lyon v. Malone, 4 Port. 500, holding where one partner after dissolution pays firm's debts, he may sue others; Grigsby v. Nance, 3 Ala. 351, holding partner may sue on note given as part of capital stock; Huyck v. Meador, 24 Ark. 194, holding that in transactions not connected with the partnership partners stand as individuals; Caswell v. Cooper, 18 Ill. 535, holding one partner can sue on note received after dissolution for sale of goods to another; dissenting opinion, Causten v. Burke, 2 Harr. & Gill, 302, 18 Am. Dec. 299, majority holding one partner cannot sue for work done on account of partnership; Cook v. Canny, 96 Mich. 401, 55 N. W. 987, holding one partner can sue another upon agreement in partnership articles; Gibson v. Moore, 6 N. H. 554, holding partner can sue on award for general balance; Gridley v. Dole, 4 N. Y. 492, holding one partner can sue on note received after dissolution; Crater v. Bininger, 45 N. Y. 548, holding partner can sue, if obligation, though relating to partnership, is distinct; Wilson v. Wilson, 26 Or. 258, 38 Pac. 188, holding partner can sue another on note given for particular items; Collamer v. Foster, 26 Vt. 759, holding one partner can sue on express agreement on distinct matter; Willis v. Barron, 143 Mo. 457, 65 Am. St. Rep. 676, 45 S. W. 290, holding one partner can sue another to compel him to pay his share of a partnership note.

Pleading.— Where defense is matter of fact in denial of contract alleged, it amounts to the general issue, p. 35.

Cited in Little v. Bolles, 12 N. J. L. 174, holding, under statute, that the defendant cannot give notice of special matter when general issue is proper plea.

8 Cr. 36–39, 3 L. 479, BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. HERBERT.

Trustee of an insolvent debtor represents the creditors and is not bound by irregularly recorded mortgage, though debtor would be, p. 39.

Principle applied in Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 489, 24 L. 788, holding pledgee cannot recover from receiver of pledgor, when there was no change of possession. Cited, arguendo, in McGuire v. Briscoe, 16 Fed. Cas. 138.

Distinguished in Haskill v. Sevier, 25 Ark. 161, 162, holding irregularly recorded mortgage good against administrator of mortgagor.

8 Cr. 39–50, 3 L. 481, MARCARDIER v. CHESAPEAKE INS. CO.

Admiralty.— A charter-party for a cargo of a vessel is mere contract of affreightment sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not responsible as owner where the general owner retains possession, command and navigation, p. 50.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this principle: Reed v. United States, 11 Wall. 601, 20 L. 220, where vessel was ordered by government to take a cargo, but master was in command and possession, held, he and not the government was the owner; Leary v. United States, 14 Wall. 611, 20 L. 756, if owner retains command and possession, he is still liable as owner; Shaw v. United States, 93 U. S. 241, 23 L. 881, is to the same effect; United States v. Shea, 152 U. S. 187, 38 L. 406, 14 S. Ct. 521, where government was to have control of vessel for stated time, held to be only a special owner; Donahoe v. Kettrell, 1 Cliff. 138, F. C. 3,980, where owner is to furnish men and have control, it is a mere letting; as also in effect Richardson v. Winsor, 3 Cliff. 399, F. C. 11,795; Webb v. Peirce, 1 Curt. 106, F. C. 17,320, if master is to have possession and navigation of vessel, he is liable as owner; Kleine v. Catara, 2 Gall. 76, F. C. 7,869, holding if ship is to be navigated at expense of owner, charterer is not owner for voyage; Hill v. Steamer Golden Gate, Newb. 314, F. C. 6,492, if charterers are to have possession and control, they are the owners; as also in Eames v. Cavaroc, Newb. 530, F. C. 4,238; The Ship Panama, Olcott, 362, F. C. 10,703, holding agent purchasing ship and furnishing money not owner, though bill of sale is in his name; The Schooner Volunteer, 1 Sumn. 568, F. C. 16,991, and Kerry v. Marine Co., 121 Cal. 568, 66 Am. St. Rep. 65, 54 Pac. 90, holding general owner will be deemed owner for the voyage, notwithstanding charter-party, if he retains control; as also in Certain Logs of Mahogany, 2 Sumn. 595, 596, F. C. 2,559; Ship Nathaniel Hooper, 3 Sumn. 577, F. C. 10,032, and Palmer v. Gracie, 4 Wash. 120, F. C. 10,692. Cited and rule applied in Perkins v. Hill, 2 Wood. & M. 165, F. C. 10,987, holding freight should be paid to charterer, even if owner mans vessel; The Aberfoyle, Abb. Admr. 250, F. C. 16, construing the charter-party to be an affreightment for the voyage; T. A. Goddard, 12 Fed. 178, holding owners of a chartered vessel, retaining control of her navigation, are liable to injuries to cargo, because of dangerous goods taken aboard; Scull v. Raymond, 18 Fed. 550, holding part owner excluded from participation in management not liable for collision; L. L. Lamb, 31 Fed. 32, holding where owner went with vessel, but charterers were to pay crew, latter had lien on ship for wages; The Terrier, 73 Fed. 267, holding where owner appoints officers and crew and retains control, he is liable as owner; as also in Bramble v. Culmer, 78 Fed. 502, 42 U. S. App. 303, holding charterers not liable for loss of vessel through negligence of pilot hired by them; Hayes v. Campbell, 55 Cal. 425, 36 Am. Rep. 46, holding owner of chartered vessel has lien on cargo; Slark v. Broom, 7 La. Ann. 341, holding owners liable; State v. Baltimore, etc., Co., 13 Md. 189, holding general owner retaining possession and control is the owner; Pickman v. Woods, 6 Pick. 254, holding where charterer appointed master, but owner victualed and manned her, latter had no lien; Adams v. Homeyer, 45 Mo. 550, 100 Am. Dec. 393, where owner reserved rent but gave up all control, charterer is owner for the term; to same effect Clarkson v. Edes, 4 Cow. 476, 478, 480, holding general owner had lien on freight; Hagar v. Clark, 78 N. Y. 51, holding charter-party a contract of affreightment; Schooner Argyle v. Worthington, 17 Ohio, 465, where owner furnished master and crew. See also note in 13 Am. Dec. 89.

Marine insurance.— To justify abandonment for technical total loss on ground of deterioration in value of cargo, the deterioration must be of a moiety, excluding memorandum articles, p. 49.

Cited and principle applied as follows: Moreau v. United States Ins. Co., 1 Wheat. 228, 4 L. 78, declaring insurer of memorandum articles is never liable for total loss, where part have reached destination; Humphreys v. Union Ins. Co., 3 Mason, 443, F. C. 6,871, holding, even if all of one article is lost, insurers not liable for total loss under memorandum clause; Robinson v. Insurance Co., 3 Sumn. 224, F. C. 11,949, holding there must be a total loss of cargo; Washburn v. Insurance Co., 82 Fed. 297, holding underwriters not liable for constructive total loss, under warranty against partial loss; Woodside v. Canton Ins. Office, 84 Fed. 284, where clause was construed as a severable contract, and insured recovered for each article lost; Williams v. Insurance Co., 54 Cal. 451, 35 Am. Rep. 79, holding total loss does not mean extinction; Poole v. Insurance Co., 14 Conn. 60, holding there was a total loss, where goods couldn't reach destination; Brooke v. Insurance Co., 4 Mart. (La.) (N. S.) 641, holding under memorandum clause insurers are liable only for a total loss; Brooke v. Insurance Co., 5 Mart. (La.) (N. S.) 536, 541, holding that a constructive loss is excluded in all memorandum articles; Willard v. Insurance Co., 24 Mo. 566, holding there can be no recovery on freight insured against "total loss," in case of constructive total loss; Waln v. Thompson, 9 S. & R. 120, 11 Am. Dec. 677, holding same as to loss of profits insured. And see note to 2 Am. Dec. 179. Cited also in Mayo v. India M. Ins. Co., 152 Mass. 176, 23 Am. St. Rep. 817, 25 N. E. 81; Heebner v. 8 Cr. 72–74, 3 L. 491, CLEMENTSON v. WILLIAMS.

Statute of limitations.—Acknowledgment of original justice of claim insufficient to revive a debt. Acknowledgment must go to fact that claim is still due. Accordingly, partner's statement after dissolution, that he has not paid a debt, will not remove bar of statute, p. 74.

The following citing cases rely upon this holding, and apply it in their decisions: Wetzell v. Bussard, 11 Wheat. 314, 6 L. 483, holding acknowledgment must be unqualified; Thompson v. Peter, 12 Wheat. 567, 6 L. 731, holding acknowledgment by personal representative will not revive debt; Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 361, 7 L. 179, holding same as to acknowledgment of partner, after dissolution; Moore v. Bank of Columbia, 6 Pet. 91, 8 L. 331, holding that in addition to acknowledgment there must be a promise to pay; Shepherd v. Thompson, 122 U. S. 235, 236, 30 L. 1157, 7 S. Ct. 1231, 1232, holding where intention of instrument was that property should be applied to debts, it did not revive personal liability; Nicholls v. Warfield, 2 Cr. C. C. 429, F. C. 10,234, holding conditional promise will not revive debt; Jenkins v. Boyle, 2 Cr. C. C. 120, F. C. 7,262, holding that an acknowledgment accompanied with refusal to pay will not remove bar; Bispham v. Patterson, 2 McLean, 90, F. C. 1,441, holding admission of one partner, after dissolution, does not bind firm; in Wilson v. Torbert, 3 Stew. 306, 21 Am. Dec. 637, is to the same effect; St. John v. Garrow, 4 Port. 226, 29 Am. Dec. 281, admission that a liability exists held sufficient; Crawford v. Childress, 1 Ala. 488, holding verbal acknowledgment will not prevent its running against a bond; Lowther v. Chappell, 8 Ala. 355, 42 Am. Dec. 643, holding admission of maker will not revive debt as against surety; Biscoe v. Jenkins, 10 Ark. 116, holding part payment by one joint debtor will not revive debt as against other; Brown v. State Bank, 10 Ark. 136, holding express written acknowledgment of its existence revives debt; Cooper v. Wood, 1 Colo. App. 106, 27 Pac. 886, holding no acknowledgment of surviving partner, made after death of co-partner, will revive debt against the estate; Lord v. Shaler, 3 Conn. 133, 8 Am. Dec. 161, holding its acknowledgment as a subsisting debt takes it out of the statute; Bound v. Lathrop, 4 Conn. 339, 10 Am. Dec. 148, holding that acknowledgment of one joint maker of note revives it as to all; Marshall v. Dalliber, 5 Conn. 486, holding an untrue declaration of payment not an acknowledgment; De Forest v. Hunt, 8 Conn. 185, holding unqualified acknowledgment removes bar; Coit v. Tracy, 8 Conn. 277, 20 Am. Dec. 113, holding an acknowledgment by a joint debtor, long after their separation and for his advantage, will not remove bar; Dickinson v. McCamy, 5 Ga. 488, 48 Am. Dec. 299, holding acknowledgment of note and claim of discharge will not take case out of the statute; Dawson v. Godkins, 28 Ga. 312, holding new promise is governed by same statute as original demand; Chambers v. Garland, 3 G. Greene, 323, holding a promise to pay made to avoid litigation, not an acknowledgment; Penley v. Waterhouse, 3 Iowa, 440, holding there must be an acknowledgment of a subsisting debt, and a promise to pay it. As also in Head v. Manner, 5 J. J. Marsh. 261; Perley v. Little, 3 Me. 101, holding a conditional acknowledgment insufficient; Peavey v. Brown, 22 Me. 103, holding a promise to renew a note and appointing a time for it, a sufficient acknowledgment; Johnston v. Hussey, 89 Me. 495, 36 Atl. 994, holding acknowledgment, by statute, must be in writing; Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland Ch. 278, holding an acknowledgment to take joint debt out must be equivalent to a renewal by all; Stockett v. Locke, 8 Md. 380, holding acknowledgment of debt and resistance of payment will not remove bar of statute. As also in the following: Bangs v. Hall, 2 Pick. 377, 13 Am. Dec. 442; Ten Eyck v. Distinguished in South Park Comrs. v. Gavin, 139 Ill. 285, 28 N. E. 827, holding actual occupant and a person claiming any interest in the land may, under the statute, be joined as defendants in action of ejectment.

Rule applied in Hunt v. Wickliffe, 2 Pet. 212, 7 L. 401, holding that party with better right is in constructive possession of all land not actually occupied by another; Peyton v. Smith, 5 Pet. 493, 8 L. 203, where one entering without title afterwards attorns to holder of legal title, his actual possession becomes the actual possession of the latter of the entire tract described in patent, from the moment of entry; Clarke v. Courtney, 5 Pet. 354, 8 L. 153, holding possession is coextensive with title, though deed be defective; United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 743, 8 L. 566, holding words "in possession of land" in treaty do not require actual occupancy; as also in Mitchel v. United States, 9 Pet. 735, 9 L. 292; Clymer v. Dawkins, 3 How. 690, 11 L. 786, if a tenant in common enter on part of the land, under a partition, claiming that part in severalty, his possession is adverse to cotenants, though partition be invalid; Shepley v. Rangely, 2 Ware, 248, F. C. 12,756, holding entry good to foreclose the house, was also good to foreclose the lot; Shepley v. Rangeley, 1 Wood. & M. 216, F. C. 12,707, holding entry on one piece of land to foreclose mortgage covering several pieces is good for all; Ledbetter v. Fitzgerald, 1 Ark. 452, holding a party need not be in actual possession to maintain trespass; Conway v. Kinsworthy, 21 Ark. 17, and Wiggins v. Holley, 11 Ind. 7, one holding legal title to lands is constructively in possession of them; Hicks v. Coleman, 25 Cal. 135, 85 Am. Dec. 114, holding one entering on a portion of a tract of land under a deed describing all acquires possession to the entire tract; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 593, 49 Am. Rep. 105, a holding under deed of tenant in common, purporting to convey the whole, is hostile; Rangely v. Spring, 28 Me. 157, holding an entry on one of the parcels mentioned in the mortgage suffices; James v. Rowan, 6 S. & M. 402, holding possession of one joint owner is deemed the possession of both unless there be evidence of an ouster; Cattle v. Sydnor, 10 Mo. 770, declaring that actual possession is the only adverse possession as against the true owner in possession of part; Smith v. Hitchcock, 38 Neb. 109, 56 N. W. 792, holding that one occupying concurrently with owner does not occupy adversely. Cited, but applying the doctrine of the case more generally, in Towle v. Ayer, 8 N. H. 59, defining disseizins; Miller v. Shaw, 7 S. & R. 144, holding that one claiming adversely without color of title acquires what he actually occupies; Garrett v. Ramsay, 26 W. Va. 351, 359, 364, holding that second patentee only acquires possession of what he actually occupies; as also in Ilsley v. Wilson, 42 W. Va. 770, 26 S. E. 555; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. 454, 456, 9 L. 1154, 1155; Koiner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 427, 428, deciding that junior patentee settling outside of the interlock, does not acquire possession of land within interlock; and in the following: Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. 224, 9 L. 405; Norris v. Haggin, 12 Sawy. 58, 28 Fed. 283, and Harris v. McGovern, 99 U. S. 167, 25 L. 319, in considering what adverse possession will set the statute of limitations in motion.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this principle: United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 399, 26 L. 173, holding delivery of patent not necessary to pass title; Doe v. Eslava, 9 How. 447, 13 L. 210, holding confirmation by congress passes fee without patent; Fletcher v. Fuller, 120 U. S. 551, 30 L. 764, 7 S. Ct. 676, holding adverse possession is equivalent to deed in evincing ownership; Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason, 212, F. C. 5,441, holding grant by State conveys seisin; Stokes v. Dawes, 4 Mason, 272, 274, F. C. 13,477, holding commonwealth retains seisin until title is lawfully parted with; Barr v. Galloway, 1 McLean, 480, F. C. 1,037, holding formal entry unnecessary in case of wild lands; Le Roy v. Clayton, 2 Sawy. 496, F. C. 8,268, and Le Roy v. Jamison, 13 Sawy. 391, F. C. 8,271, holding delivery of patent not essential to vesting of title; Potts v. Gilbert, 3 Wash. 478, F. C. 11,347, holding grant from State passes legal possession to grantee; Barclay v. Plant, 50 Ala. 521, holding a deed by party in possession equivalent to livery of seisin; McDaniel v. Grace, 15 Ark. 483, holding title to wild lands draws to it the possession; Wood v. Mansell, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 130, holding if land is not held adversely, bargainee may bring trespass without entering; Breckenridge v. Ormsby, 1 J. J. Marsh, 244, 19 Am. Dec. 78, holding deed executed and delivered passes complete title; Ward v. Fuller, 15 Pick. 192, holding devisee of vacant land may maintain writ of right without an entry; Smith v. Dennett, 15 Minn. 88, holding by statute deed passes complete title; Washburn v. Cutter, 17 Minn. 367, holding owner of wild lands has constructive possession, unless there be an adverse possession; McKinney v. Bode, 33 Minn. 453, 23 N. W. 853, holding patent is conclusive evidence of legal title; Redus v. Hayden, 43 Miss. 635, holding ownership draws possession, unless there is an adverse occupant; Tush-Ho-Yo-Tubby v. Barr, 45 Miss. 193, holding ownership draws possession; Gale v. Davis, 7 Mo. 547, holding patent gives right of possession; Reaume v. Chambers, 22 Mo. 54, holding actual seisin not necessary to entitle husband to curtesy; Dreyer v. Ming, 23 Mo. 437, holding patentee not in actual possession may maintain trespass; North Pac. R. R. Co. v. Majors, 5 Mont. 126, 2 Pac. 325, holding grant of congress imports livery of seisin; Greely v. Steele, 2 N. H. 285, holding covenant of seisin not broken if grantor had title or possession; Enfield v. Permit, 8 N. H. 515, 31 Am. Dec. 208, holding grant by legislature vests actual seisin; as also in Enfield v. Day, 11 N. H. 529; Bradstreet v. Clarke, 12 Wend. 678, 680, holding that legal title, without actual seisin, will maintain a writ of right as to vacant lands ,probably as to other land; Vanderheyden v. Crandall, 2 Den. 21, declaring constructive seisin equivalent to actual seisin; Willson v. Betts, 4 Den. 209, holding grantee of wild lands can maintain writ of right, though never in actual possession; Jenkins v. Fahey, 73 N. Y. 363, holding where there is a vested remainder in fee there is a seisin in law; Holt v. Hemphill, 3 Ohio, 237, 238, holding delivery of deed considered as giving possession; Lowry v. Steele, 4 Ohio, 171, holding, where wife before marriage leased land, husband had constructive seisin; Lee v. Summers, 2 Or. 267, holding present grant from United States passes title at once; Dolph v. Barney, 5 Or. 202, holding grant from State under "Donation Act," passes a fee subject to conditions subsequent; McGraw v. Bookman, 3 Hill L. 267, maintaining action of trespass where plaintiff had title, but had never entered; Withers v. Jenkins, 14 S. C. 611, holding constructive seisin of trust estate will not give curtesy; Peeler v. Norris, 4 Yerg. 344, holding that patent passes complete title; Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex. 388, holding title draws to it the legal seisin; Whitehead v. Foley, 28 Tex. 283, on reconsideration, 289, deciding that legal title draws to it possession; Chandler v. Rushing, 38 Tex. 597, holding one giving up actual possession loses constructive possession of remainder; Robinson v. Douglas, 2 Aiken, 368, where land is held adversely deed does not carry possession; Dickinson v. Hoomes, 8 Gratt. 429, holding entry not necessary in case of wild lands; Bell v. Snyder, 10 Gratt. 354, 355, demandants claiming under seisin of ancestor must prove themselves the heirs; Holloran v. Meisel, 87 Va. 401, 13 S. E. 34, holding grant of commonwealth confers seisin in deed, without entry.

MANDEVILLE
v.
THE UNION BANK OF GEORGETOWN.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., TODD, J., and STORY, J.

By making a note negotiable in a bank, the maker authorizes the bank to advance on his credit to the owner of the note, the sum expressed on its face; and it would be a fraud upon the bank to set up offsets against this note in consequence of any transactions between the parties.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, in an action of debt, by the Union Bank against Mandeville, upon his promissory note to C. I. Nourse, indorsed to the bank.

On the trial below a special verdict was found which states the following facts:

On the 15th of January, 1811, Mandeville, then and always an inhabitant of the town of Alexandria (in the county of Alexandria), for a valuable consideration, made his promissory note at the said town, payable to C. I. Nourse (or order), sixty days after date, negotiable at the Union Bank of Georgetown, payable at the Bank of Potomac, in Alexandria, for $410.51.

The note was delivered to C. I. Nourse, and on the same day indorsed by him, and offered for discount at the Union Bank, where it was regularly discounted for his use.

On the 30th of the same month, Mandeville being informed that this note had been discounted, made no objection, and said that he had funds to meet it.

The note was not paid when it became due, and was protested for non-payment.

10*] *On the 16th of the same month (the day after the date of Mandeville's note) Charles I. Nourse, for a full and valuable consideration, executed and delivered to Mandeville, his note of that date, payable in 60 days, for $400, negotiable at the Bank of Alexandria, payable at the Bank of Columbia (in Georgetown).

On the the 30th of the same month C. I. Nourse became further indebted to Mandeville by the acceptance of his order of that date, drawn at sight, and by acceptance made payable on the 16th of February following, in favor of C. Page, for the use of Mandeville, for $64, neither of which has been paid. The Union Bank transacts its business in Georgetown, in the county of Washington.

On the 2d of February, 1811, Mandeville inserted an advertisement in the Alexandria Gazette, cautioning all persons against receiving assignments of any notes given by him to Nourse, as he had discounts against them.

Mandeville, in the court below, offered to set-off the note and acceptances of Nourse, against his own note, upon which the suit was brought; but upon the special verdict the court below rendered judgment against him for its whole amount; and he brought his writ of error.

By the laws of Virginia, in force in the county of Alexandria, the defendant is allowed to set-off against the assignee of a promissory note any just claim which he had against the original payee before notice of the assignment of the note.

But by the laws of Maryland, in force in the county of Washington, a promissory note, payable to order, is subject to the same rules as in England under the statute of Anne.

On behalf of the plaintiff in error, it was contended that the note, being made at Alexandria and to be paid there, was to be governed by the laws of Virginia, and that as he held Nourse's note, before he had notice of *the assign- [*11 ment of his own, he had a right to offset it in this suit.

On the other side it was said that it was immaterial by which law the note was to be governed; for it was made with a view, expressed on its face, to be discounted by the plaintiffs, whereby the defendant had waived any offset to which he might have a right. Besides which, upon being informed that the note was discounted by the plaintiffs, he did not object, nor insist upon his set-off, but said he had funds (meaning funds of Nourse's) to meet it. By which conduct also he waived his right to the set-off.

Feb. 9th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It is entirely immaterial whether this question be governed by the laws of Virginia or of Maryland. By neither of them can the discounts claimed by the plaintiff in error be allowed.

By making a note negotiable in bank, the maker authorizes the bank to advance on his credit to the owner of the note the sum expressed on its face.

It would be a fraud on the bank to set up offsets against this note in consequence of any transactions between the parties. These offsets are waived and cannot, after the note has been discounted, be again set up.

The judgment is to be affirmed with damages at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

MEIGS ET AL. v. M'CLUNG'S LESSEE.

Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

In the treaty of the 25th of October, 1805, with the Cherokees, the reservation of 3 miles square for a garrison, lies below, and not above the mouth of the Highwassee, where the United States have placed the garrison.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee, in an action of ejectment brought by M'Clung's lessee against Meigs and others.

12*] *On the trial in the court below a bill of exceptions was taken, which stated the case as follows:

The plaintiff's lessor claims the land under a grant from the state of North Carolina to John Donelson, dated the 11th of July, 1788, for 1500 acres lying on the north side of Tennessee River, opposite to a high bluff of rocks of diverse colors. The defendants resided on the land as officers, and under the authority of the United States, who had a garrison there and had erected works at an expense of $30,000. The place where the defendants resided was two miles at least above the termination of the treaty line opposite the mouth of the Highwassee. In 1805 the line between the United States and the Cherokee Indians was run, according to the treaty, under the direction of the defendant, Meigs, who was an agent of the United States for that purpose; and afterwards the garrison reserve of three square miles was laid off by the direction of the defendant, Meigs, opposite and above the mouth of the Highwassee River, making the treaty line from the three forks of Duck River to the point on Tennessee River opposite the mouth of Highwassee the lower line of said reservation, and the Tennessee River the southern line, meandering the river and reducing it to a straight line of three miles in length.

The defendants read a copy of a letter written by D. Smith and the defendant, Meigs, who were commissioners on the part of the United States, at the treaty holden with the Cherokee Indians, on the 25th of October, 1805, dated at Washington, January 10th, 1806, and addressed to the Secretary at War, in which they say "by the treaty with the Indians concluded at Tellico on the 25th day of October, 1805, there was reserved three square miles of land for the particular disposal of the United States, on the north bank of the Tennessee, opposite to and below the mouth of Highwassee. This reservation is ostensibly predicated on the supposition that the garrison at south-west point, and the United States factory now at Tellico, would be placed on the reserve during the pleasure of the United States. But it was stipulated with Doublehead that whenever the United States should find this land unnecessary for the purpose mentioned, then it is to revert to Doublehead; provided, as a condition, that he retain 13] one of the square miles to his own use, *and that he is to relinquish his right and claim to the other two sections of one mile square each in favor of John D. Chisholm and John Riley, son to Samuel Riley, one of the interpreters in the Cherokee nation, in equal shares."

As it is proper that this be recognized, we have made this statement for your information,

And have the honor to be, &c.,

DANIEL SMITH.
RETURN J. MEIGS.

When the defendant and the other officers of the United States went to look for the place to erect the garrison in pursuance of the reserve, they went first below the mouth of Highwassee; but it was a low and marshy country, affording no good site for a garrison, and no water or spring was to be had there.

The plaintiff's counsel insisted that the Indian title to the land was extinguished and that he had a right to recover, and prayed the court so to instruct the jury; to which the defendant's counsel objected, and insisted that the defendants were entitled to recover against the plaintiff, because the Indian title was not extinguished; and because the land was occupied by the United States troops, and the defendants, as officers of the United States, for the benefit of the United States, and by their direction; and because the garrison was erected on the land really reserved for that purpose by the treaty; as they insisted it was out of the land ceded that the reserve was made. That it must, by the letter of the treaty, be understood to be land reserved to the Indians, out of the part ceded, and not a reserve in favor of the United States, out of the land not ceded by the Indians; and that the term "reserve" in the treaty controlled the other expressions, "opposite and "below the mouth of Highwassee." That the United States had a right by the constitution to appropriate the property of individual citizens; and that the line run was the true line of the reservation.

But the court overruled the objections of the defendant's counsel, and charged the jury that the land reserved *for a garrison was op- [14 posite to and below the month of the Highwassee, and that the land opposite to and above was ceded to the United States by the Indians by the treaty of Tellico, and that the United States had no right to appropriate the land mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration. And that the plaintiff was authorized by law to recover, if the land covered by his grant lay opposite to and above the mouth of the Highwassee. That if the treaty had expressly reserved the three miles square for the disposal of the United States opposite and above the mouth of Highwassee, the Indian title would be thereby extinguished, as that reserve would be north of the treaty line. That if the land thus reserved was at the time vacant land, the United States could appropriate it as they pleased; but if it was private property the United States could not deprive the individual of it without making him just compensation therefor. And further, that by the expressions used in the said treaty, the Indian title to all land north of the treaty line, from the point opposite the mouth of Highwassee to Fort Nash, except such tracts as were expressly reserved for the Indians, was extinguished; and that the three square miles reserved for the United States must, according to the treaty, be situate opposite and below the mouth of Highwassee. To this opinion the counsel for the defendants excepted.

By the 2d art. of the treaty of 25th October, 1805 (Laws of United States, vol. 8, p. 192), "The Cherokees quitclaim and cede to the "United States all the land which they have "heretofore claimed, lying to the north of the "following boundary line: Beginning at the "mouth of Duck River, running thence up the "main stream of the same to the junction of "the fork, at the head of which Fort Nash "stood, with the main south fork; thence a "direct course to a point on the Tennessee "River bank opposite the mouth of Highwassee River," &c.

After describing the other lines of the cession, the treaty proceeds thus: "And whereas, "from the present cession made by the Cherokees, and other circumstances, the site of the "garrisons at south-west point and Tellico are "become not the most convenient and suitable "places for the accommodation of the Indians, 15*] "it may become *expedient to remove "the said garrisons and factory to some more "suitable place; three other square miles are "reserved for the particular disposal of the "United States on the north bank of the Tennessee, opposite to and below the mouth of "the Highwassee."

C. Lee, for the plaiutiffs in error.

The points in dispute in this cause are stated in the bill of exceptions. The principal question is, whether the three miles reserved for the use of the United States are to lay below or above the mouth of the Highwassee.

We say that it was the intention of the parties that they should lie above. The expression "reserved" imports an exception to the cession. The reservation must have been out of the land ceded. The United States could not reserve what was not theirs before; but for the accommodation of the Indians they reserve three miles square for the use of the United States. It was intended to prevent the extinguishment of the Indian title to so much iu order to prevent individuals from purchasing it. The letter of Smith and Meigs to the Secretary of War shows that the land was to revert to Doublehead and two others, whenever the United States should cease to have a use for it. It was therefore clearly a reserve, or exceptiou from the general operation of the grant. It would be incousistent with the faith of the treaty to suffer any individual to possess it.

Jones, contra,

Relied upon the plain words of the treaty.

The word "reserve" is the only thing that can justify a question; but it means "to appropriate," to "set apart," to hold it for the use of the United States, for the purpose of a garrison, but uot to make an absolute grant or cession of the land. The expression "three other square miles" shows that they meant other than the land ceded.

The letter is not evidence; it is no part of the treaty; it was never ratified by the senate; aud is unimportant if it was. It, however, shows that there was no mistake in the word "below" in the treaty.

16*] C. Lee, in reply.

The word "reserve" was used to keep individuals from appropriating to themselves the lands supposed most convenient for the mutual accommodation of the Indians and the United States. It means the same as the word "retain."

The word "other" is put iu opposition to the former sites of the garrison and factory. It is straiuing the word "reserve" very far to make it mean a new grant.

MARSHALL, Ch. J.

Does the question arise in this case whether a grant is good before extinguishment of the Indiau title?

C. Lee.

That question does not come up in this case.

STORY, J.

That question has been decided in the case of Fletcher v. Peck.

February 13th. Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The land for which this ejectment was brought, lies within the territory ceded to the United States by the state of North Carolina, and was claimed by a patent anterior to that cession. At the date of the grant the Indian title had not been extinguished. On the 25th day of October, 1805, a treaty was made betweeu the United States and the Cherokee Indiaus, in which the Indians ceded to the United States "all the land lying to the north of the "following boundary liue: Beginning at the "mouth of Duck River, running thence up the "main stream of the same to the junction of "the fork, at the head of which Fort Nash "stood, with the main south fork; theuce a di-"rect course to a point on the Tennessee River "bank opposite the mouth of the Highwassee "River."

*The question on which the cause has been placed is this: Is the land claimed by the plaintiff in the court below within the ceded territory? [*17

The line mentioned in the treaty has been run, and the land in controversy lies on the north side of it, and consequently within the limits ceded to the United States; but there was a further stipulation in the treaty, which the plaintiffs in error say comprehends the lands for which this suit is brought.

After describing the ceded territory, the treaty proceeds to say: "And whereas, from the pres-"ent cessiou made by the the Cherokees, and "other circumstances, the sites of the gar-"risons at South-west point and Tellico are "become not the most convenient and suitable "places for the accommodation of the said Indi-"ans, it may become expedient to remove the "said garrisons and factory to some more suitable "place," three other square miles are reserved for the particular disposal of the United States on the north bank of the Tennessee opposite to and below the mouth of Highwassee.

The ceded territory lies above the mouth of Highwassee, as does the land in controversy; yet the plaintiffs in error contend that this land is within the stipulation for a reserve of three square miles to lie below the mouth of Highwassee.

They attempt to sustain this propositiou by alleging that the word "below" was inserted in the treaty by mistake, when the word "above" was intended.

This mistake ought certainly to be very clearly demonstrated, before the courts of the United States can found upon its existence a judgment which shall deprive a citizen of his property.

The argument, so far as it is drawn from the treaty itself, rests on the word "reserved." It is said that the lands "reserved for the particular disposal of the United States" must necessarily be a part of the ceded territory, or the term would not aptly express the idea of the parties.

*The court cannot accede to this rea- [*18
soning. The treaty is the contract of both parties, each having lands. The words are the words of both parties, and the term might, without any strained construction, be applied to the lands of either. No great violence is done to the known import of the term as used in the treaty, if it be considered as equivalent to the words "set apart." This construction is rendered neeessary by the word "other." "Three other square miles;" that is, other than those before ceded, are reserved for the particular disposal of the United States. The eontext, instead of proving that the word "below" was used by mistake in the treaty, would rather induce the court to put that eonstruction on an ambiguous term, had one been employed.

The counsel for the plaintiffs in error also rely on a letter written by the eommissioners who ncgotiated the treaty to the Seeretary of War on the 10th day of Januâry, 1806. But, without inquiring into the weight to which such a letter is entitled in such a case, it is to be observed that the letter agrees with the terms of the treaty. It says that the three square milcs reserved for the particular disposal of the United States werc "opposite to and below the mouth of the Highwassee." It is unneecssary to make a further eomment on this letter than to say, that there is no expression in it whieh appears to the court to eountenancc, in the slightest degree, the idea that the word "below" in the treaty was used by mistake instead of the word "above."

The facts, that the agents of the United States took possession of this land lying above the mouth of the Highwassee, ereeted expensive buildings thereon, and placed a garrison therc, eannot be admitted to give an explanation to the treaty which would contradict its plain words and obvious meaning. The land is certainly the property of the plaintiff below; and the United States cannot have intended to deprive him of it by violence, and without compensation. This eourt is unanimously and clearly of opinion that the Cireuit Court committed no crror in instrueting the jury that the Indian title was extinguished to the land in eontroversy, and that the plaintiff below might sustain his aetion.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

19*] *SIMMS v. GUTHRIE ET AL.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., STORY, J., and TODD, J.

The land law of Virginia, which gives a right of pre-emption to those who had marked and improved land before the year 1778, refers that right to the time when the improvement was made, and to the time of the passage of the act, and not to the time when the claim for such pre-emption was made before the Court of Commissioners.

If an entry be made by the assignee of a pre-emption right, it will be good, although the name of the assignor be not mentioned in the entry, if the entry refer to the warrant, and if it mention an improvement, provided the place be described with sufficient certainty in other respects.

A bill in equity to enjoin a judgment at law is not to be considered as an original bill, and therefore it is not necessary in a court of limited jurisdiction to make other parties, if the introduction of those parties should create a doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court.

A complainant in equity cannot obtain a decree for more than he has asked in his bill.

ERROR to the Cireuit Court for the District of Kentucky, in a suit in chaneery.

The faets of the case, as stated by the Chief Justiee in delivering the opinion of the court, were as follow:

Charles Simms the plaintiff in error, having obtained a judgment in ejeetment for eertain lands lying in Kentucky, in possession of the defendants, for which the said Simms held a patent prior to that under whieh the defendants elaimed, a bill of injunction was filed by them, praying that he might be deereed to convey to them so much of the land in their possession as was ineluded within his patent.

It appeared in evidence that, in the year 1776, a eompany, of whom John Ash was one, marked and improved several parcels of land lying on the waters of Salt River. John Ash made an improvement on the waters of the Town Fork of Salt River, soon after which William M'Collom, another member of the same company, made an improvement at a spring on the same stream, about seven hundred yards below him. Ash eomplained that M'Collom had encroaehed on his rights by approaching too near him; upon which they agreed to deeide by lot who should be entitled to both improvements. Fortune determined in favor of Ash, and M'Collom relinquished his rights, and improved elsewhere. Ash afterwards amended both improvements, and planted peaeh stones at that which was made by himself.

In April, 1780, before the Court of Commissioners appointed in conformity with the act generally denominated the previous title law, John Ash obtained a certificate in the following words: "John Ash, Sen., claimed a pre-emp- "tion of 1,000 acres of land in the District of "Kentueky on account of marking and improv- "ing the same in the year 1776, lying on the "waters of the *Town Fork of Salt Riv- [*20 "er, about two milcs nearly east from Joseph "Cox's land, to include his improvement. "Satisfactory proof being made to the eourt, "they are of opinion that the said Ash has a "right to a pre-emption of 1,000 aeres of land, "to inelude the above location, and that a cer- "tifieate issue aceordingly."

This certifieate was assigned to Terrell & Hawkins, who, in April, 1781, made the following entry thereon in the surveyor's office of the county in which the lands lie: "Terrell & "Hawkins entered 1,000 acrcs, No. 1226, on "the waters of the Town Fork of Salt River, "about two miles nearly east from Josepl Cox's. "land, to inelude his improvement." This entry was surveyed and patented, and the defendants claim under it. The date of this patent was on the 6th of March, 1786.

The entry of Charles Simms was made on the 13th of April, 1780, his survey on the 25th of the same month, and his patent issued on the 19th of April, 1783.

The claim under an improvement being of superior dignity to that of Charles Simms, his title must yield to that of the defendants in error, if theirs be free from objection.

The land law of Virginia, under which all parties claim, requires that loeations shall be made so specially and preeisely that other persons may be enabled with certainty to loeate the adjacent residuum.

The situation of Kentucky, covered with eonflicting titles to land, has made it necessary that this requisition of the law should be enforced with some degree of rigor, while the ignorance of early locators, the dangers to which they were exposed, and the difficulty of describing, with absolute precision, lands which were held by a very slight improvement made on a single spot, and which could not be immediately surveyed, induced the courts of that country, for the purpose of preserving entries as far as was consistent with law, to frame certain general rules of very extensive application to cases which occurred. One was, that the designation of any particular spot of general notoriety, or such a description of it in relation to some place of 21*] general notoriety *as would clearly point it out to subsequent locators, would give sufficient notice of the place intended to be appropriated, and that a failure to describe the external figure of the land should be supplied by placing the improvement in the centre, and drawing round it a square with the lines to the cardinal points, which should comprehend the quantity claimed by the location.

The court below was of opinion that there was sufficient certainty in the certificate of John Ash, Sen., and in the entry afterwards made with the surveyor by Terrell & Hawkins, that the improvement intended to be claimed by Ash was that which he won of M'Collom, and that the land should be surveyed in a square form with the lines to the cardinal points, including the improvement won of M'Collom in the centre. A survey having been made in conformity with this interlocutory decree, the court ordered the defendant below to convey severally to the plaintiffs in that court so much of the land claimed by them as was included in his patent. To this decree Charles Simms has sued out a writ of error.

Swann, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That Simms having the first entry and first patent and judgment at law in ejectment, his title must prevail.

The entry of Terrell & Hawkins in 1781 cannot be connected with the settlement of Ash. It does not refer to it, and the want of such reference cannot be aided by any extrinsic evidence. The entry must be in itself sufficient, or it can avail nothing. (Harding's Reports, 108, Patterson's devisees v. Bradford.)

2. The entry, if it can be connected with the certificate of the commissioners in favor of Ash, is still void for uncertainty. There were two settlements by Ash, and it does not appear to which the commissioners alluded; or if it does appear to which they alluded, it was to the first settlement of Ash, and not to that which was begun by M'Collom. (Hughes's Reports, p. 95, Harding's Reports, 140, Craig v. Dorrain.) The land ought to have been surveyed from Ash's first settlement, and not from that which he won from M'Collom.

22*] Jones*, contra.

1. The first objection is, that the right of pre-emption never belonged to this land, because it is said that Simms had a prior claim.

But the act only excludes from the right of pre-emption lands to which a legal title had been acquired prior to the date of the act. The law refers back to the improvement, and gives the pre-emption, notwithstanding an intermediate title. Simms must show that his title commenced before the passing of the land law.

2. The second objection relates to the vagueness of the entry.

The entry of Terrell & Hawkins was made upon warrant No. 1226, and refers to it. That warrant was lodged with the surveyor, and refers to the pre-emption certificate of Ash.

The cases cited to show that you cannot make a vague entry certain by reference to another paper, are of recent date, and if they are to be understood as the opposite counsel contends, would be in opposition to the analagous cases, in the case of Patterson's devisees v. Bradford (Harding, 108), it is said that if the entry calls for an improvement you may refer to the certificate to show where the improvement was. So in Greenup v. Kenton (Harding, 16), the court decided that you might refer to another paper to show what was ambiguous in the entry.

It is also said that it appears by extraneous evidence that there were two improvements by Ash, and therefore that the entry is uncertain.

The question is whether the improvement was sufficiently notorious to give notice to subsequent locators. It might have been as notorious as any other object. The cabin, the spring, the run and the location of Joseph Cox were all well known. But it is in proof that one of the improvements was abandoned. They were near each other and formed only one plantation or settlement. The evidence is that Ash's improvement means the cabin where his widow now lives.

Swann*, in reply. [23

The pre-emption of Ash ought to be laid off from his first improvement. Ash renewed both improvements, viz.: Ash's and M'Collom's, as such. The question is, which was Ash's settlement at the time referred to in the certificate of the court of commissioners? What did he mark and improve in the year 1776? It is the improvement made in 1776 only to which the commissioners refer. The cabin was built after the certificate.

February 14th. Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The first error assigned is that the entry and survey of the plaintiff in error being prior to the claim made by Ash before the court of commissioners, gave him a legal right to the land so entered and surveyed, not to be affected by the subsequent claim of Ash.

The words of the act of assembly are: "That "all those who, before the said first day of Jan- "uary, 1778, had marked out or chosen for "themselves any waste or unappropriated "lands, and built any house or hut, or made "other improvements thereon, shall also be en- "titled, on the like terms, to any quantity of "land, to include such improvement, not ex- "ceeding 1,000 acres, and to which no other "person hath any legal right or claim."

The court is clearly of opinion that the words of the law refer to the time when the improvement was made, and to the time of the passage of the act; not to the time when the claim, founded on that improvement, was made to the court of commissioners. If the land, when improved, was waste and unappropriated; if, at the passage of the act no other person had "any legal right or claim" to the land so improved, such right could not be acquired until that of the improver should be lost.

The second error is, that the entry made by Terrell & Hawkins with the surveyor has no 24] reference to the *pre-emption certificate of Ash, aud is therefore not a good and valid entry of Ash's pre-emption right.

Terrell & Hawkins were assignees of Ash; and this ought to have been expressed in the entry. Those words are omitted. In consequence of their omission it does not appear whose improvement is to be included.

Upon this point the court has felt a good deal of difficulty. If the entry with the surveyor could be connected with the certificate of the commissioners, this difficulty would be entirely removed. But the court is not satisfied that, according to the course of decisions in Kentucky, such reference is allowable.

The court, however, is rather inclined to sustain the location, because its terms are such as to suggest to any subsequent locator the nature of the omission which had been made.

Terrell & Hawkins enter 1,000 acres of land, "to include his improvement." It was then a warrant founded on an improvement; and that improvement was made, not by them, but by a single person. Of that single person Terrell & Hawkins were, of course, the assignees. The place was described with such certainty as would have been sufficient, had the assignment been stated. On coming to the plaee, Ash's improvement would have been found. The mistake, therefore, does not mislead subsequent locators. It does not point to a different place. They are as well informed as they would have been by the insertion of the omitted words. The entry, too, contains a reference to the warrant which the law directed to be lodged with the surveyor, and to remain there until it should be returned with the plat and certificate of survey to the land-office.

3. It is also objected that some of the defendants in error do not show a complete legal title under Terrell & Hawkins, for which reasou they have not entitled themselves to a conveyance from Charles Simms; and that one of them, John Meiggs, has obtained a decree for 140 acres of land, although in the bill he claimed only 100 acres.

25*] *Regularly the claimants who have only an equitable title ought to make those whose title they assert, as well as the person from whom they claim a conveyanee, parties to the suit. For omitting to do so an original bill might be dismissed. But this is a bill to enjoin a judgmeut at law rendered for the defendant in equity against the plaintiffs. The bill must be brought in the court of the United States, the judgment having been rendered in that court. Its limited jurisdiction might possibly create some doubts of the propriety of making citizens of the same state with the plaintiff parties defendants. In such a case the court may dispense with parties who would otherwise be required, and decree as between those before the court, since its decree cannot affect those who are not parties to the suit.

It is certainly a correct principle that the court cannot decree to any plaintiff, whatever he may prove, more than he claims in his bill. Nothing further is in issue between the parties. It is not necessary to inquire whether anything appears in this cause which can prevent the plaintiff from availing himself of this principle; because the decree will be opened on another point, in consequence of which this objection will probably be removed.

4. The fourth error is, that John Ash having two improvements, it is uncertain which he claimed before the commissioners, and his entry is on this account void; or if not so, then his claim was for the improvement made by himself, and not for that won from M'Collom.

It is admitted that if the terms of the entry are sueh as to leave Ash at liberty to select either improvement, it is void; and that if the terms of the entry confine him to either, he must abide by his original election.

Upon considering the testimony ou this point, the court is of opinion that the entry may be construed to refer to one improvement in exclusion of the other; but that the improvement referred to is the one first made by himself.

Let the several members of this description be examined.

*John Ash, Sen., claimed 1,000 acres [26 of land, &c., "on account of marking and im- "proving the same in the year 1776."

They were both marked and improved in the year 1776, thc one by Ash himself, the other by M'Collom. The description proceeds: "ly- "iug on the waters of the Town Fork of Salt "River, about two miles nearly east from "Joseph Cox's land."

Both improvements are on the same watercourse; but that made by Ash is nearer the distance and the course from Joseph Cox's land, mentioned in the certificate, than that made by M'Collom.

If, then, it be not absolutely uncertain to which improvement reference is made in the certificate, this court is of opinion that the improvement made by Ash himself is designated.

Is there any testimony in the cause which can control the meaning of the terms of the certificate when viewed independent of that testimony?

There is evidence that the improvement at M'Collom's spring was generally known in the neighborhood. But there is no reason to believe that the improvement originally made by Ash himself was not also known, nor is there any reason to believe that he had abandoned it. On the contrary, he added to it by planting peach stones after having won that made by M'Collom.

It is also in proof that, at the court of commissioners, in April, 1780, in conversation with Thomas Polk, whom he then designed to call on to prove his improvement, he said that he intended to settle at M'Collom's spring.

Supposing this to amount to a declaration of his intent to found his claim to a pre-emption on the improvement commenced by M'Collom, and completed by himself, that intent not appearing in the certificate and entry, could not control those documents. But the court is not of opinion that the conversation will warrant this *inference. The whole case shows [27 that Ash retained his elaim to both improvements, and designed to include both in his preemption. They are both included in his survey. His declaration, therefore, that he meant to settle at M'Collom's spring, and the subsequent building of a cabin at that spring, no more proves which improvement was the foundation of his title than if he had declared a design to settle at any other place on the same tract of land, and had carried that intention afterwards into execution by building at such place.

This court is of opinion that there is error in so much of the decree of the Circuit Court as directs the survey of Ash's pre-emption to be made on the improvement commenced by M'Collom, which is at black A in the plat to which the decree refers; and that the said pre-emption right ought to be surveyed on the improvement originally made by Ash himself, which is at figure 2 in the said plat. The decree, therefore, must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to conform their decree to the opinion given by this court.

The decree of this court is as follows:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof the court is of opinion that there is error in so much of the interlocutory and final decrees of the said court as directs Charles Simms to convey to the plaintiffs in that court the land included in his patent and in the survey directed to be made by that court, of the claim of the said plaintiffs, which survey was ordered to be made in a square form, including the improvement at M'Collom's spring, which is designated in the plat by the black letter A in the centre; and that the said decrees ought to be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court with directions to cause the said pre-emption right of the said Ash to be surveyed in a square form, with the lines to the cardinal points, and including the improvement originally made by the said John Ash, Sen., which is designated in the plat filed in the said cause by figure 2 in the centre; and 28] with further directions *to order the said Charles Simms to convey to the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court respectively the land included in his patent, and lying within their several claims as made in their bill, and as sustained by the evidence in the cause. All which is ordered and decreed accordingly.

SPEAKE AND OTHERS
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—TODD, J.

A bond taken by virtue of the 1st section of the embargo law of January 9th, 1808, is not void, although taken by consent of parties after the vessel had sailed.

The obligors are estopped to deny that the penalty of such a bond is double the true value of the vessel and cargo.

The name of an obligor may be erased from a bond and a new obligor inserted, by consent of all the parties, without making the bond void; such consent may be proved by parol evidence; and it is immaterial whether the consent be given before or after the execution of the deed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in an action of debt for $8,787, upon a bond dated 14th April, 1808, taken by the collector of the port of Georgetown, with condition to be void if the brig Active "should not proceed to any foreign port "or place, and the cargo should be relanded "in some port of the United States." The bond was executed by Speake, the master of the vessel, and by Beverly & Ober, the owners of the cargo, in compliance with the 1st section of the act of Congress of the 9th of January, 1808, entitled "an act supplementary to the act en-"titled an act laying an embargo on all ships "and vessels in the ports and harbors of the "United States." (Vol. 9, p. 10.)

The defendants having pleaded severally sundry pleas, upon which issues in fact were joined, pleaded jointly (after oyer), 1st. "that "they ought not to be charged with the debts "aforesaid by virtue of the writing obliga-"tory aforesaid, because they say that the "said writing obligatory was required and taken "by one John Barnes," collector, &c., "by "color of his said office as collector as afore-"said, and by pretense of an act of Congress, "entitled," &c. (the act of January 9th, 1808, vol. 9, p. 10), "which said writing obliga-"tory and the condition thereof were not taken "by the said *John Barnes," collector, [29 &c., "pursuant to the said act of Congress, but "contrary thereto in this, viz., that the said "writing obligatory was not sealed or deliver-"ed by the said Robert Ober until after the "vessel in the condition of the said writing "obligatory mentioned had received a clear-"ance in due form from the said collector, "and after she had been allowed to depart and "had actually departed from the said port of "Georgetown under the clearance so as afore-"said granted to her, by reason whereof the said "writing obligatory is void and of no effect in "law; and this, the said defendants are ready to "verify; wherefore they pray judgment if they "ought to be charged with the debt aforesaid "by virtue of the writing obligatory afore-"said."

To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder.

2d. Joint plea. That they ought not to be charged, &c., "because they say that the said "writing obligatory was required and taken "by one John Barnes," collector, &c., "by "color of his said office as collector, and by "pretense of an act of Congress," &c., (the act of 9th January, 1808), "which said writing "obligatory and the condition thereof were not "taken by the said John Barnes, collector, as "aforesaid, pursuant to the said act of Con-"gress, but contrary thereto in this, to wit: "that the said writing obligatory was taken in "a sum more than double the value of the ves-"sel and cargo in the condition of the said "writing obligatory mentioned; by reason "whereof the said writing obligatory became "void and of no effect in law; and this, the "said defendants are ready to verify; where-"fore," &c.

To this plea also there was a general demurrer and joinder.

3d. Joint plea. The defendants say that the plaintiffs ought not to maintain their action against them, "because they say that on the "14th day of April, 1808, at," &c., "the said "writing obligatory was signed and sealed by "the said defendants, Josias M. Speake and "Robert Beverly, and a certain Ebenezer "Eliason, and was then and there deliver- "ed to one John Barnes," collector, &c., "for the purpose of obtaining a clearance for "the vessel in the condition of the said writing 30*] "obligatory, *mentioned under the au- "thority of an act of Congress, entitled," &c. (vol. 9, p. 10), "and the said defendants say "that after the said writing obligatory was so "executed and delivered as aforesaid, a clear- "ance was granted in due form of law to the "said vessel, and after she had departed from "the port of Georgetown, under the said clear- "ance, and while the said writing obligatory "was in the custody and keeping of the said "John Barnes," collector, &c., "the said writ- "ing obligatory, by the authority, consent and "direction of the said John Barnes, collector "as aforesaid, was materially altered and "changed in this, to wit: that the name and "seal of the said Ebenezer Eliason were cancel- "led and erased from the said writing obliga- "tory, and the name, signature and seal of the "said defendant, Robert Ober, substituted and "inserted therein, without the license, consent "or authority of the said defendant, Robert "Beverly, whereby the said writing obligatory "was of no force or effect whatever as the "joint deed of them, the said defendants, "Josias M. Speake, Robert Beverly and Robert "Ober; and so the said defendants say that the "writing obligatory is not their joint deed; and "this they are ready to verify; wherefore they "pray judgment if the United States ought to "have or maintain their action aforesaid against "them."

Replication.

"That the said writing obligatory was so "altered and changed," &c., "with the assent "and by the concurrent license, direction and au- "thority of all the said defendants and of the said "Ebenezer Eliason, and not without the license, "consent and authority of the said Josias M. "Speake, Robert Beverly and Robert Ober in "manner and form," &c.

To this replication there was a general demurrer and joinder.

4th. Joint plea. This plea was exactly like the 3d, except that it did not aver that the substitution of Ober for Eliason was without the consent of any of the defendants.

31] *To this plea also there was a replication like that to the 3d plea and a general demurrer and joinder.

The court below decided all the demurrers in favor of the United States. At the trial of the issues of fact, a bill of exceptions was taken by the defendants, which stated that the attorney for the United States produced the bond in the declaration mentioned, and proved its execution by the subscribing witness, who, being cross-examined by the counsel for the defendants, testified, that the defendants, Speake and Beverly, came to the collector's office and executed the bond, but the collector would not grant a clearance without another obligor, when the name of the defendant Ober was mentioned by the other defendants, but as he was then absent, they proposed that one Ebenezer Eliason should be added as the third obligor, and that he should sign and seal the obligation; but that a blank should be left in its body to be filled afterwards with the name of Eliason or Ober, and that it should remain in the possession of the collector for some time to give an opportunity to Ober to execute the same; and it was understood and agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon the return of Ober, if he should execute the same, the name and seal of Eliason should be stricken out, and that of Ober should be signed in his stead, and that his name should be inserted in the body of the bond. Accordingly with this understanding, the bond was executed by Speake and Beverly in the forenoon, and in the afternoon of the same day by Eliason, in the absence of Speake and Beverly, but upon the condition agreed upon between the collector and himself and Speake and Beverly, that his name should be erased from the bond, upon Ober's executing the same. After the bond was so executed a clearance was granted, and after the vessel had sailed, the defendant Ober came to the office and executed the bond, and the blank in the body of the bond was filled with his name, when that of Eliason, with his seal, was erased; at which time neither Speake nor Beverly was present, nor had they given any assent to the said transaction other than what had taken place at the time of their execution of the bond. The witness further testified that it appeared from the papers in the collector's office that Speake was the sole owner of the vessel, and resided in Washington county, *in the District of Columbia, and [32 that Beverly and Ober were the owners and shippers of the cargo.

Whereupon the counsel for the defendants prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should believe that the bond aforesaid was executed and erased at the periods and under the circumstances stated by the witness on his cross-examination, and that at the time of such execution Speake was the sole owner of the vessel, and the other defendants, Beverly & Ober, the owners and shippers of the cargo, they ought to find the issues for the defendants on the joint and several pleas of non est factum; which instruction the court refused to give as prayed; but at the instance of the attorney of the United States instructed them, that if they should find from the evidence that the erasure of the signature and seal of Eliason and the substitution of the signature and seal of Ober, and the insertion of his name in the body of the obligation, was done with the assent and in pursuance of the request and agreement of all the parties to the bond, expressed and well understood at the time they respectively executed the same, then the jury ought to find all the issues of non est factum, joined in this cause, for the United States, notwithstanding it should appear that such alteration of the bond was not made till after the vessel had cleared out and sailed from Georgetown. To which refusal and instruction the defendants excepted, and brought their writ of error.

Swann and C. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. As to the first joint plea, that the bond was not executed by Ober until after the vessel had sailed.

The collector was bound to take the bond before the sailing of the vessel. When an officer is authorized by law to do an act he can only do it as the law requires. The law must be construed strictly, and strictly pursued. (3 Call., 421.) If the defect had appeared upon the face of the bond, this case would be clearly in our favor. Our case is analagous to that of a sheriff who may take bail before the return of the writ, but not afterwards. (2 Chitty's pleading, 478.) So in the case of a sheriff's bond in England, if not taken according to the statute it is void. (2 Saund., 60.) After the departure 33] of the vessel *the power of the collector to take the bond ceased. The cases all show that such an averment may be made. (1 Lord Ray., 349, Pullein v. Benson; 2 Wils., 347, Collins v. Blantern).

2. The same argument applies to the 2d joint plea. The law authorizes a bond to be taken in only double the value of the vessel and cargo. If the officer requires a bond in a larger sum, he exceeds his authority and the bond is void.

3. The third joint plea and the bill of exceptions present a question of great importance; shall a parol agreement authorize an officer to make a material alteration in a sealed instrument? The consequences of such a doctrine would be most dangerous. If one party can be thus substituted for another, why may not the sum be altered? Why not the whole instrument be changed? Why may it not be discharged by parol? Why may not an entirely different contract be substituted? It is in direct hostility to the rule of law that a sealed contract cannot be denied, nor varied, nor discharged by parol. The bond was not delivered as an escrow. It was delivered to the only agent of the United States authorized to receive it. It then became completely executed. No material alteration could be made even by the consent of all the parties, if that consent was evidenced merely by parol. Even if it had been expressly delivered as an escrow, yet if delivered to the collector it could not be as an escrow. A bond cannot be delivered to the obligee as an escrow. (Riddle v. Moss, ante, vol. 5, p. 351.)

By the delivery it became absolute and binding upon all the parties. A discharge of one was the discharge of all. (9 Co., 137, Thorowgood's case; 4 Co., 27, Henry Pigot's case.) It is of no consequence whether the name of Eliason were material or not. An immaterial alteration by the obligee avoids the bond. No parol understanding or agreement of the parties can prevent a material alteration from making the deed void. (Cro. Eliz., 627, Markham v. Gonaston.) The replication admits the erasure and alteration, but relies on the fact that it was done by the consent of all the parties. No subsequent parol consent can vary a written instrument under seal. There would be no safety if 34] such a doctrine *should prevail as is necessary to support this replication. There would be no safety in a sealed instrument if the subsequent agreement, or even the understanding of the parties at the time of its execution, could be given in evidence by parol, to vary the instrument.

Jones, contra.

1. As to the first plea. The law does not require the bond to be given before the departure of the vessel. By consent of the parties it may be given afterwards. The plea states that one of the obligors executed the bond after the vessel had sailed. There is nothing in the law to make the deed void for that cause.

2. As to the second plea. The obligors are estopped by their bond from denying the value of the vessel and cargo. The bond is their own voluntary act. They have agreed to the value. If the question of value were open after giving the bond, it would lead to endless litigation.

3. As to the erasure. There is no authority which forbids such an alteration by the consent of all parties. In the case in Croke the alteration was made without consent of parties. It is immaterial whether the consent be prior or subsequent.

February 16th. Absent—TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an action of debt brought upon a bond given under the first section of the embargo act of the 9th of Jan., 1808, ch. 8. After oyer of the bond and condition, various pleas were pleaded by the defeudants; but it is unnecessary to consider any others than those upon which questions have been argued at the bar.

The second separate plea of the defendaut, Robert Ober, and the first joint plea of all the defendants alleges, in substance, that the bond was taken by the collector of the customs at Georgetown, by color of his office, and by pretense of the act of Congress aforesaid,*and [35 that the bond and condition were uot taken pursuant to the act of Congress, but contrary thereto, in this, to wit: that the bond was not sealed or delivered until after the vessel in the same condition mentioned had received a clearance in due form, and after she had actually departed from the port of Georgetown, under the clearance, by reason whereof the boud is void.

To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder in demurrer; on which the court below gave judgment for the United States.

It is argued by the plaintiffs in error, that the act of Congress of the 9th January, of 1808, sec. 1, having declared that no vessel licensed for the coasting trade shall be allowed to depart from any port of the Uuited States, or shall receive a clearance until the owner, &c., shall give bond to the United States in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, &c., the time of giving the bond is of the essence of the provision; and that if the bond be not taken until after the clearance or departure of the vessel, it is illegal and void.

We cannot yield assent to this argument. In our opinion, the statute, as to the time of taking the bond and granting a clearance, is merely directory to the collector. It is undoubtedly his duty to comply with the literal requirements of the statute. If he neglect so to do, it is an irregularity which may subject him to personal peril and responsibility. If the state of facts has existed to which the statute provision is applicable, the authority to require and the duty to give the bond attaches; and by the voluntary consent of the parties, it may well be given nunc pro tunc. Upon any other construction the owner of the vessel might be involved in great difficulties. If the collector be uot authorized to receive the bond after a clearance, neither is he authorized to grant a clearance before he has received the bond. A clearance, therefore, granted before such bond should be given, would be illegal and void; and a departure from port under such void clearance would subject the owner, vessel and cargo to the forfeiture inflicted by the third section of the act. There is no error in the judgment of the court below on this plea.

36*] *The second joint plea of the defendants alleges that the bond was not taken pursuant to the act of Congress, but contrary thereto, in this, that the bond was taken in a sum more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, whereby the bond became void. On demurrer to this plea and joinder in demurrer, the court below gave judgment for the United States; and we are of opinion that the judgment so given ought to be affirmed. There is no allegation or pretense that the bond was unduly obtained by the collector, colore officii, by fraud, oppression or circumvention, It must, therefore, be taken to have been a voluntary bona fide bond. The value was a matter of uncertainty, and the ascertaining of that value was the joint act and duty of both parties. When once that value was ascertained and agreed to by the parties and a bond executed in conformity to such agreement, the parties were estopped to deny that it was not the true value. If an issue had been taken upon the fact, the evidence on the face of the bond would have been conclusive to the jury; and if so, it is not less conclusive upon demurrer. It would be dangerous in the extreme to admit the parties to avoid a sealed instrument by averring that there was an error in the value by an innocent mistake, or by accident, or by circumstances against which no human foresight could guard. A mistake of one dollar would be as fatal as of ten thousand dollars. Suppose the double value were underrated, could the United States avoid the bond, and thereby subject the party to the penalties of the third section? Where the law provides that the penal sum of a bond shall be equal to the double value, and the parties voluntarily and without fraud assent to the insertion of a given sum, it is as much an estoppel as if the bond had specially recited that such sum was the double value.

The third joint plea in substance alleges that after the execution of the bond, and after the clearance and departure of the vessel and cargo, the bond was, by the authority, consent and direction of the collector, materially altered and changed, in this, that the name of Ebenezer Eliason was cancelled and erased from the bond, and the name, signature and seal of the defendant Robert Ober substituted and inserted therein, without the license, consent or author-

37*] ity of the defendant, *Robert Beverly, whereby the bond became of no force. To this plea the United States replied, that the bond was so altered and changed with the assent and by the concurrent license, direction and authority of all the defendants, and of the said Ebenezer Eliason, and not without the license, consent and authority of the defendants, and prayed that the same might be inquired of by the country. To this replication there was a general demurrer and joinder in demurrer, on which the court below gave judgment for the United States; and we are of opinion that the judgment was right. It is clear, at the common law, that an alteration or addition in a deed, as by adding a new obligor, or an erasure in a deed, as by striking out an old obligor, if done with the consent and concurrence of all the parties to the deed, does not avoid it. And this principle equally applies whether the alteration or erasure be made in pursuance of an agreement and consent prior or subsequent to the execution of the deed; and the cases in the books in which erasures, interlineations and alterations in deeds have been held to avoid them, will be found, on examination, to have been cases in which no such consent had been given.

It has been objected that this principle of letting in parol evidence to prove alterations in a deed to be made by consent, exposes to all the mischiefs against which the statute of frauds was intended to guard the public. If this objection were valid, it would equally apply to such alterations when made before the execution of the deed; for if not taken notice of by a memorandum on the deed itself, they must be proved in the same manner. But it is to be considered that the parol evidence is not admitted to explain or contradict the terms of the written contract, but only to ascertain what those written terms are. On non est factum, the present validity of the deed or contract is in issue; and every circumstance that goes to show that it is not the deed or contract of the party, is provable by parol evidence. It is of necessity, therefore, that the other party should support it by the same evidence. The fact that there is an erasure or interlineation apparent on the face of the deed, does not, of itself, avoid it. To produce this effect it must be shown to have been made under circumstances that the law does not warrant. Parol evidence *is [38 let in for this purpose; and the mischief, if any, would equally press on both sides. The principle, however, which has been already stated, is too firmly fixed to be shaken by any reasoning ab inconvenienti.

The decision upon the third joint plea renders it unnecessary to examine the bill of exceptions taken at the trial on the issue of non est factum. That the bill presents the same point as the third joint plea, with this difference only, that the alteration in the deed by the addition of a new obligor was, in fact, made in pursuance of an agreement entered into between the parties prior to the original execution of the deed.

On the whole, the majority of the court are of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

LIVINGSTON, J. In dissenting from the court in its judgment on the issue of the law arising out of the third joint plea, I can only say, that I am not prepared to admit that every alteration whatever in a deed, after its execution—for such is the extent of the opinion just given—may be proved by parol testimony. After perfecting a deed in one form, no material alteration should be set up unaccompanied by a new delivery, and a note or memorandum thereof; otherwise, a bond, which is proved by a subscribing witness to have been actually given for only one hundred dollars may be converted into one for as many thousand, if the obligee can only produce a witness who will say that he understood the obligor as assenting to it. The only case which I have been able to find of those cited (such is the difficulty of procuring books in this place), is the one in Levinz, p.

Cranch 9.

11, 35, which establishes that after the delivery of a bond a new obligor may be added in this way; not that the name of one may be struck out and another substituted in his place. Without denying the authority of the case, my answer to it is, that such addition might be of benefit, but could not injure the first set of obligors; and therefore the court might feel less difficulty in admitting such fact to be proved. It is, therefore, no interference with this decision to say that no change whatever in a sealed instrument, after its execution, which may increase the liability or be, in any way, to the prejudice of the party whose deed it is (and 39] such *is the ease here), should be palmed on him by parol testimony; and so, vice versa, that no alteration which may be, in any way, injurious to the grantee or obligee, should be set up by the other party; but that the terms in which the deed is originally executed should alone be binding, until alterations are introduced into it by the same solemnities which gave existence to the first. Such, in my opinion, is the salutary rule of the common law; and therefore I think that the judgment of the Circuit Court ought to be reversed.

MARSHALL, Ch. J.,

Was rather inclined to think that the plea was good, which stated that the bond was given for more than double the value of the vessel and cargo. If the bond was given for more than double that value he thought it was void in law.

He should not, however, have intimated his opinion on this point if a dissenting opinion had not been given on another point in the cause, and his silence might have been construed into an assent to the entire opinion of the court as it had been delivered.

TABER
v.
PERROTT & LEE.

Absent—TODD, J.

A, being sole owner of a bill of exchange, indorses it in blank, and delivers it to B to deliver to C for collection, and when collected to place the amount to the credit of A and B, in account. C collects the amount but refuses to place it to the credit of A and B, who settle their account with C and pay him the balance. A afterwards sues C for the amount received upon the bills; B is a competent witness for A.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, in an action of assumpsit to recover from the defendants, Perrott & Lee, the amount of certain bills of exchange put into their hands to collect, by the plaintiff, Taber, and his deceased partner, Gardner.

At the trial below several exceptions were taken, in which the following facts appeared:

The plaintiff produced a witness, John L. Boss, who, being duly admitted and sworn, testified, that Messrs. Taber & Gardner, mer-40] chants of Rhode Island, were *holders and owners of French government bills to a large amount, which were by them indorsed in blank, and given to their agent, the said John L. Boss, to take to France for collection. That he, Boss, had no interest in the bills, and received them as agent for the plaintiffs, and this was known to Perrott & Lee. That he carried them to France in 1802, in a vessel of the plaintiffs, with a cargo consigned to the defendants, Perrott & Lee, of Bourdeaux, in which cargo Boss had an interest. That he delivered the bills to Perrott & Lee to negotiate and receive the amount. That Boss went to Paris in October, 1802, and while there received a letter on the 26th October, from Perrott & Lee, informing him that Hotel, Thomas & Co., of Paris, were the house to whom the bills were sent, and introducing him to that house, and they wrote a letter to Hotel, Thomas & Co., directing them, when the bills were paid, to place the money to the credit of Perrott & Bineau, a banking house at Bourdeaux, which Perrott is one of the defendants. On the 12th of January, 1803, Boss called on Hotel, Thomas & Co., and was informed that the bills had been paid by the French government on the 7th of January preceding, and Boss saw the proceeds of the bills credited on the books of Hotel, Thomas & Co. to the said Perrott & Bineau, according to the directions of Perrott & Lee. That Boss, on the 14th January, advised the defendants that the bills were paid, and directed the proceeds to be applied to the credit of the account of Taber, Gardner & Boss with them. On the 29th of January, at Paris, Boss saw bills of exchange drawn by Perrott & Bineau on Hotel, Thomas & Co., and accepted by them at 30 or 40 days sight, which were acknowledged by the defendant Perrott to have been drawn for the said proceeds. That the said bills so drawn and accepted were in the hands of one Charles Bodin, but whether they have been further negotiated or not, or paid or not, Boss could not tell. That Boss returned to Bourdeaux on the 26th of February, and left Bourdeaux about the 6th of April, 1803. That until the day before he left Bourdeaux he had no intimation from the defendants that they would not credit the amount of the said bills to the account of Taber, Gardner & Boss. That the defendants refused to give such credit.

Perrott & Lee, who provided the return cargo, *brought Taber, Gardner & Boss [41 largely in their debt in account current; and Boss, on the 6th of April, 1803, signed the account, stating that when the moneys were received on the bills from Hotel, Thomas & Co. the amount should be passed to the credit of Taber, Gardner & Boss. Perrott & Lee afterwards received the whole balance of the said account from Taber, Gardner & Boss, not having credited the proceeds of the said bills; and the present suit is brought by Taber, surviving partner of Taber & Gardner, the original holders of the bills, to recover their amount.

The principal exception was to the charge of the judge, who directed the jury to find for the defendants, on the ground that the witness, Boss, had not been made a party plaintiff in the suit.

The case was argued by P. B. Key for the plaintiff in error, and by Hunter for the defendants.

February 15th. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was brought by the plaintiffs in error, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island, to recover from the defendants the amount of certain bills drawn by General Le Clerk on the government of France.

The declaration contains several counts, some special, stating agreements between the parties for the payment of the bills; others general, among which is a count for money had and received by the defendants, to the use of the plaintiffs.

It appeared at the trial that the plaintiffs and John L. Boss were concerned in certain commercial speculations, in the prosecution of which John L. Boss sailed, in 1802 and 1803, to Bourdeaux, in the Polly, with cargoes in which they were jointly interested. On the first voyage Boss carried with him the bills of exchange for the amount of which this suit was brought, indorsed in blank by the plaintiff 42*] Gardner, which he delivered to *the defendants for collection. The amount, when collected, was to be placed to the credit of the return cargo of the Polly, in which the plaintiffs and John L. Boss were jointly concerned. The account was settled without giving credit for the amount of these bills; and Taber, Gardner & Boss have been compelled to pay the balance acknowledged to be due. This action was brought to charge the defendants with the bills, alleging that their amount has been received.

At the trial the plaintiffs offered Boss as a witness, for the purpose of proving the liability of the defendants for the amount of the bills. He swore that he had no interest in the cause nor in the bills; but his testimony was objected to by the defendants, on the ground of his being interested; and the court was moved to instruct the jury that the action could not be sustained, because Boss was not a party plaintiff in the declaration. This direction was given by the court, and excepted to by the counsel for the plaintiffs. A verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendants, which are brought into this court by writ of error.

The defendants in error contend, that the bills of exchange were part of the cargo of the Polly, and consequently the joint property of the owners of that cargo. But of this there is no other evidence than that Boss was the bearer of those bills indorsed in blank, and that their proceeds, if received, were to be placed to the account of the return cargo. This might very well be, and yet Taber & Gardner remain the sole owners of the bills. Their amount, if received, might be credited to all the partners in their account with Perrott & Lee, and then be credited to Taber & Gardner in settling the accounts of the partnership. Boss then would have no interest in the bills, unless they should be collected and carried to the credit of the return cargo. That account having been settled without including this item, it is not necessarily implied, from the facts in the case, that Boss was interested; and he swears that he was not. This court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in directing the testimony of Boss to be disregarded; and also in directing the jury to find for the defendants because he was not made a party plaintiff in the suit.

*Several other opinions were given by [43 the judge, to which exceptions were taken, but it is unnecessary to review them, as they depended on the opinion that Boss was interested in the bills for which the action was brought.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial.

TERRETT AND OTHERS v. TAYLOR AND OTHERS.

Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

The religious establishment of England was adopted by the colony of Virginia, together with the common law upon that subject as far as it was applicable to the circumstances of the colony. The freehold of the church lands is in the parson.

A legislative grant is not revocable.

The act of Virginia of 1776, confirming to the church its rights to lands, was not inconsistent with the constitution or bill of rights of Virginia; nor did the acts of 1784, ch. 88, and 1785, ch. 37, infringe any of the rights intended to be secured under the constitution, either civil, political, or religious.

The acts of 1798, ch. 9, and 1801, ch. 5, so far as they go to divest the Episcopal Church of the property acquired previous to the revolution by purchase or donation, are unconstitutional and inoperative.

The act of 1798, ch. 9, merely repeals the statutes passed respecting the church since the revolution; and left in full operation all the statutes previously enacted, so far as they are not inconsistent with the present constitution.

Church wardens are not a corporation for holding lands. Church lands cannot be sold without the joint consent of the parson (if there be one) and the vestry.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in the county of Alexandria.

Taylor and others, "members of the vestry "of the Protestant Episcopal Church, common-"ly called the Episcopal Church of Alexandria, "in the parish of Fairfax, in the county of "Alexandria, and District of Columbia, on be-"half of themselves and others, members of "the said church, and of the congregation be-"longing to the said church," filed their bill in chancery against Terrett and others, who were overseers of the poor for the county of Fairfax, in the state of Virginia, and against George Deneale and John Muncaster, wardens of the said church, and against James Wren.

The bill charges that on the 27th of May, 1770, the vestry of the said parish and church, to whom the complainants, together with the defendants, George Deneale and John Muncaster, are the legal and regular successors in the said vestry, purchased of a certain Daniel Jennings a tract of land then situate in the county of Fairfax, and state of Virginia, but now in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, containing 516 acres, which the said Jennings and his wife, by deed of bargain and sale, on the 18th of September, 1770, by the direction of the then vestry, conveyed to a certain Townsend Dade, since deceased, and the said James Wren, both then of the county of 44] Fairfax, and *the church wardens of the said parish and church for the time being, and to their successors in office, for the use and benefit of the said church in the said parish. That in the year 1784 the legislature of Virginia passed an act, entitled "an act for incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church," by the third section of which power is given to the ministers and vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church to demise, alien, improve and lease any lands belonging to the church. That the act of 1786, entitled "an act to repeal the act for incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church, and for other purposes," declares that the act of 1784, shall be repealed, but saves to all religious societies the property to them respectively belonging, and authorizes them to appoint, from time to time, according to the rules of their sect, trustees, who shall be capable of mauaging and applying such property to the religious use of such societies. That under this last law the complainants conceive they have the power of requiring the church wardens of their church, who are the trustees appointed by the vestry, under the directiou of the vestry contemplated by the last-mentioned act, to sell or otherwise dispose of the said land, and to apply the proceeds of the same to the religious use of the society or congregation belonging to the said church, in such manner as the vestry for the time being shall direct. That the complainants have been, according to the rules and regulations of the said society, appointed, by the congregation, vestrymen and trustees of the said church, and have appointed the defendants, Deneale and Muncaster, church wardens of the said church. That some of the present congregation of the church were originally members of the church when the church was built and when the land was purchased, and contributed to the purchase thereof. That some of them reside in the county of Fairfax, and state of Virginia, but have pews in the church, and contribute to the support of the minister. That the lands are wasting by trespasses, &c. That the complainants, as well as the congregation, wish to sell the lands and apply the proceeds to the use of the church; but are opposed in their wishes by the defendants, Terrett and others, who are overseers of the poor for the county of Fairfax, and who claim the land under the act of Virginia of the 12th 45] of January, 1802, authoriziug the *sale of certain glebe lands in Virginia, which act was not passed until after the District of Columbia was separated from the state of Virginia; in consequence of which claim they are unable to sell the lands, &c.; wherefore they pray that the defendants, Terrett and others, the overseers of the poor, may be perpetually enjoined from claiming the land; that their title may be quieted, and that the defendants, Deneale, Muncaster and Wren, may be decreed to sell and convey the land, &c.

The bill was regularly taken for confessed against all the defendants. The court below decreed a sale, &c., according to the prayer of the bill.

The defendants, Terrett and others, the overseers of the poor, sued out their writ of error.

The cause was argued at last term by Jones for the plaintiffs in error, and by E. I. Lee and Swann for the defendants in error.

The opinion of the court is so full that it is deemed unnecessary to report the arguments of counsel.

February 17th. Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The defendants not having answered to the bill in the court below, it has been taken pro confesso, and the cause is therefore to be decided upon the title and equity apparent on the face of the bill.

If the plaintiffs have shown a sufficient title to the trust property in the present bill, we have no difficulty in holding that they are entitled to the equitable relief prayed for. It will be but the case of the cestui que trust enforcing against their trustees the rights of ownership under circumstances in which the objects of the trust would be otherwise defeated. And in our judgment it would make no difference whether the Episcopal Church were a voluntary society, or clothed with corporate powers; for in equity, as to objects which the *laws [46 cannot but recognize as useful and meritorious, the same reasou would exist for relief in the one case as in the other. Other considerations arising in this case, material to the title on which relief must be founded, render an inquiry into the character and powers of the Episcopal Church indispensable.

At a very early period the religious establishment of England seems to have been adopted in the colony of Virginia: and, of course, the common law upon that subject, so far as it was applicable to the circumstances of that colony. The local division into parishes for ecclesiastical purposes can be very early traced; and the subsequent laws euacted for religious purposes evidently presuppose the existence of the Episcopal Church, with its general rights and authorities growing out of the common law. What those rights and authorites are, need not be minutely stated. It is sufficient that, among other things, the church was capable of receiving endowments of land, and that the minister of the parish was, during his incumbeucy, seized of the freehold of its inheritable propterty, as emphatically persona ecclesiæ, and capable, as a sole corporation, of transmitting that inheritence to his successors. The church wardens, also, were a corporate body, clothed with authority and guardianship over the repairs of the church and its personal property; and the other temporal concerns of the parish were submitted to a vestry composed of persons selected for that purpose. In order more effectually to cherish and support religious institutions, and to define the authorities and rights of the Episcopal officers, the legislature, from time to time, enacted laws on this subject. By the statutes of 1661, ch. 1, 2, 3, 10, and 1667, ch. 3, provision was made for the erection and repairs of churches and chapels of ease; for the laying out of glebes and church lands, and the building of a dwelling-house for the minister; for the making of assessments and taxes for these and other parochial purposes; for the appointment of church wardens to keep the church in repair, and to provide books, ornaments, &c.; and, lastly, for the election of a vestry of twelve persons by the parishioners, whose duty it was, by these and subsequent statutes, among other things, to make and proportion levies and assessments, and to purchase 47] glebes and erect dwelling-houses for *the ministers in each respective parish. (See statute 1696, ch. 11; 1727, ch. 6; and 1748, ch. 28; 2 Tucker's Blackst. Com., Appx., note M.)

By the operation of these statutes and the common law, the lands thus purchased became vested, either directly or beneficially, in the Episcopal Church. The minister for the time being was seized of the freehold, in law or in equity, jure ecclesiæ, and, during a vacancy, the fee remained in abeyance, and the profits of the parsonage were to be taken by the parish for their own use. (Co. Lit., 340, b; 341, 342, b; 2 Mass. R., 500.)

Such were some of the rights and powers of the Episcopal Church at the time of the American revolution; and under the authority thereof the purchase of the lands stated in the bill before the court was undoubtedly made. And the property so acquired by the church remained unimpaired, notwithstanding the revolution; for the statute of 1776, ch. 2, completely confirmed and established the rights of the church to all its lands and other property.

The stat. 1784, ch. 88, proceeded yet further. It expressly made the minister and vestry, and, in case of a vacancy, the vestry of each parish respectively, and their successors forever, a corporation by the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the parish where they respectively resided, to have, hold, use and enjoy all the glebes, churches and chapels, burying-grounds, books, plate and ornaments appropriated to the use of, and every other thing the property of, the late Episcopal Church, to the sole use and benefit of the corporation. The same statute also provided for the choice of new vestries, and repealed all former laws relating to vestries and church wardens, and to the support of the clergy, &c., and dissolved all former vestries; and gave the corporation extensive powers as to the purchasing, holding, aliening, repairing and regulating the church property. This statute was repealed by the statute of 1786, ch. 12, with a proviso saving to all religious societies the property to them respectively belonging, and authorizing them to appoint, from time to time, according to the rules of their sect, trustees who should be capable of managing and 48] applying such property to the *religious use of such societies; and the statute of 1788, ch. 47, declared that the trustees appointed in the several parishes to take care of and manage the property of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and their successors, should, to all intents and purposes, be considered as the successors to the former vestries, with the same powers of holding and managing all the property formerly vested in them. All these statutes, from that of 1776, ch. 2, to that of 1788, ch. 47, and several others, were repealed by the statute of 1798, ch. 9, as inconsistent with the principles of the constitution and of religious freedom; and by the statute of 1801, ch. 5 (which was passed after the District of Columbia was finally separated from the states of Maryland and Virginia), the legislature asserted their right to all the property of the Episcopal churches in the respective parishes of the state; and, among other things, directed and authorized the overseers of the poor, and their successors in each parish wherein any glebe land was vacant or should become so, to sell the same and appropriate the proceeds to the use of the poor of the parish.

It is under this last statute that the bill charges the defendants (who are overseers of the poor of the parish of Fairfax) with claiming a title to dispose of the land in controversy.

This summary view of so much of the Virginia statutes as bears directly on the subject in controversy, presents not only a most extraordinary diversity of opinion in the legislature as to the nature and propriety of aid in the temporal concerns of religion, but the more embarrassing considerations of the constitutional character and efficacy of those laws touching the rights and property of the Episcopal Church.

It is conceded on all sides that, at the revolution, the Episcopal Church no longer retained its character as an exclusive religious establishment. And there can be no doubt that it was competent to the people and to the legislature to deprive it of its superiority over other religious sects, and to withhold from it any support by public taxation. But, although it may be true that "religion can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence," and that "all men are equally *entitled [49 to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience," as the bill of rights of Virginia declares, yet it is difficult to perceive how it follows as a consequence that the legislature may not enact laws more effectually to enable all sects to accomplish the great objects of religion by giving them corporate rights for the management of their property, and the regulation of their temporal as well as spiritual concerns. Consistent with the constitution of Virginia the legislature could not create or continue a religious establishment which should have exclusive rights and prerogatives, or compel the citizens to worship under a stipulated form or discipline, or to pay taxes to those whose creed they could not conscientiously believe. But the free exercise of religion cannot be justly deemed to be restrained by aiding with equal attention the votaries of every sect to perform their own religious duties, or by establishing funds for the support of ministers, for public charities, for the endowment of churches, or for the sepulture of the dead. And that these purposes could be better secured and cherished by corporate powers, cannot be doubted by any person who has attended to the difficulties which surround all voluntary associations. While, therefore, the legislature might exempt the citizens from a compulsive attendance and payment of taxes in support of any particular sect, it is not perceived that either public or constitutional principles required the abolition of all religious corporations.

Be, however, the general authority of the legislature as to the subject of religion as it may, it will require other arguments to establish the position that, at the revolution, all the public property acquired by the Episcopal churches, under the sanction of the laws, became the property of the state. Had the property thus acquired been originally granted by the state or the king, there might have been some color

(and it would have been but a color) for such an extraordinary pretension. But the property was, in fact and in law, generally purchased by the parishioners, or acquired by the benefac tions of pious donors. The title thereto was indefeasibly vested in the churches, or rather in their legal agents. It was not in the power of the crown to seize or assume it; nor of the parliament itself to destroy the grants, unless by 50] the exercise of a power the most *arbitrary, oppressive and unjust, and endured only because it could not be resisted. It was not forfeited; for the churches had committed no offense. The dissolution of the regal government no more destroyed the right to possess or enjoy this property than it did the right of any other corporation or individual to his or its own property. The dissolution of the form of government did not involve in it a dissolution of civil rights, or an abolition of the common law under which the inheritances of every man in the state were held. The state itself succeeded only to the rights of the crown; and, we may add, with many a flower of prerogative struck from its hands. It has been asserted as a principle of the common law, that the division of an empire creates no forfeiture of previously-vested rights of property. (Kelly v. Harrison, 2 John., c. 29; Jackson v. Lunn, 3 John., c. 109; Calvin's case, 7, co. 27.) And this principle is equally consonant with the common sense of mankind and the maxims of eternal justice. Nor are we able to perceive any sound reason why the church lands escheated or devolved upon the state by the revolution any more than the property of any other corporation created by the royal bounty or established by the legislature. The revolution might justly take away the public patronage, the exclusive cure of souls, and the compulsive taxation for the support of the church. Beyond these we are not prepared to admit the justice or the authority of the exercise of legislation.

It is not, however, necessary to rest this cause upon the general doctrines already asserted; for, admitting that by the revolution the church lands devolved on the state, the statute of 1776, ch. 2, operated as a new grant and confirmation thereof to the use of the church.

If the legislature possessed the authority to make such a grant and confirmation, it is very clear to our minds that it vested an indefeasible and irrevocable title. We have no knowledge of any authority or principle which could support the doctrine that a legislative grant is revocable in its own nature, and held only durante bene placito. Such a doctrine would uproot the very foundations of almost all the land titles in Virginia, and is utterly inconsistent with a great and fundamental principle of a 51] *republican government, the right of the citizens to the free enjoyment of their property legally acquired.

It is asserted by the legislature of Virginia, in 1798 and 1801, that this statute was inconsistent with the bill of rights and constitution of that State, and therefore void. Whatever weight such a declaration might properly have as the opinion of wise and learned men, as a declaration of what the law has been or is, it can have no decisive authority. It is, however, encountered by the opinion successively given by former legislatures from the earliest existence of the constitution itself, which were composed of men of the very first rank for talents and learning. And this opinion, too, is not only a cotemporaneous exposition of the constitution, but has the additional weight that it was promulgated or acquiesced in by a great majority, if not the whole, of the very framers of the constitution. Without adverting, however, to the opinions on the one side or the other, for the reasons which have been already stated, and others which we forbear to press, as they would lead to too prolix and elementary an examination, we are of opinion that the statute of 1776, ch. 2, is not inconsistent with the constitution or bill of rights of Virginia. We are prepared to go yet farther, and hold that the statutes of 1784, ch. 88, and 1785, ch. 37, were no infringement of any rights secured or intended to be secured under the constitution, either civil, political, or religious.

How far the statute of 1786, ch. 12, repealing the statute of 1784, ch. 88, incorporating the Episcopal churches, and the subsequent statutes in furtherance thereof of 1788, ch. 47, and ch. 53, were consistent with the principles of civil right or the constitution of Virginia, is a subject of much delicacy, and perhaps not without difficulty. It is observable, however, that they reserve to the churches all their corporate property, and authorize the appointment of trustees to manage the same. A private corporation created by the legislature may lose its franchises by a misuser or a non-user of them; and they may be resumed by the government under a judicial judgment upon a quo warranto to ascertain and enforce the forfeiture. This is the common law of the land, and is a tacit condition annexed to the creation of every such corporation. Upon a change of government, too, it may be admitted *that such [52 exclusive privileges attached to a private corporation as are inconsistent with the new government may be abolished. In respect, also, to public corporations which exist only for public purposes, such as counties, towns, cities, &c., the legislature may, under proper limitations, have a right to change, modify, enlarge or restrain them, securing, however, the property for the uses of those for whom and at whose expense it was orignially purchased. But that the legislature can repeal statutes creating private corporations, or confirming to them property already acquired under the faith of previous laws, and by such repeal can vest the property of such corporations exclusively in the state, or dispose of the same to such purposes as they may please, without the consent or default of the corporators, we are not prepared to admit; and we think ourselves standing upon the principles of natural justice, upon the fundamental laws of every free government, upon the spirit and the letter of the constitution of the United States, and upon the decisions of most respectable judicial tribunals, in resisting such a doctrine. The statutes of 1798, ch. 9, and of 1801, ch. 5, are not, therefore, in our judgment, operative so far as to devest the Episcopal Church of the property acquired previous to the revolution, by purchase or by donation. In respect to the latter statute there is this farther objection, that it passed after the District of Columbia was taken under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, and as to the corporations and property within that district, the right of Virginia to legislate no longer existed. And as to the statute of 1798, ch. 9, admitting it to have the fullest operation, it merely repeals the statutes passed respecting the church since the revolution; and, of course, it left in full force all the statutes previously enacted so far as they were not inconsistent with the present constitution. It left, therefore, the important provisions of the statutes of 1661, 1696, 1727 and 1748, so far as respected the title to the church lands, in perfect vigor, with so much of the common law as attached upon these rights.

Let us now advert to the title set up by the plaintiffs in the present bill. Upon inspecting the deed which is made a part of the bill, and bears date in 1770, the land appears to have been conveyed to the grantees as church wardens of the parish of Fairfax, and to 53] their successors *in that office, forever. It is also averred in the bill that the plaintiffs, together with two of the defendants (who are church wardens), are the vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, commonly called the Episcopal Church of Alexandria, in the parish of Fairfax, and that the purchase was made by the vestry of said parish and church, to whom the present vestry are the legal and regular successors in the said vestry; and that the purchase was made for the use and benefit of the said church in the said parish. No statute of Virginia has been cited which creates church wardens a corporation for the purpose of holding lands; and at common law their capacity was limited to personal estate. (1 B. C., 394; Bro. Corp., 77, 84; 1 Rolle. Abr., 393, 4, 10; Com. Dig. Tit. Esglise, F. 3; 12 H. 7, 27, b; 1, 3 H. 7, 9, b; 37 H. 6, 30; 1 Burn's Eccles. Law, 290; Gibbs. 215.)

It would seem, therefore, that the present deed did not operate by way of grant to convey a fee to the church wardens and their successors; for their successors, as such, could not take; nor to the church wardens in their natural capacity; for "heirs" is not in the deed. But the covenant of general warranty in the deed binding the grantors and their heirs forever, and warranting the land to the church wardens and their successors forever, may well operate by way of estoppel to confirm to the church and its privies the perpetual and beneficial estate in the land.

One difficulty presented on the face of the bill was, that the Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria was not directly averred to be the same corporate or unincorporate body as the church and parish of Fairfax, or the legal successors thereto, so as to entitle them to the lands in controversy. But upon an accurate examination of the bill, it appears that the purchase was made by the vestry "of the said parish and church," "for the use and benefit of the said church in the said parish." It must, therefore, be taken as true that there was no other Episcopal Church in the parish; and that the property belonging to the church of Alexandria, which in this respect represented the whole parish. And there can be no doubt that the Episcopal members of the parish of Fairfax have still, notwithstanding a separation from the state of Virginia, the same rights and privileges as they orig- 54] inally *possessed in relation to that church while it was the parish church of Fairfax.

The next consideration is whether the plaintiffs, who are vestrymen, have, as such, a right to require the lands of the church to be sold in the manner prayed for in the bill. Upon the supposition that no statutes passed since the revolution are in force, they may be deemed to act under the previous statutes and the common law. By those statutes the vestry were to be appointed by the parishoners "for the making and proportioning levies and assessments, for building and repairing the churches and chapels, provision for the poor, maintenance of the minister, and such other necessary purposes, and for the more orderly managing all parochial affairs," out of which vestry the minister and vestry were yearly to choose two church wardens.

As incident to their office as general guardians of the church, we think they must be deemed entitled to assert the rights and interests of the church. But the minister, also having the freehold, either in law or in equity, during his incumbency, in the lands of the church, is entitled to assert his own rights as persona ecclesiæ. No alienation, therefore, of the church lands can be made either by himself or by the parishioners or their authorized agents, without the mutual consent of both. And therefore we should be of opinion that, upon principle, no sale ought to be absolutely decreed unless with the consent of the parson, if the church be full.

If the statue of 1784, ch. 88, be in force for any purpose whatsoever, it seems to us that it would lead to a like conclusion. If the repealing statute of 1786, ch. 12, or the statute of 1788, ch. 47, by which the church property was authorized to be vested in trustees chosen by the church, and their successors, be in force for any purpose whatsoever, then the allegation of the bill, that the plaintiffs "have, according to the rules and regulations of their said society, been appointed by the congregation, vestrymen and trustees of the said church," would directly apply, and authorize the plaintiffs to institute the present bill. Still, however, it appears to us that in case of a plenarty of the church, no alienation or sale of the church lands ought to take place without the *assent of the min- [55 ister, unless such assent be expressly dispensed with by some statute.

On the whole, the majority of the court are of opinion that the land in controversy belongs to the Episcopal Church of Alexandria, and has not been devested by the revolution, or any act of the legislature passed since that period; that the plaintiffs are of ability to maintain the present bill; that the overseers of the poor of the parish of Fairfax have no just, legal, or equitable title to the said land, and ought to be perpetually enjoined from claiming the same; and that a sale of the said land ought, for the reasons stated in the bill, to be decreed upon the assent of the minister of said church (if any there be) being given thereto; and that the present church wardens and the said James Wren ought to be decreed to convey the same to the purchaser; and the proceeds to be applied in the manner prayed for in the bill.

The decree of the Circuit Court is to be reformed so as to conform to this opinion.

THE BRIG SHORT STAPLE AND CARGO, HALLAWAY AND OTHERS, CLAIMANTS v. THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

Quære. Whether, under the 1st and 2d embargo laws of 1807 and 1808, a registered vessel which had a clearance from one port to another of the United States was liable to condemnation for going to a foreign port.

If a vessel be captured by a superior force and a prize-master and a small force be put on board, it is not the duty of the master and crew of the captured vessel to attempt to rescue her—for they may thereby expose the vessel to condemnation although otherwise innocent.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts, which affirmed that of the District Court condemning the brig Short Staple and cargo.

The facts of the case are thus stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court.

This vessel was libeled in the District Court of Massachusetts, in March, 1809, for having [56] violated the embargo *laws of the United States, by sailing to a foreign port. The fact is admitted by the claimants, who allege, in justification of it, that the vessel was captured, while on her voyage to Boston, by a British armed vessel, and carried into St. Nichola Mole, where the government of the place seized the cargo.

It appeared in evidence that the Short Staple sailed from Boston about the 10th of October, 1808, with instructions to procure a cargo of flour and return therewith to Boston, unless the embargo should be removed before the commencement of her return voyage, in which case she was directed to proceed to the island of Guadaloupe. At Baltimore she took on board a cargo of flour, and sailed thence for Boston, about the 28th of October. She was detained several days in Hampton Roads, by contrary winds. During this detention the British armed vessel Ino put into Hampton Roads for the purpose of repairing some damage sustained in a storm on the coast. The Ino had been in the port of Boston while the Short Staple lay there, and had cleared out for the Cape of Good Hope, though her real destination was Jamaica. The reason her captain has since assigned for this imposition was, that by clearing out for the Cape of Good Hope he was allowed to take on board a larger supply of provisions than would have been allowed had he cleared out for any port in the West Indies.

As soon as the wind was favorable the Short Staple, together with another vessel, likewise bound from Baltimore to Boston, called the William King, put to sea, and was followed by the Ino, who soon overtook them, and took possession of them both as prize, alleging that they were bound to a French Island. The captor put a prize-master and two hands on board the Short Staple, and sailed in company with them until they fell in with a British ship of war. The captain of the Ino directed the prize-master to meet the ship of war and submit to her orders; while the Ino, dreading that her hands might be impressed, made sail to the windward and escaped. After their papers had been examined, the Short Staple and the William King were permitted to proceed on their voyage, and were carried into St. Nichola Mole, the place appointed by the captain of the Ino for *meeting them when he was sepa- [57 rated from them by the ship of war. They arrived at the Mole about two days after parting from the Ino, who followed them, and entered the port soon after them. The government of the place insisted on detaining one of the vessels, as provisions were scarce at the Mole, and the Short Staple was given up to them. Her cargo was landed under the direction of the government, and purchased at about $32 per barrel. Having received about $1,200 in part pay for the cargo, the captain of the Short Staple sailed to Turk's Island, and loaded her with a cargo of salt, with which he returned to a port in Massachusetts, where his vessel was seized as having violated the embargo laws. The William King appears to have been carried to Jamaica, and there liberated without having been libeled. The Short Staple was condemned in both the District and Circuit Courts, and the case is brought before this court by writ of error.

P. B. Key and R. G. Amory, for the appellants, contended,

1. That no law prohibited the Short Staple from going to the West Indies; and,

2. That she was carried there by the superior force of a British vessel of war.

1. There was no law then in force by which the brig could be condemned for going to a foreign port.

The only embargo laws then in force which could affect this vessel were the original embargo act of 22d Dec., 1807 (vol, 9, p. 7), and the supplementary act of 9th of January, 1808 (vol. 9, p. 10).

The first act laid "an embargo on all ships and vessels bound to any foreign port or place," and directed that no clearance should be granted for any foreign voyage; and that no registered or sea-letter vessel, having on board a cargo, should be allowed to depart from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, unless the master, &c., should give bond in double the value of vessel and cargo, that the cargo should be relanded in the United States. The act did not *give any for- [58 feiture. The first section of the 2d embargo law (the supplementary act of January 9th, 1808) relates only to vessels "licensed for the coasting trade." The 2d section relates only to vessels licensed for the fisheries or whaling voyages.

The 3d section enacts, that "if any vessel" "shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, "or of the act to which this is a supplement," "proceed to a foreign port or place," "such "vessel shall be wholly forfeited."

If any forfeiture is given it must be by this section—and this section applies only to such vessels as shall violate the provisions of this or the former act. The "provisions of this act" do not apply to a registered vessel, but only to licensed coasters and fishing vessels. The first embargo law did not forbid a vessel to sail to a foreign port if she should have a clearance, but relied upon the bond aud security that the cargo should be relanded. It was the violation of a contract, not an offense against law. It was a breach of the condition of the bond, but no crime. Every man has a right to refuse to comply with the condition of his bond if he will pay the penalty. The United States, in the present instance, did resort to the bond. It is true they did not recover, because the jury found a verdict against them upon the issue of fact. But they have had their remedy.

A registered vessel could only violate the provisions of the first or second embargo law by going to a foreign port without a clearance; or by going to a port of the United States without giviug bond. A vessel which had a clearance and had given the bond was not forbidden to go to a foreign port. The Short Staple had a clearance and had given the bond. The provisions of the supplementary act could only be violated by licensed coasters and fishiug vessels, and are not applicable to the present case. The vessel did not go to a foreign port contrary to the provisions of the act, but contrary to the condition of the bond.

The only questions are, whether the 3d section of the 2d embargo law superadds the for- [*59 feiture of the vessel *to the penalty of the boud for violation of the previous law, or whether it provides a forfeiture for the violation of a new prohibition.

The expression "contrary to the provisions of this act or of the act to which this is a supplement," mean contrary to the spirit and intention of those acts. The spirit of the former act was unquestionably a prohibitiou of all foreign trade. To go with a cargo to a foreigu port was clearly agaiust the spirit of the embargo. A vessel violates the provisions of the act when she violates the bond which the act provides. The aet declares that an embargo shall be laid ou all vessels bound to a foreigu port. The word embargo is equivaleut to a prohibition. And the words "bound to a foreign port" mean a vessel intending to go to a foreign port; not merely a vessel ostensibly bound to such port.

But if the vessel, by violating the bond does not violate the law which requires the bond, yet the third section of the second embargo act creates a new offense, viz., that of going to a foreign port. It is coupled, in the same sentence, with the prohibitiou to put foreign goods on board of another vessel, which is unquestionably an entirely new offense, aud yet, according to the words of the act, must be done contrary to the provisions of this or the former act. This shows that the legislature did not mean to confine the forfeiture to violations of the first aet, or of the two first sections of the second act.

Amory, iu reply,

Observed that the word embargo meant a restraint, or confinement of vessels already in port, and could not affect the conduct of a vessel after she had left the port. If she has a liceuse to leave the port, the embargo, as such, cannot make her subsequent conduct unlawful.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It has been contended by the plaintiffs in error,

*1. That the Short Staple, being a re- [*60 gistered vessel, and having given bond as required by law for relanding her cargo in the United States, is not liable to forfeiture if she has violated the condition of that bond.

2. That her sailing to a foreign port, being under the coercion of a force she was unable to resist, is justifiable under the laws of the Unitcd States.

The first error has been pressed with great earnestness by the counscl for the plaintiffs; but the court is not convinced that his exposition of the embargo acts is a sound one. On this point, however, it will be unnecessary to give an opinion; because we think the necessity under which the claimants justify their going into St. Nichola Mole is sustained by the proofs in the cause.

It is not denied that a real capture and carrying into port by a force not to be resisted, will justify an act which, if voluntary, would be a breach of the laws imposing an embargo. Nor is it denied that if such capture be pretended, if it be made with the consent and connivance of the parties interested, such fraudulent capturc can be no mitigation of the offense. Thc whole question, then, to be decided by the court, is a question of fact. Was this capture real? was the force such as the Short Staplc could not resist? or was it made in consequence of somc secrct arrangements between the captor and captured?

It is contended, on the part of the United States, that the circumstances of this case are such as to outweigh all the positivc testimony in the cause, and to prove, in opposition to it, that the Short Staple was carried into St. Nichola Mole, not by force, but with her consent, and by previous concert between her owners and the captain of the Ino.

Thosc circumstances are,

1. The arrival and continuance of the Ino in the port of Boston while the Short Staple lay iu that port previous to her departure for Baltimore.

*2. Her clearing out for the Cape of [*61 Good Hope while her real destination was Jamaica.

3. The continuance of the Short Staple in Hampton Roads until the arrival of the Ino.

4. Her capture on a coasting voyage which would not justify suspicion.

5. Her being carried to a port where there was a good market, and there given up; and,

6. That the William King, when carried to Jamaica, was also given up without being libeled.

That these circumstances are some of them such as to justify strong suspicion, and such as to require clear explanatory cvidence to do away their influence, is unquestionable. But the court cannot admit that any or all of them together amount to such conclusive evidence as to render it impossible to sustain the defense.

That the Ino should arrive iu the port of Boston while the Short Staple lay in that port is nothing remarkable. It furnished an opportunity of concerting any future plan of operations with the owners of the Short Staple, or of any other vessel, but is certainly no proof of such concert. There is no evidence that the respective owners were acquainted or had auy communication with each other; and the whole testimony is positive that no such communicatiou took place.

That the Ino should have cleared out for the Cape of Good Hope, when her real destination was Jamaica, is sufficiently accounted for. It enabled her to take on board a considerable quantity of provisions—an article in demand in Jamaica—which she would not have been permitted to do had her real destinatiou been known. This may be a fraud in the Ino, but caunot affect the Short Staple.

That the Ino should have arrived in Hampton Roads while the Short Staple remained there, and should have followed her to sea, and have captured her, are unquestionably circumstances 62] which justify strong suspicion, *and which would be sufficient for the condemnation of the vessel, if not satisfactorily explained; but it is not conceded by the court that they admit of no explauation. These circumstances are not absolutely incompatible with innoceuce.

It is proved by testimony to which there is no exception, and which no attempt has been made to discredit, that the Short Staple was absolutely windbound the whole time she remained in Hampton Roads; and that she attempted to put to sea before the arrival of the Ino, but could not. Had this capture ever been preconcerted in Boston, the Ino and Short Staple would more probably have contrived to meet on the return voyage of the latter than to have adopted the course of the one waiting in port for the arrival of the other, and then sailing out almost together.

The arrival of the Ino in Hampton Roads is completely accounted for. She had suffered by the perils of the sea, and put in for necessary repairs. This fact is proved positivcly, and no opposing testimony is produced.

That the Ino should have pursued the Short Staple on a coasting voyage, and have captured her, was a wrong not to be justified. It is said to have been so atrocious a tort that its reality is incredible. The fact, however, is completely proved. The master of the Short Staple swears that he was on his voyage to Boston; that his intention was to proceed to that port; that he had had no previous communication with the Ino, and had no expectation of being captured by her, or of being turned out of his course. The other persons on board the Short Staple testify to the same facts, as far as their knowledge extends. The owner of the Ino, who was on board, and her officers, swear that they had no previous communication with the Short Staple or her owner; that there was no concert of any sort between them; that they were informed by some person on shore, while the Ino lay in Hampton Roads for repairs, that the Short Staple and the William King were on a voyage to a French Island; that, expecting to find something which would justify condemnation as prize, they determiued to examine those 63] vessels, aud *although ou examination they found nothing to justify capture, they still hoped that something would appear in future; and that, at the worst, they should incur no risk of damages, because they should carry the vessels aud cargoes to a good market. In this confidence, they determined to take them to Jamiaca.

This disposition in the captors, however indefensible, is very probable. It grew out of the state of the two countries; and uo individual who was captured in consequence of it ought, if his own conduct contributed in no degree to that capture, to be made the victim of it.

That she was carried into St. Nichola Mole, and there given up to the government of the place, is, in itself, a circumstance throwing some suspicion on the transaction, and requiring explanation. The testimony explains it. The Ino was separated from her two prizes by a fact which is fully proved, and which sufficiently accounts for that separation. That her captain should, when about to leave them, appoint some near port as the place of meeting again, was almost of course; and that he should have relinquished one of the vessels to the government of the place ceases to be matter of much surprise when it is recollected that he could not have much expectation of making her a prize; that, in fact, the capture was made with scarcely any hope of condemnation, but with a certainty that it would produce some additional supply of provisions, and could injure no person. The criminalty of this mode of thinking, whatever it might be, was not imputable to the owners of the Short Staple.

It has been contended that, during the separation of the Ino from the captured vessels, a rescue ought to have been attempted. There having been, during that period, but three persons belonging to the Ino on board the Short Staple, they might have been overpowered by the American crew; but the attempt to take the vessel from them was no part of the duty of the Americans, and might, in the event of recapture, have exposed the vessel and cargo to the danger of condemnation, of which, without such rescue, they incurred no hazard.

The abandonment of the William King without libeling *her, is the natural couse- [64 quence of having been able to find no circumstances of suspicion which might tempt the captors to proceed against her. It undoubtedly proves, what the captaiu of the Ino avows, that he acted under a full conviction of being exposed to no risk by the capture, though he should reap no advantage from it.

The interest which coasting vessels had in fictitious or concerted captures, undoubtedly subjects all captures to a rigid scrutiny, and exposes them to much suspicion. The case of the claimant ought to be completely made out. No exculpatory testimony, the existence of which is to be supposed from the nature of the transaction, ought to be omitted. The absence of such testimony, if not fully accounted for, would make an impression extremely unfavorable to the claim. But where the testimony is full, complete and concurrent; where every circumstance is explained and accounted for in a reasonable manner; where the testimouy to the innocence of the owners aud crew of the vessel is positive, proceeding from every person who can be supposed to have any knowledge of the facts, and contradicted by none; the court cannot pronounce against it. This would be to allow too suspicious circumstances a controlling influence to which they are not entitled.

The sentence of the Circuit Court, condemning the Short Staple, is reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to that Court with directions to decree a restoration of the vessel to the claimants, and to dismiss the libel.

STORY, J., stated that he dissented from the opinion of the court and adhered to the opinion which he gave in the court below, in which he had the concurrence of one of his brethren.

PARKER v. RULE'S LESSEE.

Under the act of Congress to lay and collect a direct tax (July 14, 1798,) before the collector could sell the land of an unknown proprietor for non-payment of the tax, it was necessary that he should advertise the copy of the lists of lands, &c., and the statement of the amount due for the tax, and the notification to pay, for 60 days in four gazettes of the state, if there were so many.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of West Tennessee, in an action of ejectment.

65*] *The facts of the case were thus stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court:

This was an ejectment brought by the defendant in error in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of West Tennessee. The plaintiff below claimed under a patent regularly issued by the proper authority. The defendant made title under a deed from the collector of the district, reciting a sale of the said land as being forfeited by the non-payment of taxes, and conveying the same to the purchaser. On the validity of this conveyance the whole case depends. At the trial the defendant produced his deed, and also a general list of lands owned, possessed and occupied on the first day of October, 1798, in assessment district No. 12, in the State of Tennessee, corresponding with the collection district No. 8, returned to the office of the late supervisor of the revenue for the District of Tennessee by Edward Douglass, surveyor of the revenue for said assessment district, among which is the following: "Grant, John, reput-"ed owner in Summer county on the middle "fork of Bledsoe's Creek, 640 acres of land "subject to and included in the valuation, "valued at $2,560, no possessor or occupant." He also produced the tax list furnished by said surveyor to Thomas Martin, collector of the collection district No. 8, in which list said land is described in the same manner as is the said general list, excepting that the said John Grant is described as possessor or occupant of said 640 acres of land, and said land is included in the list of lands belonging to residents. He also produced the advertisements of the sale of the said lands mentioned in the said deed to have been made in the Tennessee Gazette, in which said John Grant is mentioned only as reputed owner of said land, and proved, by a witness present at the sale, that the said Henry Bradford, for himself and Daniel Smith, became the purchaser of the said land; and that the said Daniel and Henry, before the execution of the last said mentioned deed, assigned their interest in the said land to the defendant, Richard Parker. But it did not appear that the said collector had, at any time, caused a copy of the said list, with a statement of the amount of the tax, and a notification to pay the same, to be published for sixty days in four gazettes of the state, if there were so many, *pursuant to the last clause of the 11th [66 section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act "to lay and collect a direct tax within the "United States," (vol. 4, p. 212). And thereupon the judge instructed the jury that the said sale made by said collector was unauthorized and void, because the said collector had not previously made said last-mentioned publication, and because it appeared that the collector proceeded to collect the taxes due on the said land in the manner prescribed by law for collecting taxes due upon lands where the owner resides thereon, and not in the manner prescribed when the owners are non-residents, and because there is a variance between the surveyor's books and the collector's list. The defendant below excepted to this opinion of the judge, and a verdict and judgment being rendered against him, he has brought the same, by writ of error, into this court.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error.

There is only one question in this cause, viz, whether the collector, in making sale of the land under the 13th section of the act (vol. 4. p. 213), was bound to publish for 60 days in 4 gazettes of the state, the copies of the lists of the lands taxable, &c., with a statement of the amount of the taxes due thereon, and a notification to pay the same in 30 days, as required by the 11th section of the same act.

We contend that this clause of the section applies only to unoccupied lands of unknown proprietors, and not merely to lands of non-residents. Grant, although a non-resident, was a known proprietor.

Such publication is only necessary in case of distress and sale of goods and chattels, which is the only remedy given by the 11th section. If the collector intended to levy the distress, then it was incumbent on him to make the publication. But when the legislature, by the 13th section, give the remedy by sale of the land itself, they make a different provision and require different notice of the sale, and do not refer to the provisions of the 11th section; all of which provisions relate only to the case of distress.

C. Lee*, contra. [67

The deed from the collector must always recite all the facts necessary to make the title good. In this respect the deed is very defective.

The land appears to have belonged to a non-resident. If his residence was known, the law required that he should have personal notice; if not known, he must have presumptive notice by publication as the 11th section requires. It cannot be supposed that the law would require less notice to authorize sale of the land than a distress and sale of chattels. It cannot be supposed that the legislature meant to comprise all the prerequisites of the sale of the land in the 13th section; for that section applies as well to residents as to non-residents, and yet it requires no notice of the amount of the taxes, nor a demand of payment before sale. It is rather to be presumed that the legislature meant that all the preceding requisites should be complied with.

Jones, in reply.

It is not necessary that the deed should recite any of the facts preceding the sale. They may all be proved by parol.

February 18th. Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It is admitted that if the preliminary requisites of the law have not been complied with, the collector could have no authority to sell, and the conveyance can pass no title. On the part of the plaintiff in error it is insisted that these requisites have been performed, and that the instruction given by the Judge is erroneous. The instruction is that the sale was unauthorized and void.

It was proved in the cause that the proprietors of the land in controversy were non-residents of the state of Tennessee when the tax was assessed, and continued to be so to the time of bringing the action, and that they had no known agents in that state.

68*] *The mode of proceeding with respect to non-residents is prescribed in the 11th and 13th sections of the act imposing the direct tax.

The object of the provisions of the 11th section is "lands, dwelling-houses and slaves "which shall not be owned by or in the occu- "pation or under the care or superintendence "of some person within the collection district "where the same shall be situated or found at "the time of the assessment aforesaid."

It is alleged that the plaintiff below did not entitle himself to the provisions of this section by bringing himself within its description. He was a non-resident and had no known agent, but has not shown that there was no occupant of the land.

The testimony offered by both plaintiff and defendant is spread upon the record; and although the plaintiff has not shown that there was no occupant, yet that fact came out in the testimony of the defendant before the opinion of the court was given. One of the tax lists produced by him states the land to be without an occupant; and the other, which states John Grant to be the occupant, is so far disproved, because the case admits John Grant to have been, at the time, an inhabitant of Kentucky, without any agent in the state of Tennessee.

The requisites of the 13th section of the act, which prescribes the course to be pursued where lands are to be sold because the taxes are in arrear and unpaid for twelve months, have been observed. The requisites of the 11th section, which prescribes the duty of the collector after the assessment of the tax before he can proceed to distrain for it, have not been observed. The cause depends on this single point: Was it the duty of the collector, previous to selling the lands of a non-resident in the manner prescribed by the 13th section of the act, to make the publication prescribed in the 11th section?

This will require a consideration of the spirit and intent of the law.

*The 9th section makes it the duty of [69 the collector to advertise that the tax has become due and payable, and the times and places at which he will attend for its collection. It is then his duty to apply once at the respective dwellings of those who have failed to attend such places, and there demand the taxes respectively due from them. If the taxes shall not be then paid, or within twenty days thereafter, it is lawful for the collector to proceed to collect the same by distress and sale.

The 11th section prescribes the duty of the collector with respect to lands, &c., not owned, &c., by some person within the collection district wherein the same shall be situated.

Upon receiving lists of such lands, &c., he is to transmit certified copies thereof to the surveyors of the revenue of the assessment districts, respectively, within which such persons respectively reside, whose duty it is to give personal notice of the claim to those who are liable for it. If the tax shall not be paid within the specified time after this notice, it then becomes the duty of the collector to collect the same by distress.

If the residence of the owner of such land be unknown, this section requires certain publications to be made as a substitute for personal notice; after which it is the duty of the collector to proceed to collect the tax by distress in like manner as where a personal demand has been made.

The 13th section prescribes the duty of the collector, and the forms to be observed in the sale of land, the taxes on which remain unpaid for one year. This section contains no reference to those which preceded it, but marks out the course of the collector in the specific case. It is therefore contended—and the argument has great weight—that if the requisites of this section be complied with, the sale is valid. This opinion is in conformity with the letter of the section; and it is conceded that the intent must be very clear which will justify a connection of that section with those which precede it, so as to ingraft upon it those acts which must be performed by the collector before he can distrain for taxes. But in this case, when we take the whole statute *together, such intent [70 is believed to be sufficiently apparent.

There is, throughout the act, an obvious anxiety in the legislature to avoid coercive means of collection, unless such means should be necessary; and to give every owner of lands the most full information of the sum for which he was liable, and to afford him the most easy opportunity to pay it. Thus the accruing of the tax is to be advertised, and the times and places at which the collector will attend to receive it. A personal demand at the dwelling-houses of those who have neglected to attend to this notice must then be made, a reasonable time before the collector can collect the tax by distress. Where lands are owned by non-residents whose places of residcnee are known, this personal notice is still required; and where their residence is unknown, certain publications are substitutcd for and deemed equivalent to personal noticc and demand. In each case, it is made the duty of the collector to procced to collect the tax by distress and sale.

From this view of the law it is inferred, not only that the legislature was anxious to avoid coercive means of collection, but has also manifcsted a solicitude to collect thc tax by distress and sale of personal property rather than by a sale of the land itself. That all the mcans of collection prescribed in the act must have bcen tricd, and must have failed, before a sale of the land can be made. The duty of the collector to make a personal demand from the resident owner of lands, and to make those publications which the law substitutes for a personal demand where the residence of the owner is unknown, does not depend on the fact that personal property is or is not on the land from which the tax may be levied by distress. It is his duty to proceed in the manner prescribed in the 9th and 11th sections, in every case. After having so proceeded, it is his positive duty to levy the tax by distress, if property liable to distress can be found. If, notwithstanding the proceedings directed in the 9th and 11th sections, the tax shall remain one year unpaid, it is to be raised by a sale of the land. It appears to the court that the 13th scction presupposes everything enjoined in the 9th and 11th sections to have been per-71*] formed, and that the validity of the *sale of land owned by a non-resident, made by the collector for the non-payment of taxes, must depend not only on his having made the publications required in the 13th section, but on his having made those also which are required in the 11th section. Thosc publications not having been made in this case, it is the opinion of the majority of this court that the sale is void, and that the judge of the District Court committed no error in giving this instruction to thc jury.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

BRIG STRUGGLE, THOMAS LEIGH, CLAIMANT.

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

A party who offers an exeuse for violating a penal statute must make out the vis major under which he shelters himself, so as to leave no reasonable doubt of his innocenee.

Circumstanees will sometimes outweigh positive testimony.

APPEAL from thc sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts, which condemncd the brig Struggle, for violation of the non-intercourse act of 28th of Junc, 1809, vol. 10, p. 13, by going, with a cargo, to a prohibited port.

February 18th. Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This was an information, in the District Court of Massachusetts, against the brigantine Struggle for the violation of the act of Congress of the 28th of June, 1809, in departing from Portsmouth, in the Unitcd States, with a cargo of domestic growth and manufacture, bound to a foreign port with which commercial intercourse was not then pcrmitted.

The libel further states that the vessel arrived at said prohibited port, with her cargo, and that no bond had at any time been given to the United States, in the manner required by law, that she should not proceed to any *inter-72 dicted port, nor be engagcd directly or indirectly, during such voyagc, in any trade with such port or place.

The claim denies the departure of the brigantine from Portsmouth on a foreign voyage to a port with which commereial intercourse was interdicted, or to any other foreign port or place; but insists that she was duly cleared, at the custom-house at Portsmouth, for Charleston, and that she departcd and was sailing towards her place of destination, when, by the violence of the winds and waves, shc was driven out of her course, and became so much damaged that she could not proceed on to Charleston, but that it was necessary for the preservation of the vessel and cargo, and of thc lives of those on board, to sail for the West Indies; that she accordingly went to Martinico, and thence proceeded to St. Bartholomews.

Thc cause being at issue on this allegation of the claimant, and a number of witnesses having been examined, the District Court condemned the vessel as forfeited to the United States. This decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court, from whose sentence this appeal is taken.

The master of thc Struggle, who was produced as a witness, swears that after being regularly clearcd, shc sailed from Portsmouth to Charleston, the cargo being consigned to Joseph Waldron & Co., on whom he had orders to call for advice; but it being rumorcd, at thc time of his sailing, that the non-intercourse would shortly be removed, he was informed by the owner that orders were given to Waldron & Co., in that case, to send the vessel to the West Indies, provided thc prospects at Charleston should not bc equal to his expectation. That 5 or 6 days after sailing they had a very heavy gale from the south-west, which made such a tremendous sea that it became impossible to keep the vessel to. That they had not less than 65,000 feet of seasoned sawed lumber on the deck, besides loose lumber, all of which, in his opinion, must inevitably have been lost if the vessel had been kept head to. At one time an attempt was made to heave her to, and after laying a few hours thc gale increased and knocked the vessel down, her yards being nearly in the water, and the top of the deck load so shifted that they were obliged to put her before the wind to right *the deck load and clear the companion-
73 way. During several gales they were obliged to scud, and at one time for 23 hours together. They shipped several seas which washed overboard a part of the loose lumber. About the 16th of February, the wind being less violent, the deck load was found so much soaked that it was likc green lumber, which made the vessel so crank that they could not keep on the wind with a six-knot breeze. One of the water casks was entirely leaked out; another partly out; and the sails and rigging much injured. On a consultation with the people on board, they were all of opinion that it would be extremely dangerous to attempt coming on the coast in the state in which the vessel then was, she being so top-heavy as to be almost water-logged. It being also the worst season in the year, they unanimously thought that the only way they could save the deck load, and probably their lives, would be to make the first port they could. They accordingly bore away for the West Indies, and arrived at Martinico, which was the first port they made. The cargo was there sold at a low price, it not being thought safe to venture to sea again in the then condition of the vessel. After making some repairs they sailed from Martinico for St. Bartholomews, where they took freight for Boston, at which place they arrived in June, 1810.

This is the history of the voyage given by the master, and is substantially confirmed by the mate and two of the seamen, who also swear that they shipped for wages usual on a voyage to Charleston, which were lower than those which were given for a voyage to the West Indies. It also appears by the documentary evidence in the case, that the Struggle had a regular clearance on board for Charleston; that she was chartered, by the claimant, of certain merchants of Portsmouth, "to go to some southern port or to the West Indies;" that the cargo taken on board at Portsmouth was lumber, butter and crackers; and that she returned from St. Bartholomews to the United States with a cargo on freight consisting of 180 casks and 9 barrels of molasses.

On these proofs the court is now to decide whether the claimant has made out his allegation that the vessel was driven out of her course by the violence of the winds and waves, and that her condition was such as to make [*74 *it necessary, for her preservation and the safety of the crew, to sail for a port in the West Indies.

Were the court bound to decide according to positive testimony, without regard to other circumstances, or to the situation and character of the witnesses, it might be difficult to say that the plea of necessity had not been satisfactorily made out. The master, mate and two of the mariners establish everything which the claimant had undertaken to prove, so far as their positive declarations are entitled to credit. But when it is recollected how many cases of fictitious distress have been offered to the courts of the United States, as excuses for violations of the restrictive system, as it has been called, and that these cases, whether real or imaginary, have generally been supported by the same species of testimony, it cannot be wondered at if this court shall receive, with considerable jealousy and caution, evidence which is so perpetually recurring, and which if compared will be found to present the same uniform statement of facts, with very few shades of difference, all calculated to impress a belief that some overwhelming calamity, of which in ordinary voyages so little is heard, has produced a departure from the original legitimate destination of the vessel. When it is considered, too, that the testimony on these occasions comes from men who, whatever their characters may be in other respects, must be viewed as accomplices in the offense, if any has been intentionally committed, and are, to say the least, very much under the influence of those who have projected the voyage and are to be gainers by a violation of the law, it cannot be supposed that such testimony can be examined without very considerable reserve and distrust.

Although mere suspicion, not resting upon strong circumstances unexplained, should not be permitted to outweigh positive testimony in giving effect to a penal statute; yet it cannot be regarded as an oppressive rule to require of a party who has violated it to make out the vis major under which he shelters himself, so as to leave no reasonable doubt of his innocence; and if in the course of such vindication he shall pass in silence, or leave unexplained circumstances which militate strongly against the integrity of the transaction, he cannot complain if the court shall lay hold of those circumstances as reasons *for adjudging him in de- [*75 licto. What, then, are the circumstances in this case which it is difficult to reconcile with the concurrent testimony of the witnesses who have been examined?

1. If the Struggle really encountered so much bad weather and was obliged, to avoid shipwreck and to preserve the lives of the crew, to abandon a coasting for a foreign voyage, it might be expected that, on her arrival at Martinico, the ordinary process of survey would have been called for. Her situation would then have been ascertained by professional and skillful men. The not taking a precaution so common in cases of distress and so necessary for the master's exculpation if he acted without an understanding with his owner, while it leaves us in great doubt as to the magnitude of the injuries sustained, and the imminence of the danger to which the vessel and crew were thereby exposed, is but little calculated to excite a belief of the great extent of either. It is taken for granted that no such survey was had, from the silence of all the witnesses upon the subject, and from the manifest interest which the claimant had in producing it, if it in any degree supported the testimony or the defense which he had set up.

2. A still more common document, and of which, notwithstanding, we hear not a word, is a protest. Perhaps a case never occurs that a vessel is forced to abandon a voyage without stating the reasons of such deviation in the form of a protest at the first port at which she arrives. Although, of itself, it would be no evidence, the master might have stated in his testimony that he had made one at Martinico. His not having done so subjects him to the just presumption of having neglected it altogether, and that his going thither was brought about by a necessity of his own contrivance, and not by the act of God, or adverse winds.

Again. Although it is said that orders were sent by the claimant to the house of Waldron & Co. in Charleston, yet neither these orders nor those to the captain, both of which must be presumed to be in writing, are produced. Their suppression (to say the least) is a circumstance of some suspicion. It may also be asked why, *if the danger was so [*76 pressing, and the vessel nearly on her beam ends, was not relief sought by throwing over the deck load or a part of it? The court does not meau to say that it was the master's duty to sacrifice the cargo rather thau go to a foreign port; but from his uot disembarrassing himself of an encumbrance which must have been so much in his way, it may well be doubted whether the situation of the brig were as perilous as is now represented, or the lives of the crew exposed to the dangers we now hear of.

From the declarations of the claimant as to his intentions previous to the voyage an argument was drawn in his favor.

It is sufficient to say that such declarations are not evidence, and if they were, might, iu a case otherwise mysterious, rather increase than lull suspicion. As little dependence is to be placed on the fact that, for a foreign voyage, higher wages would have been demanded than for one to Charleston. Although the original agreement with the mariners may have been, and probably was, for Charleston, there can be no doubt that the owner would have an interest, in a case of this kind, to raise them full as high as seamen would have a right to expect, if the vessel were carried, and especially without a palpable necessity, to an interdicted foreign port.

Considering, then, the suspicious source from which the testimony is derived, and the unfavorable and unexplained circumstances which have been stated, the court is unanimously of opinion that the sentence of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

RANDOLPH v. DONALDSON.

Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J., and TODD, J.

If a debtor, committed to the state jail under process from the courts of the United States, escape, the marshal is not liable.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, in an action of debt brought by Donaldson against Randolph, late marshal 77*] of that district, for the *escape of one Baine, who, bcing taken in execution by the deputy marshal, had been deliverecd over to the jailer of the state prison of Botetourt county, from whose custody he escaped.

The action was in the common form, and the defendant pleaded nil debet, upon which issue was joined.

Upon the trial the defendant below took two bills of exception.

The first bill of exceptions sets forth the judgment and execution of Donaldson against Baine, and the marshal's return of the execution in these words: "Executed, and the defendant "imprisoned in the jail of Botetourt the 13th "November, 1797, as per the jailer's receipt in "my possession. Samuel Holt, D. M., for "David M. Randolph, M. V. D." It further sets forth the evidence of the fact that the original debtor, Baine, was seen at large; "whereupon the counsel for the plaintiff prayed the "court to instruct the jury that although the "marshal, the defendant, by his deputy, had "delivered the said original debtor, Baine, to "the jailer of Botetourt county, where he was "committed to jail, yet that the defendant was "liable to the plaintiff for an escape, upon the "discharge of the debtor by the said jailer, un-"less an escape warrant has been taken out, as "the law dirccts; whereupon the court instruct-"cd the jury that in law the marshal would "be liable to the plaintiff if the said Bainc es-"caped out of the said jail, with the consent or "through the negligence of the said jailer; as "the act of the jailer was, in that respect, the "act of the marshal. The court also instructed "the jury, that if the escape of the said Baine "from the jail of the said county of Botctourt "had taken place after the expiration of the "time when the said David Meade Randolph "was marshal of the Virginia District, he would "be liable for such escape, unless he shall prove "that he had assigned over the said Baine to "his successor in office by a deed of assign-"ment; or by an entry on the records of this "court, that he had made such assignment ac-"cording to an act of assembly of the common-"wealth of Virginia upon that subject, entitled "'an act to reduce into one all acts and parts of "acts relating to the appointment *and [*78 "duties of sheriffs;' the section of which act re-"ferred to in the instructions is in the following "words: 'XXII, and for removing all con-"troversies touching the manner of turning "over prisoners upou a sheriff's quitting his "office, Be it further enacted, That the delivery "of prisoners by indenture, between the old "sheriff and the new, or the entering upon "record, in the county court, the names of the "several prisoners and causes of their commit-"ment delivered over to the new sheriff, shall "be sufficient to discharge the late sheriff from "all suits or actions for auy escape that shall "happen afterwards.' To which opinion and "instructious the defendant excepted."

The 2d bill of exceptions stated, that "the "defendant offered evidence of the insolvency "of Baine at the time of his imprisonment and "discharge, and moved the court to instruct "the jury that if they were satisfied of the in-"solvency of Baine, and that Doualdson "neither resided himself, nor had any known "agent, in the county of Botetourt at the time "of Baine's imprisonmeut and discharge, to "whom notice might be given that he was in-"solvent and that security for the prison fees "was required, that in these circumstances the "jailer was legally justified in discharging him "under the act of the general assembly of Vir-"ginia in such case madc and provided. But "the court was of opinion that in the applica-"tion of this act of assembly to the case of a "marshal, the whole District of Virginia was to "be considcred as his county, and it was suf-"ficient if the said Donaldsou had any such "know agent in the District of Virginia; and so "instructed the jury; to which opinion and in-"struction the defendant excepted."

The jury found a verdict in the following words: "We of the jury find that the said Alex-"ander Baine in the declaration mentioned, "did escape from the jail in the county of Bo-"tetourt, with the consent of the defendant, "the then marshal of the Virginia District, as "in the declaration is set forth; and therefore "we find for the plaintiff the debt in the dec-"laration mentioned and assess his damages to "one thousand dollars."

*Upon this verdict judgment was ren- [*79

dered for the plaintiff, and the defendant took his writ of error.

C. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

By the law of Virginia it is necessary that the jury should state, in their verdict, that the escape was with the consent of the sheriff. The verdict in the present case states the consent of the marshal; but the jury found the fact in consequence of the instruction of the court.

1. The first opinion to which an exception was taken was that the marshal was liable for the negligence of the jailer.

The jailor was not the deputy nor the officer of the marshal, but the deputy of the sheriff of Botetourt county. He was not an officer of the United States, but an officer of the commonwealth of Virginia. He was not appointed by, nor under the control of, nor responsible to the marshal.

By the judiciary act of the United States, vol. 1, p. 66, § 28, the marshal is expressly made liable for his deputies, "and shall be "held answerable for the delivery, to his suc- "cessor, of all prisoners which may be in his "custody at the time of his removal, or when "the term for which he is appointed shall ex- "pire, and for that purpose may retain such "prisoners in his custody until his successor "shall be appointed and qualified as the law "directs."

On the 23d of September, 1789, vol. 1, p. 362, Congress resolved "that it be recommend- "ed to the legislatures of the several states to pass "laws making it expressly the duty of the "keepers of their jails to receive and safe keep "therein all prisoners committed under the au- "thority of the United States, until they shall "be discharged by due course of the laws "thereof, under the like penalties as in the case "of prisoners committed under the authority "of such states respectively; the United States "to pay for the use and keeping of such jails, "at the rate of 50 cents per month for each "prisoner that shall, under their authority, be [*80] "committed * thereto, during the time "such prisoners shall be therein confined; and "also to support such of said prisoners as shall "be committed for offenses."

In consequenee of this recommendation the legislature of Virginia passed "an act for the "safe keeping of prisoners committed, under "the authority of the United States into any of "the jails in this commonwealth" (P. P. new Rev. Code, vol. 1, p. 43), by which it was enacted "that it shall be the duty of the keeper "of the jail in every district, county or corpor- "ation within this commonwealth, to receive "into his custody any prisoner or prisoners, "who may be from time to time committed to "his charge, under the authority of the United "States, and to safe keep every such prisoner "or prisoners according to the warrant or pre- "cept of commitment, until he shall be dis- "charged by the due course of the laws of the "United States."

2. "And that the keeper of every jail afore- "said shall be subject to the same pains and "penalties for any neglect or failure of duty "herein, as he would be subject to, by the laws "of this commonwealth, for a like neglect or "failure in the case of a prisoner committed "under the authority of the said laws."

The keeper of the jail is directly liable to the party. It was not intended that he should have a double remedy, viz., against the keeper of the jail and the marshal. Nothing could be more unreasonable than to make the marshal liable for the conduct of a person not appointed by him, over whom he has no control, and against whom he has no remedy. When the marshal had delivered the prisoner to the keeper of the jail he had discharged his duty and was no longer liable. The prisoner was no longer in the custody of the marshal, but of the jailer.

2. The seeond opinion of the court, to which an exception was taken, was, that if the escape was after the defendant had ceased to be marshal, still he was liable unless he had assigned over Baine as a prisoner to his successor in manner provided by the law of Virginia.

The observations already made are an answer to this *opinion. The marshal was bound [*81 by the law of the United States to deliver to his successor only such prisoners as were in his custody. Baine was not in his custody, and therefore he was not bound to deliver him over; and if not bound to deliver him over, he could not be liable for his escape.

The opinion was objectionable also on another ground. By the law of Virginia, the delivery over of prisoners by indenture, and the reeord of the names of the prisoners delivered over, is not the only evidence which a sheriff may produce of the fact of the delivery. The statute is cumulative only. It describes a mode by which he may certainly exonerate himself, and the kind of evidence which would be conclusive, but does not deprive him of the right of proving the delivery over of the prisoners by other means. The act of Congress says nothing of the mode of delivery nor of the mode of proof.

The marshal was not bound to take out an escape warrant as required by the law of Virginia (1 P. P., 118), because the prisoner was in the custody of the jailer, and not of the marshal. Besides, the marshal must of necessity reside at a great distance from many of the jails, and it would be unreasonable to oblige him to superintend them all.

3. The third opinion objected to at the trial was, that in applying the Virginia law of sheriffs to the marshal, the whole district was to be considered as his county; and therefore if the plaintiff had an agent in any county it was sufficient to prevent his discharge without notice.

The words of the act of assembly relative to the residence of the creditor or his agent ought to be taken strictly. The laws of the state are to be taken as rules of decision where they apply. But in this case they were not applicable.

R. I. Taylor, contra.

If doubts exist as to the construction of a law, the argument ab inconvenienti has great weight. If the jailer is not liable to the marshal, the United States are not able to enforce their judgments. The jailer of a *county [*82 is the officer of the sheriff, who may or may not require security. A district jailer gives security only in the sum of $1,500. It is not very important whether the jailer is liable, as the remedy would generally be of little value. But if he is liable it does not follow that the marshal is not.

Under the resolution of Congress and the act of Virginia the jailer is only liable to the same "pains and penalties," strictly and technically considered, as if, &c. That is, he is only liable criminally, and not civilly. He is liable to punishment for a voluntary escape, but not to a civil remedy.

It cannot reasonably be presumed that the legislature meant to confide the revenue, the debts of individuals and the execution of the criminal laws of the United States to the responsibility of a county jailer.

It is not unreasonable to charge the marshal, for he has by law all the power necessary for the safe keeping of his prisoners. (Laws of the United States, vol. 1, p. 65.) He may call out guards, or he may have an officer on purpose to keep his prisoners.

He is bound to deliver over all his prisoners to his successor, and if bound to deliver over, he is bound to safe keep them. If those who are confined in the county jails are not in his custody, there are none in his custody. Who is to produce them on habeas corpus? In case of epidemic disease, who is to remove them? Who is to bring them into court for trial? Who is to receive the money upon execution?

If the legislature of the United States meant thus to hazard the revenue, the criminal jurisprudence, and the property of individuals, they would not have left it to inference, but have been more explicit.

2. As to the second opinion. It was right if the first was right. There is no other mode by which a sheriff quitting his own office can relieve himself from responsibility. But there was no evidence in the record that the escape was after the defendant ceased to be marshal, and therefore the opinion was inapplicable to the case; *and if so could not injure the defendant. The bill of exceptions is always supposed to contain the whole evidence in the cause. (3 Dall., 38.) [*83

3. As to the third opinion. There was no evidence in the case that the prisoner was discharged because there was no agent of the creditor to pay his jail fees; and therefore this opinion also was inapplicable to the case, and could not hurt the plaintiff in error. But if the law as to sheriffs in their counties is to be applied to the marshal of the district, then the whole district must be considered as his county. A creditor would have to keep an agent in each county to receive notices, for it would be impossible for him to know in which county the marshal would imprison his debtor.

C. Lee, in reply.

It is unreasonable that the marshal should be responsible for all the jailers in the state, over whom he has no control.

The sheriff is bound to commit a prisoner to the jail of that county in which he is arrested; and so is the marshal. If the jail is bad, the justices of the county are responsible. If the prisoner escape through the negligence or by the consent of the jailer, the sheriff is liable, because the jailer is his deputy. In Virginia, if a sheriff commit a prisoner to the district jail, he is not liable, because the district jailer is not his deputy. A habeas corpus would be directed to the jailer and not the marshal. As to the risk of the revenue, the United States must suffer as others do; they have thought proper to trust it to such keepers, and if they suffer the remedy is in their own hands.

As to the second opinion. If there was no evidence to justify it, that is another ground of error. But it appeared in the bill of exceptions that the witness was uncertain whether it was before or after the defendant ceased to be marshal that he saw the prisoner at large. The opinion, therefore, was prejudicial to the defendant.

3. As to the third opinion. The law of Virginia (1 P. P., 306, § 52) declares it to be unreasonable that a *sheriff should be obliged to go out of his county to give notice to creditors at whose suit any person may be in his custody, or to pay money levied on execution, and enacts that where an execution shall be delivered to the sheriff of any other county than that in which the creditor shall reside, such creditor shall name an agent in the county where the execution is to be served, for the purpose of receiving notices and money; and if the creditor fail to appoint such agent, the sheriff is not bound to give notice previous to a discharge of such prisoner for want of security for his prison fees. [*84

The jailer was liable only in the same manner and to the same extent as he would have been if the prisoner had been committed under the state authority. If committed under the state authority he would have had a right to discharge the prisoner for want of security for his fees, without notice to the creditor. The court therefore erred in giving an opposite opinion.

February 21st. Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J., and TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an action of debt brought against the former marshal of Virginia for an alleged wilful and negligent escape of a judgment debtor. At the trial of the cause in the Circuit Court of Virginia, several exceptions were taken by the plaintiff in error to the opinions of the district judge, who alone sat in the cause; and the validity of these exceptions is now to be considered by this court.

The first exception presents the question whether an escape of a judgment debtor, after a regular commitment, under process of the United States courts, to a state jail, be an escape for which the marshal of the United States for the district is responsible.

Congress, by a resolution passed the 23d September, 1789 (1 Laws U. S., 362), recommended to the several states to pass laws making it the the duty of the keepers of their jails to receive and safe keep prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, under like penalties *as in the case of prisoners commit- [*85 ted under the authority of such states respectively; and, by another resolution of 3d of March, 1791 (1 Laws U. S. 357), authorized the marshals, in the meantime, to hire temporary jails. In pursuance of the former recommendation, the legislature of Virginia, by the act of 12th November, 1789, ch. 41 (Revised Code, 43), made it the duty of the keepers of the jails within the state to receive and keep prisoners arrested under the process of the United States, and for any neglect or failure of duty, subjected them to like pains and penalties as in cases of prisoners committed under process of the state.

The act of Congress of 24th September, 1789 (ch. 20, § 27 and 28), authorizes the marshals of the several districts of the United States to appoint deputies, and declares them responsible for the defaults and misfeasances in office of such deputies. But there is no provision in any act of Congress declaring the keepers of state jails quoad prisoners in custody under process of the United States to be deputies of the marshals, or making the latter liable for escapes committed by the negligence or malfeasances of the former. If, therefore, the marshals be so liable, it is an inference from the general powers and duties annexed to their office.

It is argued that the marshals are so liable, because, in intendment of law, prisoners committed to state jails are still deemed to be in their custody; and in support of this argnment is cited the provision in the act of Congress which makes the marshal, on the removal from or the expiration of his office, responsible for the delivery to his successor of all prisoners in his cnstody; and authorizes him, for that purpose, to retain snch prisoners in his custody nntil his successor is appointed. And this argnment is further supported by its analogy to the case of sheriffs, and by the extreme inconvenience, which, it is asserted, would arise from a contrary doctrine.

The argnment is not without weight; but, upon matnre consideration, we are of opinion that it cannot prevail. The act of Congress has limited the responsibility of the marshal to his 86*] own acts and the acts of his deputies. *The keeper of a state jail is neither in fact nor in law the depnty of the marshal. He is not appointed by nor removable at the will of the marshal. When a prisoner is regularly committed to a state jail by the marshal, he is no longer in the custody of the marshal, nor controlable by him. The marshal has no authority to command or direct the keeper in respect to the nature of the imprisonment. The keeper becomes responsible for his own acts, and may expose himself by misconduct to the "pains and penalties" of the law. For certain purposes, and to certain intents, the state jail lawfully used by the United States may be deemed to be the jail of the United States, and that keeper to be keeper of the United States. But this would no more make the marshal liable for his acts than for the acts of any other officer of the United States whose appointment is altogether independent. And in these respects there is a manifest difference between the case of a marshal and a sheriff. The sheriff is, in law, the keeper of the connty jail, and the jailer is his deputy appointed and removable at his pleasure. He has the supervision and control of all the prisoners within the jail; and, therefore, is justly made responsible by law for all escapes occasioned by the negligence or wilful miscondnct of his underkeeper.

On the whole, as neither the act of Congress nor the doctrine of the common law, applicable to the case of principal and agent, affect the marshal with responsibility for the escape of a prisoner regularly committed to the cnstody of the keeper of a state jail, we are all of opinion that the decision of the Circuit Court upon this point was erroneous, and that the judgment must be reversed.

This decision renders it unnecessary to consider the other points raised in the bills of exception.

Judgment reversed.

*POLK'S LESSEE v. WENDAL ET AL. [*87

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., TODD, J., and STORY, J.

The act of N. Carolina, 1789, ch. 2, opening the land-office, did not prohibit a person from making several different entries, amounting in the whole to more than 5,000 acres, nor from purchasing the rights acquired by others by entries, nor from uniting several entries in one survey and patent; and such union of several entries is allowed by the act of 1784, ch. 19.

In a patent, the obliteration of the consideration does not make void the grant.

In cases depending on the statutes of a state, the settled construction of those statutes, by the state courts, is to be respected.

In Tennessee, the younger patent on the elder entry prevails over the elder patent on the younger entry.

A patent justifies a presumption that all the previous requisites of the law have been complied with.

A patent is void at law if the state had no title, or if the officer who issued the patent had no authority so to do.

In North Carolina the want of an entry nullifies a patent.

After the cession of land by North Carolina to the United States the former had no right to grant those lands to any other grantee who had not an incipient title before the cession. The question, whether such incipient title existed, is therefore open at law.

THIS case, as stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court, was as follows:

This is a writ of error to a judgment in ejectment rendered in the Circuit Conrt of the United States, for the Distriet of West Tennessee. On the trial the plaintiff below, who is also plaintiff in error, relied on a patent regularly issued from the state of North Carolina for 5,000 acres of land, dated the 17th day of April, 1800, which patent included the lands in controversy.

The defendant then offered in evidence a patent issned also from the state of North Carolina, and dated on the 28th of Angust, 1795, pnrporting to convey 25,060 acres of land to John Sevier, which patent also comprehended the lands in controversy. To the reading of this grant the plaintiff objected, because,

1. By the laws of the state of North Carolina no grant conld lawfully issue for as large a nnmber of acres as are included in that grant.

2. The amount of the consideration originally expressed in the said grant appears to have been torn out.

3. The said grant on its faee appears fraudulent, the number of acres mentioned being 25,060, the number of warrants forty, of 640 acres each, and yet the courses and distances, mentioned in its body, include more than 50,000 acres.

These objections were overruled, and the patent went to the jury. To this opinion of the court the counsel for the plaintiff excepted.

The counsel for the plaintiff then offered to prove, for the purpose of avoiding the said grant.

1. That the forty warrants of 640 acres each 88] mentioned *in the said grant, purport, on their face, to have been issued by Landon Carter, entry-taker of Washington county, and that the land covered by the said grant is situated between the Cumberland Mountain and Tennessee River, and not within the said county of Washington.

2. That the consideration of ten pounds for every hundred acres was fraudulently inserted in the said grant, by procurement of said grantee, John Sevier.

3. That no entries were made in the office of the entry-taker of Washington or elsewhere, authorizing the issuing of such warrants.

4. That the pretended warrants are forgeries.

5. That at the time of the cession of the western part of the state of North Carolina to the United States, and at the time of the ratification thereof by Congress, on the day of 1790, the said pretended warrants did not exist, nor were any locations or entries in the offices of the entry-taker of Washington county, from which they appear to have issued, authorizing their issuance.

6. That no consideration for the said land was ever paid to the state of North Carolina or any of its officers.

And, to prove that since the execution of the said grant the consideration mentioned therein had been altered from 50 shillings to ten pounds, the counsel for the plaintiff offered to read as evidence a letter addressed by the said John Sevier, to James Glasgow, then Secretary of State for the state of North Carolina, in the words following, to wit.:

"Jonesborough, 11th November, 1795.

"Dear Sir—I am highly sensible of your "goodness and friendship in executing my "business at your office in the manner and form "which I took the liberty to request. Permit "me to solicit a completion of the small re- 89] "mainder *of my business that remains "in the hands of Mr. Gordon.

"Should there be no impropriety, should "consider myself much obliged to have ten "pounds inserted in the room of fifty shillings.

"I have directed Mr. Gordon to furnish "unto you a plat of the amount of three 640 "acres which I consider myself indebted to "you, provided you would accept the same in "lieu of what I was indebted to you for fees, "&c., which I beg you will please to accept in "case you can conceive that the three warrants "will be adequate to the sum I am indebted to "you.

I am with sincere and great esteem,
Dear sir, your most obedient servant,
JOHN SEVIER."

"Hon. James Glassgow."

Indorsed thus,

"HON. MR. GLASSGOW, Secretary of State."

"Mr. Gordon."

The counsel for the defendants objected to the reception of this testimony, and it was rejected by the court. To this opinion also an exception was taken.

A general verdict was rendered for the defendants, on which the court gave judgment.

This judgment has been brought up to this court by writ of error.

C. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

Two questions arise in this cause:

1. Whether the fraud does not vacate the grant to Sevier?

2. Whether the evidence of that fraud should not have been admitted.

*1. The invalidity of the grant to [90 Sevier appears upon its face. It is mutilated by the erasure of the consideration. And it has been fraudulently altered in a material part.

By the law of North Carolina, the survey must be annexed to the patent, and is a substantial part of it. From this survey it appears that under 40 warrants, for 640 acres each, amounting to 25,060 acres, there have been granted to him more than 50,000 acres.

These objections having been made at the trial below, ought to have excluded the patent from the consideration of the jury.

There is a difference between a public and a private grant. A patent must be issued according to the requisites of the law, or it will be void. It takes effect merely by the provisions of the law, and if not made pursuant to law, can convey no title. (3 Co., 77, Fermor's case; 10 Co., 110, Legate's case; 6 Co., 55, Lord Chando's case; 5 Co., Barwick's case: Co, Litt., 260.)

In the case of a sale of land by a sheriff for taxes, the proceedings must be regular and according to the law which authorizes the sale, or it will be void. So under the bankrupt laws, and the Lords' act in England. The same rule of law applies to a grant from a state; and the party may take advantage of it, in ejectment. (1 Harris & M'Henry's reports, 145, The Lord Proprietary of Maryland v. Jennings et al.) So, if a bond or release be offered in evidence, the other party may show it was obtained by fraud. And if any objection appear upon the face of the instrument, the court will take notice of it. (6 Cranch, 70, O'Neale v. Thornton.)

2. The court ought to have permitted the plaintiff to give evidence of the fraud and of the want of foundation for the patent. In ejectment the deeds are not declared upon, nor set forth in the proceedings, so that the opposite party has no opportunity to plead the fraud, or the erasure, &c. He can only produce these facts in evidence by way of objection so as to prevent such deeds from being read in evidence to the jury.

*If the entry-taker in Washington [91 county had no authority to issue the warrants for these lands, they are void. The evidence of that fact ought therefore to have been admitted.

The evidence of collusion between Sevier and the Secretary of State, and of the other facts stated in the bill of exceptions, ought to have been received. For however slight the evidence might have been of some of the facts, yet it ought to have been left to the jury. (6 Cranch, 50, Maryland Ins. Co. v. Woods.)

The court below decided that no evidence could be given to invalidate the patent, except what regarded the entries.

Mr. Lee cited the following statutes of North Carolina, from Iredell's revised code: P. 205, the act of 1777, ch. 1, § 3, 4; Id., p. 322, the act of 1783, ch. 2, § 2; Id., p. 345, the act of 1784, April session, by which the lands were ceded to the United States. And the acts of 1784, October session, p. 386, ch. 19, § 6; 1778, p. 252; 1786, ch. 20; 1789, ch. 3, p. 467; and 1791, ch. 21, § 5.

Jones, contra.

1. The first objection was to the admission in evidence of the patent to Sevier, for any purpose. There was nothing on the face of the patent to make it void. It was not mutilated. There were blanks in it, but no mutilation; and there is no evidence that it was mutilated.

There could be only three kinds of consideration; fifty shillings, ten pounds, or military service. It could not by law be either the first or the last. It must therefore have been ten pounds.

The act of the officer carries a presumption that the proper consideration was paid; and the statute shows what that consideration ought to have been.

2. The next objection is that the grant comprehends 50,000 acres instead of 25,060.

But the grant is only for the 25,060, although [92] the *survey may include more. The statute which prohibits grants for more than 5,000 acres does not vacate such grants. It is only directory to the officer; and such grants are recognized by the laws of North Carolina, 1784, ch. 19. The excess is no evidence of such fraud as will vacate the deed.

The defendants were not bound to show the correctness of their entries; nor anything else prior to the patent. The entries were merged in the patent.

As to the second bill of exceptions. It presents but one point. The only evidence offered and rejected was the letter of Sevier to Glassgow. For although it states that the plaintiff offered to prove other facts, yet it does not state that he offered evidence of those facts.

But if the bill of exception imports that such evidence was offered, yet the defendants were innocent purchasers. The contest is not between the original parties. They were not bound to look beyond the patent, and if the facts were proved which the plaintiff offered to prove, yet the patent is not thereby made void, but voidable by proper process. The king may avoid his grants where a subject could not (10 Co., 113, Legate's case); but it must be either by quo warranto or scire facias, or information in the nature of a quo warranto; which is a process in the nature of a proceeding in rem. There is no instance where it has been declared void when brought collaterally into question. And although a statute declares a grant void, yet it is not actually void, but voidable. (7 Bac. Ab., 64, B; 6 Cranch, 180, Fletcher v. Peck.)

In the case from Harris and M'Henry's reports, the state of Maryland sought to set aside the grant by an information, and it only shows that upon such a process the fraud upon the state may be given in evidence. In the present case no fraud or irregularity has been sufficiently alleged to set aside the deed.

1. It is said that the lands did not lie in Washington county. This is no objection, because the party had a right to remove his entry.

*2. The charge that the consideration of [93 £10 was fraudulently inserted, is too vague and general. If the party had not paid the £10 he was still indebted to the state in that sum; and the deed is not for that cause void as to an innocent purchaser.

3. That there were no entries authorizing the warrants. This objection is equivocal, and involves questions of fact and law.

4. That the warrants were forgeries.

The patent cannot be declared void for any prior irregularity. In ejectment you must stop at the patent. And the prior patent gives the better title.

5. That at the time of the cession of the lands to the United States there were no entries authorizing the warrants.

This is in substance the same as the third objection. It is too general and vague, and involves fact and law.

6. That no consideration was paid. This, if true, does not avoid the patent; for if the money was not paid Sevier remains debtor for it to the state.

With regard to the letter to Glassgow, it is not material what alteration was made as to the consideration. No evidence of alteration was important unless it were such alteration as would vacate the deed. This letter contains no such evidence. It must have referred to some other patent; because the letter was dated in November, 1795, and refers to some instrument then incomplete; but the patent in this case was completed in the preceding August.

As to the issuing of the grant by the state of North Carolina after the cession of the territory to the United States, the act of cession provided for the issuing of such grants upon entries previously made. It does not appear that the entries in this case were not made before the cession. The plaintiff's grant was also issued by the state of North Carolina, five years after the defendant's.

C. Lee, in reply. [94

The practice of England, as to revoking patents, is no rule respecting the land laws of this country. The register of the land-office is only an officer of the law; can transfer nothing but according to his authority, and cannot grant contrary to law.

The patent is void on its face. It appears to have been obliterated. This fact, together with the letter to Glassgow, ought to have been left to the jury, as tending to prove a fraudulent alteration in the deed.

Unless the patent conveys all the land within the described bounds, it is vague and uncertain. It cannot be limited to the 25,060 acres. If it conveys anything, it conveys the whole 50,000 acres.

February 21st. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The first exception is to the admission of the grant set up by the defendants in bar of the plaintiff's title. This objection alleges the grant to be absolutely void for three causes.

The first is,

That no grant could lawfully issue for the quantity of land expressed in this patent.

If this objection be well founded, it will be conclusive. Its correctness depends on the laws of the state of North Carolina.

The act of 1777, ch. 1, opens the land-office of the state, and directs an entry-taker to be appointed in each county, to receive entries made by the citizens of its vacant lands. The third section of this act contains a proviso that no person shall be entitled to claim a greater quantity of land than 640 acres, where the survey shall be bounded by vacant land, nor more than 95] *1,000 acres between lines of land already surveyed for other persons.

The fourth section fixes the price of land thus to be entered at 50 shillings per hundred acres; after which follows a proviso that if any person shall claim more than 640 acres for himself, and 100 acres for his wife and each of his children, he shall pay for every hundred acres exceeding that quantity five pounds, and so in proportion. But this permission to take up more than the specified quantity of lands at five pounds for every hundred acres, does not extend to Washington county.

In June, 1781, ch. 7. the land-office was closed, and further entries for lands prohibited.

In April, 1783, ch. 2, the land-office was again opened, and the price of lands fixed at ten pounds for each hundred acres. The ninth section of this act authorizes any citizen to enter, with the entry-taker to be appointed by the assembly, "a claim for any lands, provided "such claim does not exceed 5,000 acres."

This act limits the amount for which an entry might be made. But the same person is not, in this act, forbidden to make different entries; and entries were transferable. No prohibition appears in the act which should prevent the assignee of several entries, or the person who has made several entries, from uniting them in one survey and patent. The court does not perceive, in reason or in the directions of the law respecting surveys, anything which should restrain a surveyor from including several entries in the same survey. The form of surveys, which is prescribed by law, if that rule should be considered as applicable to surveys made on several entries united, may be observed, and, in this case, is observed, notwithstanding the union of different entries.

In April, 1784, ch. 19, the legislature again took up this subject, and, after reciting that it had been found impracticable to survey most of the entries of lands made adjoining the large swamps in the eastern parts of the state agreeable to the manner directed by the acts then in force, without putting the makers 96] thereof *to great and unnecessary expenses, empowered surveyors in the eastern parts of the state to survey for any person or persons, his or their entries of lands in or adjoining any of the great swamps, in one entire survey.

The third section enacts, "that where two "or more persons shall have entered or may "hereafter enter lands jointly, or where two "or more persons agree to have their entries "surveyed jointly in one or more surveys, the "surveyor is empowered and required to sur- "vey the same accordingly in one entire sur- "vey; and the persons so agreeing to have "their entries surveyed, or entering lands "jointly, shall hold the same as tenants in "common, and not as joint-tenants."

The fourth section secures the same fees to the surveyor and secretary as they would have been entitled to claim, had the entries been surveyed and granted separately.

As all laws on the same subject are to be taken together, it is argued that this act shows the sense of the legislature respecting the mode of surveying entries, and must be taken into view in expounding the various statutes on that subject. It evinces unequivocally the legislative opinion that, as the law stood previous to its passage, a joint survey of two entries belonging to the same person or to different persons, could not be made. The right to join different entries in the same survey, then, must depend on this act.

The first and second sections of this act relate exclusively to entries made in or adjoining to the great swamps in the eastern parts of the state.

The third section is applicable to the whole country, but provides only for the case of entries made by two or more persons. It is, therefore, contended that the court cannot extend the provision to the case of distinct entries belonging to the same person.

For this distinction it is impossible to conceive a reason. No motive can be imagined for allowing two or more persons to unite their entries in one survey, which does not apply with at least as much force for allowing a single *person to unite his entries adjoining [97 each other in one survey. It appears to the court that the case comes completely within the spirit, and is not opposed by the letter of the law. The case provided for is, "where two or more per- "sons agree to have their entries surveyed "jointly," &c. Now, this agreement does not prevent the subsequent assignment of the entries to one of the parties; and the assignment is itself the agreement of the assignor that the assignee may survey the entries jointly or separately, at his election. The court is of opinion that, under a sound construction of this law, entries which might be joined in one survey, if remaining the property of two or more persons, may be so joined, though they become the property of a single person.

The second objection to the admission of the grant is, that the amount of the consideration originally expressed on its face appears to have been torn out.

The grant stands thus: "For and in consid- "eration of —— pounds," &c.

The court is unanimously and clearly of opinion that there is nothing in this objection. It is not suggested, nor is there any reason to believe, that the words were obliterated for fraudulent purposes, or for the purpose of avoiding the grant. They may have been taken out by some accident; and there is no difficulty in supplying the lost words. The consideration paid was ten pounds for each hundred acres; and there can be no doubt that the word "ten" is the word which is obliterated. Had the whole grant been lost, a copy might have been given in evidence; and it would be strange if the original should be excluded because a word which could not be mistaken, and which, indeed, is not essential to the validity of the grant, has become illegible.

The third exception is, that the grant, on its face, appears fraudulent, because it has issued for 25,060 acres of land, although the lines which circumscribe it, and which are recited in it, comprehend upwards of 50,000 acres.

Without inquiring into the effect of a grant 98] conveying *50,000 acres of land under a sale of 25,000 acres, it will be sufficient to observe that, in this case, the surplus land is comprehended in prior entries, and is consequently not conveyed by this grant. This exception, therefore, is inapplicable to the case.

It is the opinion of this court that there was no error in permitting the grant under which the defendant claimed title to go to the jury.

The remaining exceptions were taken after the grant was before the jury, and are for causes not apparent on its face. They present one general question of great importance to land-holders in the state of Tennessee. It is this: Is it, in any, and, if in any, in what cases, allowable, in an ejectment, to impeach a grant from the state for causes anterior to its being issued?

In cases depending on the statutes of a state, and more especially in those respecting titles to land, this court adopts the construction of the state where that construction is settled, and can be ascertained. But it is not understood that the courts of Tennessee have decided any other point bearing on the subject than this, that under their statutes declaring an elder grant founded on a younger entry to be void, the priority of entries is examinable at law; and that a junior patent founded on a prior entry shall prevail in an ejectment against a senior patent founded on a junior entry. The question whether there are other cases in which a party may, at law, go beyond the grant for the purpose of avoiding it, remains undecided.

The laws for the sale of public lands provide many guards to secure the regularity of grants, to protect the incipient rights of individuals, and also to protect the state from imposition. Officers are appointed to superintend the business; and rules are framed prescribing their duty. These rules are, in general, directory; and when all the proceedings are completed by a patent issued by the authority of the state, a compliance with these rules is pre-supposed. That every prerequisite has been performed, is an inference properly deducible, and which every man has a right to draw from the existence of the grant itself. It would, therefore, 99] be extremely *unreasonable to avoid a grant in any court for irregularities in the conduct of those who are appointed by the government to supervise the progressive course of a title from its commencement to its consummation in a patent. But there are some things so essential to the validity of the contract, that the great principles of justice and of law would be violated did there not exist some tribunal to which an injured party might appeal, and in which the means by which an elder title was acquired might be examined. In general, a court of equity appears to be a tribunal better adapted to this object than a court of law. On an ejectment, the pleadings give no notice of those latent defects of which the party means to avail himself; and, should he be allowed to use them, the holder of the elder grant might often be surprised. But in equity, the specific points must be brought into view; the various circumstances connected with those points are considered; and all the testimony respecting them may be laid before the court. The defects in the title are the particular objects of investigation; and the decision of a court in the last resort upon them is decisive. The court may, on a view of the whole case, annex equitable conditions to its decree, or order what may be reasonable, without absolutely avoiding a whole grant. In the general, then, a court of equity is the more eligible tribunal for these questions; and they ought to be excluded from a court of law. But there are cases in which a grant is absolutely void; as where the state has no title to the thing granted; or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant. In such cases, the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law.

Having premised these general principles, the court will proceed to consider the exceptions to the opinion of the Circuit Court in this case, and the testimony rejected by that opinion.

The case does not present distinct exceptions to be considered separately, but a single exception to a single opinion, rejecting the whole testimony offered by the plaintiff. The plaintiff offered to prove that no entries were ever made authorizing the issuing of the warrants on which the grant to Sevier was founded, and that the warrants themselves were forgeries. He also offered *to prove that, at the time of [100 the cession to Congress of the territory in which these lands lie, the warrants did not exist, nor were there any locations in the office from which they purport to have issued, to justify their issuing.

In the state of North Carolina itself, the want of an entry would seem to be a defect sufficient to render a grant null.

The act of 1777, which opens the land-office and directs the appointment of an officer in each county, denominated an entry-taker, to receive entries of all vacant lands in his county, directs the entry-taker, if the lands shall not be claimed by some other person within three months, to deliver to the party a copy of the entry with its proper number, and an order to the county surveyor to survey the same. This order is called a warrant.

The ninth section of the act then declares, "that every right, &c., by any person or persons set up or pretended to any of the before-mentioned lands, which shall not be obtained in manner by this act directed, or by purchase or inheritance from some person or persons becoming proprietors by virtue thereof, or which shall be obtained in fraud, evasion or elusion of the provisions and restrictions thereof, shall be deemed and are hereby declared utterly void."

The act of 1783, which again opens the land-office, appoints an entry-taker for the western district, and prescribes rules for making entries in his office, and for granting warrants similar to those which had been framed for the government of the entry-takers of the respective counties.

In the year 1789, North Carolina ceded to Congress the territory in which the lands lie for which Sevier's grant was made, reserving, however, all existing rights under the state, which were to be perfected accordiug to the laws of North Carolina. This cession was accepted by Congress.

Sevier's snrvey is dated on the 26th day of May, 1795.

101*] *The lands for which the warrants were granted, by virtue of which the survey was made, lie within that district of conntry for which the land-office was opened by the act of 1777. Had the survey been made on the land originally claimed by these warrants, it must have been a case directly within the ninth section of the act; and the right is declared by that section to be utterly void. But the survey was made on different lands by virtue of an act which empowers the surveyor so to do in all cases of entries on lands previously appropriated. This clause in the law, however, does not authorize a snrvey where no entry has been made; and such snrvey would also come completely within the provision of the ninth section. In such case, there is no power in the agents of the state to make the grant; and a grant so obtained is declared to be void.

This subject is placed in a very strong point of view by considering it in connection with the cession made to the United States. After that cession, the state of North Carolina had no power to sell an acre of land within the ceded territory. No right could be acquired under the laws of that state. But the right was reserved to perfect incipient titles. The fact that this title acrued before the cession does not appear on the face of the grant. It is, of course, open to examination. The survey was not made until May, 1795, many years posterior to the cession. It purports, however, to have been made by virtue of certain warrants founded on entries which may have been made before the cession. But if these warrants had no existence at the time of the cession, if there were no entries to justify them, what right could this grantee have had at the time of the cession? The court can perceive none; and if none existed, the grant is void for want of power in the state of North Carolina to make it.

If, as the plaintiff offered to prove, the entries were never made, and the warrants were forgeries, then no right accrued under the act of 1777; no purchase of the land was made from the state; and, independent of the act of cession to the United States, the grant is void by the express words of the law.

If entries were made in the county of Wash-

102*] ington, *but no commencement of right had taken place in the ceded territory previous to the cession, so as to bring the party within the reservation contained in the act of cession, then the grant must be void, there being no anthority in the grantor to make it. In rejecting testimony to these points, the Circnit Court erred; and their judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

THE SHIP RICHMOND
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—TODD, J.

The non-intercourse act of 28th of June, 1809, (vol. 10, p. 13), which requires a vessel bound to a permitted port to give bond in double the amount of vessel and cargo not to go to a prohibited port, is applicable to a vessel sailing in ballast.

If a merchant vessel of the United States be seized by the naval force of the United States, within the territorial jurisdiction of a foreign friendly power, for a violation of the laws of the United States, it is an offense against that power which must be adjusted between the two governments. This court can take no cognizance of it. The law does not connect that trespass, with the subsequent seizure by the civil authority, under the process of the District Court, so as to annul the proceedings of that court against the vessel.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia affirming the sentence of the District Court, which condemned the ship Richmond for a violation of the non-intercourse act of 28th of June, 1809, (vol. 10, p. 13), by departing from Philadelphia, bound on a foreign voyage to a permitted port, without having given bond not to go to a prohibited port.

The case was argued by Harper for the appellants, and Jones and Pinkney for the United States.

February 22d. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The ship Richmond, an American registered vessel, sailed from Philadelphia in ballast in December, 1809, with a clearance for New York, but proceeded to Portsmouth in Great Britain, where she arrived in 1810. She made two voyages to Amelia Island in East Florida, during the second of which she was seized in St. Mary's River by gun-boat No. 62, January 14th, 1812, and libeled in the District Court of Georgia for violating the act passed the 28th of June, 1809, for amending the *non-intercourse [103 law. The Richmond was condemned in both the District and Circuit Courts, and from their sentence the claimants have appealed to this court.

The claimants contend,

1. That the vessel was not liable to forfeiture.

2. That the seizure was made within the territory of Spain, and that all proceedings founded thereon are void.

When the Richmond sailed from Phiadelphia, commercial intercourse between the ports of Great Britain and those of the United States was permitted. But the act of the 28th of June, 1809 (vol. 10, p. 13), enacts, that "no ship or "vessel bound to a foreign port or place with "which commercial intercourse has been or "may be thus permitted, except, &c., shall be "allowed to depart unless the owner or owners, "consignee or factor of such ship or vessel "shall, with the master, have given bond, with "one or more sureties, to the United States, in "a sum double the value of the vessel and "cargo, that the vessel shall not proceed to any "port or place with which commercial inter-"course is not thus permitted, nor be directly "nor indirectly engaged during the voyage in "any trade with such port or place." If a vessel shall depart without having given such boud, the vessel with her eargo are declared to be wholly forfeited.

It is contended that this act does not apply to vessels departing from the United States to a permitted port, in ballast.

The aet is eertainly not expressed with all the precision that could be wished. The case coutemplated by the legislature most probably was that of a vessel sailing with a cargo; but there is reason to believe that a vessel departiug in ballast also was within the meauing aud iutent of the law. The bond is provided to prevent a breach of the existing restrictive laws by a vessel clearing out or sailing for a permitted port, but actually proceeding for a prohibited port. This might be done by a vessel with or without a eargo; and the conditiou of the boud would be violated, in its letter as well as spirit, 104] by *the vessel sailing without the cargo to a prohibited port. The eourt understands the law, then, direeting a bond to be given in double the value of the vessel and eargo, to apply to the eargo if there be a cargo, but to the vessel only if there be no cargo.

The seizure of an American vessel within the territorial jurisdiction of a foreign power is eertainly an offense against that power, which must be adjusted between the two governments. This eourt ean take no eognizance of it; and the majority of the eourt is of opinion that the law does uot connect that trespass, if it be one, with the subsequent seizure by the civil authority, uuder the proeess of the District Court so as to annul the proceedings of that eourt agaiust the vessel. One judge, who does not concur in this opiuion, considers the testimony as suffieient to prove that the Riehmond, when first seized by the gun-boat, was within the jurisdietional limits of the United States.

The sentence is affirmed with costs.

ARNOLD AND OTHERS.
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

The double duties imposed by the act of July 1st, 1812, accrued upon goods which arrived within a collection district on that day.

To constitute an importation, so as to attach the right to duties, it is necessary not only that there should be an arrival within the limits of the United States and of a collection district, but also within the limits of some port of entry. Semb. That if the condition of a bond be to pay 1,700 dollars, or the duties which may be ascertained to be due on certain goods imported, it is not in the option of the obligee to discharge the bond by payment of the 1,700 dollars. That an obligor may, at law, recover more than the penalty of the bond.

Where the computation is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act is done, is to be included.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, in an action of debt, upon a bond in the penalty of 3,400 dollars, given July 2d, 1812, for duties at the custom-house. The cause was decided below upon demurrer to the pleas of the defendants, who were the principal and sureties in the bond.

It was an action of debt on a bond, dated July 2d, 1812, given to the United States for $3,400. The condition of the bond is as follows, viz: "The condition of this obligation "is such, that if the above bounden, S. G. "Arnold, &c., shall and do, on or before the "2d day of October next, well and truly pay "or cause to be paid unto the collector of the "customs for the District of Providence "*for the time being, the sum of $1,700, [105 "or the amount of duties to be ascertained as "due, and arising on certain goods, wares and "merchandise entered by the above bounden "S. G. Arnold, as imported in the brig Dover, "R. Fenner, master, from Havanna, as per en-"try dated this day, then the above obligation "to be void, &c." The following indorsement is on the bond, viz.:

"Amount of duties ascertained as due $1,708 "and 38 cents.

THOMAS PECKHAM, Jun.,
Deputy-Collector."

The defendants pleaded that, as to $1,708 and 38 cents, part and pareel of said sum of $3,400 demanded by the plaintiffs, with interest thereon from the day whereou the same was payable, to the time of the plea, being 13 dollars and 38 cents, they owe the plaintiffs the same, being in the whole the sum of 1,721 dollars and 76 cents; and that as to the whole residue of the sum demanded, the defendants say, that therefore the plaintiffs, their said action, ought not to have and maintain, because they say, "that the brig Dover in the condi-"tion of the said bond mentioued, sailed from "Havauna on the 16th day of June, A.D. 1812, "bound to the said District of Providence, and "that she arrived within the United States on the "30th day of June, 1812, and within the said "District of Providence on the 1st day of "July, A. D. 1812, having on board the said "goods, &c., mentioned in the eoudition, which "said goods, &c., were imported into the "United States, on the said 30th day of June, "1812, and into the said District of Provi-"dence on the said 1st day of July, 1812, in the "brig Dover, &c.; that Providence is the sole "port of entry in the said District of Provi-"dence, and that ou the said 2d day of July, "1812, the said goods, &c., were duly entered "at the custom-house in the said District of "Providence, as imported in the said brig "Dover, &c.; the defendauts further aver, that "the bond aforesaid was made, exeeuted and "given by them to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, "for securing the duties due on the said goods "so imported as aforesaid, in conformity with, "and by virtue and in pursuance of, the act of "the Congress, &c., passed on the 10th day of "August, *1799, entitled 'an aet mak- [106 "ing further provision for the payment of the "debts of the United States,' and also a cer-"tain other act of Congress, passed on the 7th "day of June, 1794, entitled, 'an aet laying "additional duties on goods, &c., imported "into the United States.' The defeudauts also "aver, that the duties due by the aets afore-"said, on the importation of said goods, &c., "in manner aforesaid, amouuted at the time "of the importation of the same as aforesaid, to "the aforesaid sum of 1,708 dollars and 38 "cents, and no more, and were then and there "ascertained by the said deputy-collector, to

"that sum and no more, according to the con"dition of said bond, and in pursuance of the "provisions of said statutes. They also aver,
"that at the time of the entering of the said
"goods, &c., at the custom-house, as aforesaid,
"on the said 2d day of July, 1812, neither they,
"the defendants, nor the collector of the cus"toms for said District of Providence, had any "knowledge of the act entitled, 'an act for im-
"posing additional duties upon all goods, &c.,
"imported from any foreign port or place, and
"for other purposes,' passed on the 1st day of "July, 1812; nor was the said last mentioned
"act promulgated, published and made known
"at the District of Providence as aforesaid, at "the time of making the said entry as afore-
"said; and this the defendants are ready to
"verify, &c."

To this plea, the plaintiffs demurred.

In the Circuit Court judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, for 3,428 dollars and 90 cents.

Pitkin, on the part of the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the act imposing double duties could not, on principles of law, or justice, be considered as in operation until the 2d day of July. The words of that act are: That "an additional "duty, &c., shall be levied and collected upon "all goods, &c., which shall from and after the "passing of this act, be imported into the "United States, &c."

The act was approved by the President on the 1st day of July, 1812. By the sound con-
107*] struction of the words *"from and after the passage of this act," it is contended that the first day of July must be excluded; that the meaning is the same as if the words used had been from and after the 1st day of July, in which case the first day of July would certainly be excluded, and the act would not be in force until after that day. "From and after the passing of this act," have also the same meaning as from and after the time of passing the act. The question would then occur, as it now does, when or at what time was the act passed? The answer is, on the 1st day of July; and, of course, unless there are fractions of a day, the duties could not be levied and collected until after that day. The act repealing the duty on salt, passed in 1807, declares, "that from and after "the 31st day of December next, so much of "any act as lays a duty on imported salt be, "and the same is hereby repealed, and from "and after the day last aforesaid salt shall be "imported, &c., duty free."

No one has ever pretended that salt could be imported duty free until the first day of January, because it could not be so imported until from and after the day preceding. The court must undoubtedly give such a construction to the act as that no citizen can by possibility be subjected to its operation before it had actually passed. In order to prevent this the court must either exclude the 1st day of July altogether, or they must admit fractions of a day and suffer an inquiry into the very moment of time on that day when the act received the signature of the President, and was lodged in the office of the Secretary of State.

If a vessel had arrived in the morning of the 1st day of July, and the act was not in fact approved by the President until the afternoon of that day, it cannot be pretended that the goods brought in such vessel were imported "from and after the passing of the act." It is well known that acts are not generally presented to the President for his approbation until about the middle of the day, and on the last day of the session, frequently not until nearly the last hour of the day. The difficulties, however, attending an inquiry of this nature, as well as the impropriety of calling on the President for information as to the moment when a law received his sanction, may perhaps be sufficient inducements for *the court [108 to say, that when the rights and interests of the citizens are so materially involved, and when by the express words of the act it is not to take effect until from and after the passing of the same, they will as a general rule exclude the day on which it passed. The authorities which have a bearing on this question are various and contradictory. In the case of Pugh and Wife v. Duke of Leeds (Cowper, 714), these authorities are referred to and commented upon by Lord Mansfield with his usual ability and sound sense.

Much more subtlety than argument has been used to prove a difference in the meaning of words made use of in instruments to show the time when they should take effect. When the words have been "from the date," the court have sometimes said it should include the day, and where the words have been "from the day of the date," it should exclude the day. In some cases the courts have entirely rejected this distinction, and have said that they do or may mean the same thing. In the case of Bellasis v. Hester (1 Lord Raymond, 280), on a bill of exchange, payable 10 days after sight, the court—two judges against one—decided, that the day on which the bill was presented for payment was included. This opinion, however, was against the custom and practice of merchants. In the case of Hatter v. Ash (1 Lord Raymond, p. 85), the following distinction is made by counsel, and is admitted by one of the judges, and not contradicted by the others, "that the words "'from the date,' when used to pass on interest, "include the day, aliter, when used by way "of computation on matters of account." This distinction is in some measure recognized by Lord Mansfield in the above case of Pugh and Leeds, in Cowper. In this last case Lord Mansfield says that the words "from the date," or "from the day of the date," may be either inclusive or exclusive, according to the subject matter, and may be construed either way, to give effect to the transaction, or for the furtherance of justice between parties. In the case now before the court it is not necessary to include the day for the purpose of giving effect and validity to the law; and in case the day is included, manifest injustice may, and in all probability will, happen to the citizens of the United States. For, if there can be no fractions of a day, the act must in legal contemplation be considered as in force *from [109 the first moment of the day on which it received the sanction of the President. It is understood that by the construction at the treasury the 1st day of July is excluded, and that the accounts of the collectors of the customs are all settled, excluding double duties, on goods which arrived on that day.

2. Even if the act went into operation on the 1st day of July, then was this case a complete importation before that time. The vessel and cargo arrived within the United States, and within the limits of the state of Rhode Island, on the 30th day of June, and the importation was then perfected. Importation does not imply a bringing into any particular port to which the vessel may be destined; a bringing within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, either on land or water, is an importation. Importing and bringing into the United States are used synonimously in various sections of the collection law, and the fair interpretation of both expressions is, that an importation is no more than voluntarily introdueing property within the jurisdiction of the United States generally, and does not require its actual arrival at the port of its destination. The moment a cargo so arrives within the United States, and before it reaches its port of destination, the right of the United States attaches to it. A manifest of the cargo must be delivered to their officers, and the cargo subjected in some degree to their control. The United States then have at least an inchoate right to duties, of which the owner cannot deprive them except by exportation without unlading; the right to the duties accrues on the first entry of the vessel into the waters of the United States, and not after her arrival at her port of destination; and no new right, on such arrival, accrues, except the seeondary right of ascertaining the amount of duties to be paid, and the extent of the security required for them, which could not be ascertained till after an actual entry at the custom-house. The coming in of the vessel to the waters of the United States, her proceeding to her destined port, her entry there, is one transaction, and is one act in relation to duties; and when she reaches her destined port and enters there, the right of the United States attaches as from the first moment of her coming within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, and the responsibilities of the owner cannot be increased or varied to his injury by subsequent acts of the government.

110*] *The 36th section of the law clearly discriminates between importation and entry. By the collection law, and all the forms of manifest, entry, &c., it is clearly evinced that importation precedes entry.

To constitute an importation there must be a voluntary bringing of goods into the United States; the vessel must be bound to the United States, with an intent there to unlade her cargo, or to enter the same for exportation without unlading.

Coming in by stress of weather or other necessity is not a legal importation.

By a construction given to the navigation acts of Great Britain, coming into a port, with an intent to unlade, although bulk be not broken, is an importation; but a mere coming within the limits of a port, without any intent to break bulk, or unlade, is not an importation, either to make the customs become due or to subject the ship or goods to forfeiture, or to oblige the master to report or make entry, &c. (Reeve's History of the law of shipping, 260.)

So, goods seized in a ship 20 miles below the Hope, but within the limits of the port of London, are considered as an importation. (Reeves, p. 261.)

It is believed, also, that under our non-importation law, arrival at any particular port of destination is not necessary to constitute an offense under that act, but that if the vessel is bound to the United States with an intent there to unlade her cargo, the forfeiture is incurred the moment the vessel voluntarily enters the limits of the United States. The words in the collection law and non-importation act are the same, viz.: "Imported into the United States," &c.

3. If, however, the importation was not so complete as that the duties accrued on the arrival of the vessel within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, it is contended that the importation was perfected, and the right of the United States to duties complete, on her arrival within the limits of any district of the customs of the United States.

*The vessel in the case before the [111 court, as is confessed by the pleadings, arrived within the limits of the District of Providence, which is about 20 miles within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, on the 1st day of July; and if, in the fiscal sense of the term, this constituted an importation, and the law did not take effect until the 2d day of July, the goods so imported cannot be subject to the duties imposed by that act. We are aware of the decision of the court, in 1810, in the case of the United States v. Vowell & M'Clean, in 5 Cranch. The distinction there taken by the counsel for the defendants, between a district and a port of entry, is recognized by the court as correct. The court say, "the duties did not accrue, in "the fiscal sense of the term, until the vessel "arrived at the port of entry."

But with great deference we contend that the time of importation, even in the fiscal sense of the term, is not ascertained merely by the entry of the master, or of the owner or consignee, at the custom-house, but by the arrival of the vessel in the United States, or within the limits of some place in the United States designated by law. Whether this place be a port of entry, strictly so called, or a district, the master and owner have time given them by law within which, after such arrival, they are allowed to make their entries at the custom-house. Suppose the vessel, in this very case, had arrived at the port of Providence on the 30th day of June, at twelve o'clock, the master would be allowed until twelve o'clock the next day to make his first report to the collector, and he would not be obliged to exhibit a manifest of his cargo before 48 hours after his arrival, which would not be until the 2d day of July; and the owner or consignee is allowed 16 days, after the final report of the master, to make his entry for the purpose of paying or securing the duties. As this vessel would then have arrived before the law passed, she could not be subject to double duties, although she might not have entered at the custom-house until after the passage of the law. There is, therefore, a material distinction between importation and entry. When a vessel, bound to the United States with a cargo, has once arrived within certain known and specified limits—when she has once passed the line of demarcation fixed by law—then at least, if not before, must the goods in such vessel be considered as legally *and [112 fiscally imported, and subject to all the provisions of law relative to the security of duties upon them. The limits of a collection district are particularly designated by law. In every district there is one, and but one, port of entry, but in many of them there are several ports of delivery. These ports, however, whether of entry or delivery, have no limits fixed or designated by law.

When a vessel has arrived "within the limits "of any district of the United States" she is under the complete control of the government, and she cannot depart from such district, "unless to proceed to some more interior district," before a report or entry shall be made by the master, with the collector of some district, under the penalty of $400, and the custom-house officers and commanders of the revenue cutters are authorized to arrest and bring back any vessel attempting to depart from such district, &c. (Laws United States, vol. 4, § 29, p. 326.) The provisions of the next succeeding section, viz., section 30th, p. 327, are "that "within 24 hours after the arrival of any ship "or vessel, &c., at any port of the United "States, established by law, at which an officer "of the customs resides, the master is to make "a report of his arrival," and within 48 hours is to make a further report in writing, with a manifest of the cargo, &c. It is certain that the word "port" mentioned in this section must be applicable to a port of delivery, at which a surveyor of the customs resides, as well as to a port of entry, at which the collector of the district resides.

And, whether the master, according to this section, is obliged, within 48 hours after his arrival within the limits of a district, to make report and entry to the collector of such district, or within 48 hours after his arrival at some particular port in such district; still, after the arrival of a vessel within the limits of such district she cannot depart from the same, unless to an interior district, until the master has made a report, and exhibited a manifest of her cargo to the collector of such district. And after such manifest has been exhibited to the collector, she is not permitted to depart from such district, with the whole or any part of her cargo, either to a foreign port or to any other 113] district, until bonds are *given for the due entry and delivery of the goods, which are distined for another district, or if the goods are destined for a foreign port, that they "shall "not be landed in the United States unless due "entry thereof shall have been first made, and "the duties thereupon paid or secured to be paid, according to law." (Vide 32, 33 and 34 sections, pages 331–2–3 and 4.) If the goods are intended for exportation, they must be so reported in the manifests, and then the vessel importing them may proceed "from the dis- "trict within which such ship or vessel shall "first arrive," &c., on giving bond, as above stated (sect. 32). If the goods or any part of them are destined to any other district, the vessel in which they were brought may proceed to such other district, on such conditions as are specified in the 34th section. This section declares, "that before any ship or vessel shall de- "part from the district in which she shall first "arrive, for another district (provided such de- "parture be not within 48 hours after her "arrival within such district) with goods, &c., "brought in such ship from a foreign port or "place, &c., the master, &c., shall obtain from "the collector of the district from which she "shall be about to depart, a copy of the report "and manifest made by such master," &c. Then the word district is used, and not port; and the proviso seems to show, pretty clearly, that within 48 hours after the arrival of a vessel within a district a report and manifest must be made to the collector of such district.

And when a vessel departs with goods from one district to any other district, the master is obliged within "twenty-four hours after the "arrival of such ship within any other district, "so to make report or entry, to or with the "collector of such other district," &c., &c. (See page 335, sect. 34.) The condition of the bonds, in both cases, show that the goods are considered as imported into the district, and not into particular ports and that the bonds are given to secure the payment of the duties upon them, in case they should be landed in any other port of the United States. With regard to importation, the words of the condition are: "Whereas, the following goods, &c., im- "ported into the district of" &c. In the case of the United States v. Vowel & M'Clean, the court say the vessel must arrive at the port of entry before the duties accrued. If by an arrival at a port of *entry is meant that [114 a vessel must actually go to a port of entry as established by law, before a right to the duties can attach or an entry can be made by the master or owner, the position is believed to be incorrect; as by the 19th section of the collection law, a vessel destined to a port of delivery, in many of the districts, may go directly to such a port of delivery, without even touching at a port of entry, and the master and owner may afterwards enter the vessel and cargo, and pay or secure the duties with the collector at the port of entry in such district, without taking the vessel or cargo to such port of entry.

The provisions of all the sections of the law from the 23d to the 35th inclusive, relate principally, if not solely, to the conduct of the master, or person having charge of the vessel, with a cargo bound to the United States; and that the object of all the provisions in these sections is to ascertain the amount and kind of goods which he has imported, is to prevent their being unladen without the assent of the government.

If the vessel be owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, the master is to have a manifest of the cargo on board; a copy of this manifest must be delivered to an officer of the customs if within four leagues of the coast; a like copy must be delivered to an officer of the customs, after his arrival within the limits of any district, and a certificate of such officer is to be entered on the original manifest; the last copy is to be sent to the collector of the district in which such vessel has arrived, and the original manifest, certified by such officer, must be delivered to such collector by the master, or he must make oath that no such copy had been applied for, &c., (see 25th section, page 321–2); and the master is finally to deliver to the collector of the district under oath, a manifest containing the particulars of the cargo on board; and after this has been done by the master, the owners or consignees of goods thus imported are to come forward and pay or secure the duties upon them; and for this purpose are to make a particular entry of such parts of the cargo as are owned by or consigned to them. The form of this entry is given in the 36th sec. of the law, and is headed, by the words, "Entry of merchaudise imported by," &c.

115*] *The eomplete control of the government over the vessel, from the mouent of her arrival within auy district, is shown by the 53d section of the law, page 345. This scction provides "that it shall be lawful for the collector of any "district in which any ship or vessel may ar- "rive, and immediately ou her first coming "within such district," &c., "to put on board "such ship or vessel, whilst remaining withiu "such district, or in going from one district to "another, one or more inspectors, to examine "the cargo, &c., and to perform such other "duties," &c., "for the better seeuring the col- "lection of the duties."

4. The boud was takeu under the former impost law as stated iu the plea, aud accordingly was an explicit contract for such duties as that law imposed and no other; and whatever claim the plaintiffs may have for double duties, no more than the single duties ought to be recovered on this bond.

If any duties are to be paid on account of the imported articles, beyond the tariff established by the former impost law, they are not recoverable in this action on the bond giveu under that law; but recourse must be had to some other process for the recovery of such further duties.

The sureties (and in this case two of the defendants are sureties) will not be made liable beyond the responsibility which they expected on entering into the obligation. They expeeted to be holden for uo more than the duties under the former impost law; and the proceedings on the part of government warranted that expectation. The time of giving the bond, the district where it is taken, and the penal sum, being rather less than the amount of double duties, as now demanded, evince conclusively that the bond, with its condition, was not for double duties, but for the single duties.

Every argument which can be urged for a demand of double duties, may be urged with equal force, and far more apparent equity, to sustain some other process, in which the sureties would not be subjected to the peculiar hardship of being compelled to pay double du-116*] ties, for *which they could have no idea of being responsible when the bond was given.

This view of the case is according to the essential facts admitted by the pleadings. On the 2d of July, 1812, after the imported articles had been properly inspected, the amount of duties was ascertained and indorsed on the bond in the collector's office. The indorsement was expressed in these terms: "Amount of duties "ascertained as due, 1708 doll. 38 cents." Bond for securing the duties being required before granting a permit to land the articles from the importing vessel, a gross estimate of the amount of duties only could be made at the moment of taking the bond (see section 49, page 359–60), and that estimate was 1700 dollars, as mentioned in the conditiou.

When the articles had been duly inspected, after the permit to laud, and after return of such inspection (see page 361–2), but not before, the duties could be, and were, ascertained in the regular coursc at the collector's office. The precise amount of duties was then ascertained according to the former impost law, aud found to be 1708 dollars aud 38 cents, and was so indorsed on the bond, according to known provisions of law. Shall that indorsed amount be the measure of the demand on the boud? After the duties had been so aseertained and iudorsed on the 2d of July, if a deposit of goods (according to section 42, page 382–3) had been made for securing the amouut of the duties for which the bond had been given, what would have been the measure for determining the sufficieucy of such security? It was lawful for the collector, in lieu of sureties, to accept of a deposit of so much of the goods as should in his judgment be sufficient. And this deposit, from the nature of the case, was to be received only after the articles had been landed, and consequently after the amount of duties was regularly ascertained. The deposit, therefore, must have been for securing the specific sum of 1708 dolls. and 38 cents, and only that sum when due could, by law, be charged for duties to be paid from the proceeds of the deposited goods.

In the present case there is no question about the fairness of the proceedings at the custom-house. The *whole transaction [117 was according to the regular course of business. Whatever was uncertain in the condition of the bond was reduced to certainty by the indorsement; and the full extent of the obligation was then settled by fair agreement of the proper agent on the part of the United states. That extent, of course, would be the measure of pledges to sureties. Such extent would measure the charge for duties on the part of the consignee, who might be principal iu a bond. And if the consignee were ordered by an owner, who made the shipments abroad, to sell promptly and pay over the proceeds of sales, the whole might be completed and all accounts between them closed at a place remote from the seat of government, such as New Orleaus, before any knowledge could there be had of the act for imposing double duties. All the official information and proceedings within the district had united to assure him of freedom from all duties or customs, on paying the amount required according to the former impost law.

In such a case, to exact double duties from a consignee who had entered the goods at the custom-house, would be manifest injustice. It would operate as fraud or extortion, or both. Is it for this court to believe the legislature capable of intending such wrong?

But where is the difference in principle between such a case and the case now before the court. New Orleans is not the only district where imported articles might be sold by a consignee, or by the owner himself, under such a full conviction of being liable to single duties only, and without a possibility of just compensatiou or redress, if the government may afterwards surprise him by exacting double duties. If a liability to double duties were kuown to an owner at the time of making entry, he might choose to have the articles entered for exportation accordiug to the terms allowed by the general law relative to the collection of duties on imposts.

But this privilege might be taken away by the construction under which the double duties are demanded in the present case.

The intent of the parties gives a rule for decision in cases of contract. At the date of this 118] bond, was it mutually *intended to secure the payment of double duties? No such allegation is found in the pleadings; nor is such intention to be fairly inferred from the admitted facts. On the contrary, the intention fairly understood on each side, was to secure the payment of the single duties only as required under the former impost law. And this intention is apparent from the penal sum of the bond, with the gross estimate of duties as mentioned in the condition, and the ascertained amount of duties indorsed on the bond.

As the whole transaction at the collector's office is agreed to have been fair, the fact of that indorsement is decisive to prove, that with reference to the district where the goods were entered and delivered, no rule of duties on imposts had been made known, other than the former impost law. And the general principle of all law requires the rule to be prescribed or made known before it can be obligatory. To this principle Blackstone has reference in the first and fourth volumes of his commentaries. It is true, he has said, Ignorantia juris quod quisque tenetur scire, neminem excusat. And this he has stated as a maxim of the Roman as well as of the English law. But, according to him, the possibility of knowledge is essential to the obligation of knowing the law. To enforce any positive rule as a law, before the individual could be presumed to know it, would be alike inconsistent with public justice and civil right.

Indeed, this qualification relative to the opportunity and consequent presumption of knowledge is so essential that the statement might otherwise be questioned as deficient in accuracy. For the maxim, in terms as stated by Blackstone, is not found in the text of the Pandects indicated by his note of reference (4 Blackstone Com. p. 27), nor does that text warrant the position stated by Blackstone as a maxim, unless it be considered as applicable to the case of a law, which might be known by every one, and which, therefore, every one is holden to know, and this may be deemed the fair import of the Latin terms inwhich the position is stated. If so considered, and not otherwise, it agrees with the general doctrine of the Roman law, and is a principle of universal jurisprudence.

119*] *In relation to positive law, that principle implies the necessity of its being made known before it can impose any obligation. Positive law is a manifestation of the legislative will; and although there may be a legislative will, it does not become a law where it is not manifested.

There was no argument on the part of the United States.

February 23. Absent—TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The United States brought an action of debt against the defendants on a bond given for the payment of duties on goods imported in the brig Dover into the port of Providence.

Upon the pleadings in the court below, judgment was given in favor of the United States, and the defendants have brought the present writ of error to reverse that judgment.

The material facts are, that the brig arrived within the limits of the United States on the 30th day of June, 1812, and within the collection district of Providenee on the 1st day of July, 1812. On the 2d day of July an entry was duly made at the custom-house, and the present bond was then executed.

The principal question which has been argued is, whether on these facts the goods are liable to the payment of the double duties imposed by the act of the first day of July, 1812, ch. 112. That act provides "that an additional duty of "100 per cent. upon the permanent duties now "imposed by law, &c., shall be levied and col-"lected upon all goods, wares and merchan-"dises which shall, from and after the passing "of this act, be imported into the United States "from any foreign port or place." It is contended that this statute did not take effect until the 2d day of July; nor, indeed, until it was formally promulgated and published. We cannot yield assent to this construction. The statute was to take effect *from its passage; and[120 it is a general rule that where the computation is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act is done is to be included.

It is further contended that the importation was complete by the arrival of the vessel within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, on the thirtieth day of June. We have no difficulty in overruling this argument. To constitute an importation so as to attach the right to duties, it is necessary not only that there should be an arrival within the limits of the United States, and of a collection district, but also within the limits of some port of entry. This was expressly decided in the case of the United States v. Vowell (5 Cranch, 368).

Without, therefore, adverting to the consideration of the regularity or sufficiency of the pleadings, we are all of opinon that on the merits the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed with six per cent. damages and costs.

THE ST. LAWRENCE, WEBB, MASTER.

(M'Gregor and Penniman, Claimants.)

Absent—TODD, J.

If, upon the breaking out of a war with this country, our citizens have a right to withdraw their property from the enemy's country, it must be done within a reasonable time. Eleven months after the declaration of war is too late.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of New Hampshire, condemning the ship St. Lawrence and cargo. All the claims in this case, except those of M'Gregor and Penniman for certain parts of the cargo, were settled at the last term, and with regard to these further proof was ordered.

No further proof having been produced, the case was submitted to the court without argument.

February 25th. Absent—TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

121*] *The only claims in this case now remaining for the consideration of the court, are those of Messrs. Penniman and M'Gregor. Further proof was directed, at the last term, to be made in respect to those claims; and no additional evidence having been produced, beyond that which was then disclosed to the court, the causes have been submitted for a final decision.

In respect to the claim of Mr. Penniman, the evidence is very strong that the goods were purchased some time before the war, by his agent in Great Britain, on his sole account. They were not, however, shipped for the United States until the latter part of May, 1813.

It is not the intention of the court to express any opinion as to the right of an American citizen, on the breaking out of hostilities, to withdraw his property, purchased before the war, from an enemy country. Admitting such right to exist, it is necessary that it should be exercised with due diligence, and within a reasonable time after the knowledge of hostilities. To admit a citizen to withdraw property from an enemy country a long time after the war, under the pretense of its having been purchased before the war, would lead to the most injurious consequences, and hold out strong temptations to every species of fraudulent and illegal traffic with the enemy. To such an unlimited extent we are all satisfied that the right cannot exist. The present shipment was not made until more than eleven months had elapsed after war was declared; and we are all of opinion that it was then too late for the party to make the shipment, so as to exempt him from the penalty attached to an illegal traffic with the enemy. The consequence is, that the property of Mr. Penniman must be condemned.

And this decision is fatal, also, to the claim of Mr. M'Gregor. Independent, indeed, of this principle, there are many circumstances in the case unfavorable to the latter gentleman. In the first place, it is not pretended that the goods included in his claim were purchased before the war. In the next place, he was the projector of the present voyage, and became, as to one moiety, the charterer or purchaser of the ship.

122*] *Nearly all the cargo consisted of goods belonging (as it must now be deemed) exclusively to British merchants. He was, therefore, engaged in an illegal traffic of the most noxious nature; a traffic not only prohibited by the law of war, but by the municipal regulations of his adopted country. His whole property, therefore, embarked in such an enterprise, must alike be infected with the taint of forfeiture.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must, therefore, as to these claims, be affirmed with costs.

DRUMMOND'S ADMINISTRATORS v. MAGRUDER & CO.'S TRUSTEES.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., STORY, J., and TODD, J.

If the execution of an important exhibit of the complainant's be not admitted by the defendant in his answer, who calls upon the complainant to make full proof thereof in the court below, this court will not presume that any other proof was made than appears in the transcript of the record.

A copy of a deed from a clerk of the court without the certificate of the presiding judge that the attestation of the clerk is in due form, cannot be received as evidence in a suit in equity.

If this court reverse a decree upon a technical objection to evidence (probably not made in the court below), it will not dismiss the bill absolutely, but remand the cause to the court below for further proceedings.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the Virginia District, in a suit in chancery brought by the trustees for the creditors of W. B. Magruder & Co., against Drummond's administrators, to compel the latter to account for funds put into the hands of their intestate by W. B. Magruder & Co.

The defendants, in their answer, say they know no such firm or copartnership as Wm. B. Magruder & Co., they cannot admit it, and hope the complainants will be put to the proof of it. They have no knowledge of the deed of trust mentioned in the bill, and hope the complainants will be required to make ample proof thereof. That W. B. Magruder was largely in debt to their intestate, and they believed the funds put into his hands by Magruder were intended to be applied to that debt.

The only proof of the deed of trust appearing in the transcript of the record, was a copy certified by one Gibson, who calls himself clerk of Baltimore county, without any certificate from the presiding judge that *his attestation [123 was in due form. It purported to be an assignment of personal estate only, and was not required by the laws of Maryland to be recorded.

P. B. Key, for appellants, contended,

1. That the complainants have not shown any title to call the defendants to account.

2. That on reversal this court must dismiss the bill.

They claim as favored creditors at the expense af Drummond, who is an equally meritorious creditor of Magruder. They have no equity to be let in to new proof to make a new case.

If the court below had dismissed the bill, relief could not have been given on a bill of review, unless new evidence, not known at the time of the first trial, should have been produced. This court cannot send the cause back for a new trial; or if they can, they will not in favor of these exclusively favored creditors.

R. I. Taylor, contra.

The cause is now placed on very different ground from that on which it appeared in the court below. There the question was, whether the defendants could set-off a debt due to their intestate from W. B. Magruder, against this claim in the right of W. B. Magruder & Co.

The only question now is, whether the court below erred in giving a decree in favor of the complainants without evidence of the execution of the original deed of assignment. The court below could not have decreed in favor of the complainants, unless they had been satisfied of the execution of the deed, or the proof of its execution had been waived by the other party. This court, therefore, will presume that the execution of the deed was so proved, or the proof waived. Exhibits may be proved viva voce at the trial. It was not necessary to reduce the testimony to writing. (Harrison Ch. Prac. 403, Laws of U. S., vol. 1, p. 68; vol. 6, p. 100.) If incompetent evidence was admitted in the 124*] court below *without objection, it is no cause for reversal of the decree.

P. B. Key, in reply.

The execution of the deed was put in issue by the answer, and it ought to appear upon the record that it was proved. If the complainants have failed to put the proof upon the record it is their own fault.

The answer puts in issue the right of the complainants to sue. A copy from the record, even if properly authenticated, would not have been sufficient, because it is not such a deed as the law requires to be recorded.

February 25th. Absent—TODD, J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The appellees filed their bill on the equity side of the Circuit Court of Virginia, for the purpose of recovering a sum of money due from William Drummond to William B. Magruder & Co. To entitle themselves to sustain this suit, they allege in their bill that they are creditors and trustees of William B. Magruder & Co., by virtue of a deed of assignment annexed to the bill as part thereof. This exhibit purports to be an assignment to the complainants of all the partnership effects, debts and credits of William B. Magruder & Co., in trust for the payment of certain favored creditors of that company, amongst whom are the complainants.

The appellants filed their answer, denying any knowledge of such a copartnership as William B. Magruder & Co., and call upon the complainants to prove the same. They also deny any knowledge of the deed of trust mentioned in and annexed to the bill, and call upon the complainants to make full proof of it. To this answer there was a general replication; and the cause being heard upon these proceedings, the exhibits and examination of witnesses and the report of the master commissioner, a decree was rendered for the complainants for the sum reported to be due from the defendant to William B. Magruder & Co., from which decree the defendants appealed to this court.

125*] *The exhibit mentioned in and annexed to the bill, alleged to be an indenture of assignment from William B. Magruder & Co. to the complainants, appears to be a copy of a sealed instrument, certified to be a true copy from the records of Baltimore County Court, under the hand of William Gibson, who styles himself clerk of that court. The record contains no other evidence of the authenticity of this instrument; and the question is, whether the Circuit Court erred in decreeing upon this evidence in favor of the appellees.

The right of the appellees to bring this suit is, by their own showing, merely derivative; and, consequently, it was incumbent on them to prove by legal evidence that the deed of assignment from William B. Magruder & Co., under which they claimed this right to sue a debtor of that house, was duly executed. The answer put this matter directly in issue by denying any knowledge of the deed exhibited with the bill, and requiring full proof to be made of it. This court is not at liberty to presume that any other proof of this deed was given in the court below than what appears on the record. That proof consists in the certificate of a person who styles himself clerk of Baltimore County Court, that the paper to which his certificate is annexed is a copy of a deed taken from the records of the court of that county; but there is no such certificate as the act of Congress requires to satisfy the court that the attestation affixed to this copy is in due form. It follows that the instrument so certified cannot be noticed as a copy of a deed from William B. Magruder & Co.; and as it is the foundation of the complainants' right, the court erred in decreeing in favor of the complainants upon such defective evidence. But as this court cannot fail to perceive that the objection to the proof of this instrument is merely technical, and was probably not made at all in the Circuit Court, it would seem improper to dismiss the bill absolutely. The court is unanimous in reversing the decree; and a majority are of opinion that the cause ought to be remitted to the Circuit Court of Virginia for further proceedings to be had therein.

Decree reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

Absent—TODD, J.

The condemnation of a vessel as enemy's property, for want of a claim, cannot prejudice the claim for her cargo; but it is still competent for the claimant of the cargo to controvert the fact that the vessel was enemy's property, so far as that fact could prejudice his claim.

One claimant cannot be injured by the contumacy of another.

The holder of a bottomry bond cannot claim in a court of prize.

An American vessel sailing from England in Aug., 1812, in consequence of the repeal of the British orders in council, and compelled by dangers of the seas to put into Ireland, where she was necessarily detained until April, 1813, when she sailed again for the United States, under the protection of a British license, being captured on the voyage by an American privateer, was protected by the President's instructions of the 28th of Aug., 1812. The continuity of the voyage was not broken.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, condemning the cargo of the Mary as prize to the privateer Paul Jones.

This cause was argued at last term by Stockton and Pinkney for the claimants, and J. Woodward for the captors (ante, vol. 8, p. 388), when leave was given by this court for further proof, by affidavits, on the following points:

1. As to the citizenship of N. J. Visscher.

2. As to the names of the other heirs of General Fisher, who are interested in the property; the place of their residence, and their national character.

3. As to the time when N. J. Visscher went to England; the object he had in view in going thither; how long he resided there; when the cargo was purchased; and when he returned to the United States.

4. As to the instructions which the Paul Jones had on board at the time of the capture of the Mary; and particularly whether the President's instruction of the 28th of August, 1812, had been delivered to the captain, or had come to his knowledge, at the time of the capture; or whether the Paul Jones had been in port after the 28th of August, 1812, and before the capture.

The captors also had leave to make further proof as to the same points.

The further proof now offered consisted of the affidavits of the claimant, N. J. Visscher, Jacob S. Pruyn, and David Gelston, collector of the customs for the port of New York. The affidavit of N. J. Visscher stated, in substance, that he, and sundry other persons (whose names and places of residence are mentioned, and who are all citizens and residents of the United 127] States) are *the sole heirs at law and personal representatives of the late General Garret Fisher, who died in London intestate. That he, in behalf of himself, and as agent for the other heirs, went to England (having first obtained leave from the war department, he being a military officer in the service of the United States) in consequence of an agreement between him and the other heirs, dated June 19th, 1811, (which original agreement is annexed to the affidavit). He arrived in England on the 22d of August, 1811, and obtained letters of administration on the estate of General Fisher, collected the effects, converted them into cash, paid the debts, and was prepared to remit the balance to the United States long before the war was known in England; and was waiting for a favorable opportunity of investing the same in property that could be advantageously sent to the United States, the balance of exchange being then greatly against him, and not being able to invest the whole in United States' stock. That as soon as the revocation of the English orders in council took place, supposing that it would be followed by the repeal of the non-importation law of the United States, he gave orders for the purchase of British goods to nearly the whole amount of the balance remaining in his hands, which purchase, including the goods now in question, was made by Harmon Visger, his agent, before the war was known in England, who caused them to be sent to Bristol to be shipped, where they arrived in July and August; whence they were shipped early in August on board the American brig Mary. That the goods were the sole property of the claimant, for himself and the other heirs of General Fisher. That he left England as soon as his business was settled, and arrived in the United States on the 19th of October, 1812.

The affidavit of Mr. Pruyn confirms that of Mr. Visscher, as to the residence and citizenship of the claimant and the others interested in the cargo.

The affidavit of Mr. Gelston states the fact that a copy of the President's instruction of the 28th of August, 1812, was given to the commander of the Paul Jones before she sailed on the cruise in which she captured the Mary.

No further proof was offered on the part of the captors.

Stockton*, for the claimant, [*128

After reading the further proof offered by the claimant, said he should rest the case, in the opening, upon the argument formerly made.

J. Woodward, for the captors,

Was directed by the court to show wherein this case differs from that of The Thomas Gibbons, decided at last term, upon the effect of the President's instruction of the 28th of August, 1812.

Woodward. The Thomas Gibbons was an American vessel and sailed so early as to be presumed to have sailed in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council. But we contend that the Mary, sailing from Ireland, under a British license, as late as April, 1813 (which license was obtained for the vessel and cargo by a British subject in his own name), and laden with British goods, must be taken to be a British vessel, and not as sailing in consequence of the repeal of the British orders in council, within the meaning of the instruction of the 28th of August. But the fact that the vessel has not been claimed is clear proof that she was British.

The voyage from Ireland in April, 1813, as far as respects those instructions, is a voyage de novo, whatever it may be considered to be upon more general principles of law.

The intent of these instructions was to protect American vessels and their cargoes, sailing from England under the impression that the repeal of the orders in council would have been followed by a repeal of our non-importation law, and a cessation of hostilities; but not to protect vessels sailing with a full knowledge that those consequences had not, and probably would not follow the repeal of the orders in council. At the time the Mary sailed all such expectations had ceased. The instructions are derogatory to the rights of war, and the party wishing to protect himself thereby must bring himself strictly within their meaning and intent. The vessel and cargo were safe at Waterford, and the political relation between the two countries was then well understood. There was *no necessity of her sailing from thence; [129 she knew that the war was raging with increased violence.

The new license, although it refers to the old one, bears a very different character. The old one was innocent because it was not then the license of a belligerent, and did not give a belligerent character to what it protected; but the new had all the characters of a belligerent license, notwithstanding its connection with the old. When she sailed she knew, or might have know and taken warning by the act of Congress of the 2d of January, 1813, which extends the protection of the instructions only to vessels sailing before the 15th of September, 1812. The instructions merge in, or are controlled by, the provisions of that act. A vessel could not be protected by the instructions unless she sailed not only in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, but before the 15th of September, 1812.

The necessity for a new license shows that it was a new voyage. She was obliged to take new papers and a new clearanee. But if a voyage be legal in its eommencement, and before it be finished beeome illegal, and the party has an opportunity to put an end to it, he is bound to do so. The prosecution of the voyage, after a knowledge of its illegality, and after an opportunity given to abandon it, must be considered as placing the party in delicto.

If this property was purchased after knowledge of the war had reached England, it is liable to condemnation. The invoices are dated the 13th of August, and the war was know in Liverpool on the 18th of July. By the order for further proof, the claimant is ealled upon to prove the time when the cargo was purehased. No such proof is offered. The affidavit of Mr. Visseher, if it could be considered as proof, does not state the time, but merely states in general terms that the purehase was made before the war was known in England. This is not sueh proof as the order requires. The proof of the fact, if it exist, is in England; why has it not been obtained? It is the most material fact in the case. The voluntary affidavit of the party himself, who is so deeply interested in the eause, cannot be evidence. At the last term the court 130] *wanted further evidenee of that faet. They have not obtained it, nor is it shown that it was out of the power of the elaimant to produee it. It was in his power. But it was not in our power to produce evidenee of the contrary. It is not probable that the witnesses would have eonsented to a voluntary examination on our part, and we had no means to eompel them to testify. We rely upon this defeet of evidence.

Emmett, on the same side.

The condemnation of the vessel is final and conelusive, there being no appeal. Part of the eargo is in the same eondition; 160 bundles of steel, worth about $1,000, are unelaimed, and of eourse no appeal was taken and they belong to the libelants. N. J. Visscher filed two elaims, and therefore had time to rectify the mistake if any were made.

It is elear, therefore, that there were articles on board which did not belong to N. J. Visscher, and that he intended to diselaim eertain parts of the cargo.

This ease is not within the reason of the decision in the case of The Thomas Gibbons. The intention of the instructions was to exempt the property from capture, not to give it an entire immunity. This eould be done only by the legislative power. The object of the instruetions was to suspend the prize act in this particular until the legislature could interfere. In the case of The Thomas Gibbons, this court, in delivering its opinion, has conneeted the instructions with the act of Congress of 2d January, 1813, and seems to hold out the idea that the time of sailing of a vessel must be limited to the 15th of September in order to be protected by the instruetions. The act of Congress had made that definite which the instructions had left undefined. If the instructions and the aet are not thus to be connected and eonstrued together; there is no time limited, and a vessel may at any period of the war bc proteeted by those instructions.

Does this vessel comc within those instructions? Is she a vessel owned by citizens of the United States? She has been condemned as enemy's property. From that sentence there has been no appeal. It is conclusive.

*But although that objeetion seems [131 conclusive, yet there is a still stronger ground of condemnation. She did not sail from Waterford until nine months after war was declared. Here was ample time for eountermanding her voyage after knowing that the repeal of the orders in eouncil would not produce a cessation of hostilities. Can such a ease be proteeted by the instructions.

The further proof furnishes irresistible evidence of trading with the enemy. The order for further proof eall for cvidenee of the national charaeter of Visseher, and those interested with him in the elaim, and of the time when the goods were purchased, as well as with regard to the question whether the instructions were on board the privateer. It is clear, therefore, that the eourt were not then satisfied as to any of those points.

No further eompetent evidence has been produced as to the time of purehase. The court will not reeeive as proof the affidavit of the interested party himself, when it is elear that better evidenee must have been in his power. Why did he not produee the affidavit of his agent who made the purehases, or the bills of pareels, whieh he must have in his possession, by which to settle with the other heirs? These bills of pareels also would have shown whether other parts of the cargo, as well as the 160 bundles of steel, did not belong to Harman Visger.

But this was a clear case of trading. Visscher was only to collect and remit the proceeds of the estate. Instead of which he goes to trading with it for his own benefit, not that of the heirs. By undertaking to ship goods he took the risk on himself, and, if lost, he must account to the other heirs.

It is immaterial, however, whether the goods were purchased before or after knowedge of the war. (8. T. R. 556, the ease of St. Philip eited in Potts and Bell, from the MS. notes of Sir E. Simpson.)

LIVINGSTON, J. Was not this point settled in the ease of The Rapid?

Emmett. I think it was; but lest it should not *have been, I refer the court to the [132 ease of The Juffrow Louisa Margaretha (1 Rob., 170, Amer. Ed.), cited in the case of The Hoop (1 Rob., 177); The Eenigheid, (1 Rob., 178), The Fortuna, (1 Rob., 181), Sir William Scott's judgment in The Hoop, where he does not allow an excuse either of convenience or necessity. A license from the government of the United States ought to have been obtained for the Mary, or the voyage abandoned. (1 Rob., 180, The William.)

A distinction is attempted to be taken between this ease and that of The Rapid. It is said this vessel was in motion.

If a vessel has been in motion so far that there is no opportunity of countermanding the voyage, this distinction might be relied upon. But here there was time for countermanding. Upon this point see again the case of The Fortuna. When was the Mary in motion? War was published in London on the 26th of July. This vessel did not begin to load till August, and did not sail from Bristol till three weeks after knowledge of the war. N. J. Visscher himself was present and might have countermanded the voyage, which is a circumstance of great importance. (5 Rob., 142, Eng. Ed., Juffrow Catharina.)

STORY, J. The case of The Rapid differs from this. She went from this country to that of the enemy after knowledge of the war.

Emmett. As to the Rapid, the condemnation was owing to the presence of Harrison, who might have countermanded the voyage, but did not. Whether the party be in the country at the time of the breaking out of the war, or goes there afterward, is immaterial; in each case he is equally bound to countermand the voyage. The present case, therefore, is precisely that of The Rapid.

But N. J. Visscher was in England long after the Mary put into Waterford. He did not leave England till the 7th of September; the Mary arrived at Waterford in August. He knew that the vessel must remain there till the spring, and that she could not arrive in the United 133] *States until nearly a year after the declaration of war. Why did he not apply to the United States for a license?

The sailing from Waterford was a new voyage. We are to consider the transaction, not in a commercial point of view, but as it is affected by public policy and national law. To every belligerent purpose it was a voyage de novo. It is not protected by the act of Congress of 2d January, 1813. That act requires that the vessel should have sailed before the 15th of September, 1812, and should have sailed in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council. The act has no prospective view. Visscher knew that it did not protect this vessel. He traded at his peril. (1 Rob., 181, The Hoop.)

But if, contrary to expectations, this property should be restored, we trust it will be with costs. There was no proof of property on board. She was found sailing with a British license dated long after the war was known. She had sailed long after the 15th of September, and did not appear by any documents on board to be within the President's instructions of the 28th of August, 1812. It is not usual to give costs after an order for further proof. If the papers withheld had been produced, it is probable a great deal more of the property would be found to belong, to Harman Visger.

Pinkney, in reply.

It is said that Mr Visscher had been trading, for his own benefit, upon the funds he received. There is no foundation for such an assertion. The letters of Harman Visger, and all the documents, show that the goods were purchased and shipped for the joint benefit of all the heirs. He did the best for the interest of all concerned, according to his judgment, and agreeably to the agreement of the parties, which contemplates and provides for the case of his beiug obliged to remit goods, and binds him to cause them to be insured.

Two questions arise in this case:

1. Was the Mary the property of an American citizen?

134*] *2. If so, was she, when captured, sailing in consequence of the repeal of the British orders in council?

1. Was the Mary the property of an American citizen?

All the documentary evidence shows that she was.

But it is contended that she was the property of one Smith, a Scotchman, and this assertion depends upon the evidence of the cook, who says he believed it because Smith ordered the men about. But it appears that this cook was shipped just as the vessel sailed.

It is said also that the ship, not having been claimed, was condemned, and no appeal has been prayed, which shows conclusively that she was British property.

The reason why she was not claimed appears in the evidence. She was hypothecated for more than she was worth. If lost by capture the owner is not personally liable, but if he should claim, and the vessel should be restored, he would be liable for the amount of the bottomry bond. Visscher, who held the bond, could not claim in his own name, for it has been decided that such a lien on the ship will not support a claim, and he could not use the name of the owner without his consent, which he would certainly not give to impose a liability on himself. It was his interest to make it a total loss. A sentence of condemnation founded upon the want of claim accounted for in such a manner, cannot surely be conclusive evidence that the ship was not bona fide owned by an American citizen.

2. Was she sailing in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council?

This voyage unquestionably had its inception in consequence of that repeal. We think this case falls precisely within the principles decided in that of The Thomas Gibbons. But it is said that the deviation to Waterford makes it a new voyage. That this was a continuation of the voyage at the common law, is admitted; but not in a court of prize. Why should there, in this respect, be a difference between the law merchant and the law of *nations? We [135 contend that the law of nations, being more enlarged, is less rigid than the law merchant.

But as to prize law, the English courts of prize always connect voyages of this kind. Continuity is the favorite doctrine of a prize court. The British courts of prize, on the subject of contraband of war, seem to have been enamored of this doctrine of continuity; they condemn vessels returning with the proceeds of contraband; thereby making the homeward voyage the outward voyage, and the proceeds of contraband the contraband itself.

But it is said that this vessel was bound on an illegal voyage, and therefore cannot plead distress. She acted on the belief that the repeal of the orders in council would produce peace, as all others did, and if she was in error, communis error facit jus.

The President's instructions and the act of Congress go on the ground that this error was excusable.

This vessel is within the benefit of the maxim actus Dei nemini facit injuriam. She would certainly have been protected by that maxim if she had been all that time driven about the Atlantic by storms and contrary winds; and her case is still the same; she was still in itinere. It is said that the instructions were a substitute for a legislative act, and that the act of Congress has superseded the instructions. This we do not admit. They may both stand together—their objects are different.

But we are referred to the policy of the instructions, and it is said that this vessel was not within that policy. The adventure was undertaken in the belief that the war would cease; the going to Waterford and the detention there were nccessary to the prosecution of the voyage.

But it is said there was locus penitentiæ. That Visscher knew how long the vessel would be detained there, and therefore ought to have abandoned the voyage. There is no evidence of that fact if it were material. But if he did know it, he kuew also that the voyage was innocent in its inception, and that its continuity could not be broken by this necessary deviation.

136*] *As to his obtaining a second British license, it was necessary; he could not leave Waterford without it. It was not a voluntary act. He acted under a vis major. The second license was only a renewal of the first; if he had authority to go at all, he might lawfully use the means. After his return to the United States, he did not apply for an American license becausc he was daily expecting the arrival of the Mary; besides, he knew that she was protected by the President's instructions.

The opposite argument is raised upon the supposition that she must not only commence her voyage under an impression that war had ceased, but must continue under the same impression during the whole voyage. Must she return, if, in the midst of the Atlantic, she is undeceived?

The voyage was commenced under a belief that war had ceased, and was continued under the impression that she would be protected by the instructions of the President. Although there was war between the United States and Great Britain, yet there was peace betweeu the United States and this adventure. This case, in principle, is exactly that of The Thomas Gibbons.

But we are accused of not having produced sufficient further proof of the proprietary interest in the cargo and the time of purchase. They say the only evidenee is the affidavit of N. J. Visscher—testis in propria causa. Such testimony is, and always must be, admitted in prize causes. N. J. Visscher is a man of fair character. But his testimony was matter of supererogation. Every document and paper showed before that the property was American.

But they say that as we undertook to furnish further proof we ought to have done so—that we were in possession of the bills of parcels and ought to have produced them. The fact is not so, nor can it, in the nature of commercial transactions, be so. We had the invoices, but not the bills of parcels; they were the vouchers of Harman Visger, who made the purchases; they remained in England and it could not be expected that we should send there for them. N. J. Visscher has produced his test affidavit, which is all that could be expected.

137*] *But there is an objection to the omission to claim 160 bundles of steel. By a comparison of the ship's papers with the claim it will be found that he meant to claim, and did claim, the whole of the cargo. The omission of this item was by mistake.

The rule that every trading with an enemy subjects to confiscation, will not, I trust, be sanctioned by this court.

All the esseutial parts of this transaction took place in peace, or in imagined peace. The rulc of trading with an enemy is not absolutely inexorable. See the case of The Madonna del Gracie, and the principles stated by Sir W. Scott in The Hoop. The danger of treasonable intercourse is the ground of the rule. But here was no such danger. Another ground of condemnation of goods is said to be their adherence to the enemy. But here, instead of adhering to the enemy, the goods were withdrawu by the earliest opportunity. It was certainly for the interest of the United States that the goods should be withdrawn from the power of the enemy. But it is said that it was contrary to his allegiance. Is it contrary to his allegiance to do that, the forbearance of which would be for the advantage of the enemy? Why should we give a new face of terror to the principles of war?

The case of The Rapid was essentially different. There was opportunity for treasonable intercourse. She sailed from this country after the war was declared. Let not the rule be made an iron rule. It has been carried far enough. There is not a shadow of authority for condemnation in a case like this, where a mere remittance of funds acquired before the war was intended to be made at the first knowledge of the war.

All the cases cited against us are to be found in the case of The Hoop, except one referred to in Potts and Bell. Not one of them includes the present case. 1. The Ringende Jacob was a clear case of mercantile trading in open war. 2. The Lady Jane. This case is relied upon because the cargo was the produce of goods sent to Spain before the war. But the commercial adventure was planned aud concocted during the war. 3. *The Deergarden [138 of Stockholm was a case of trade with the enemy wholly originating during war. 4. The Elizabeth of Ostend was another clear case of trading during war. 5. The Juffrouw Louisa Margaretha. According to the statement of this case in Bosanquet and Puller (Escott's case), part of the goods were purchased long after the war had broken out, and the adventure was projected in the heat of the war. One part of the cargo was considered as infected by the other. The St. Louis or El Allessandro. In that case the goods were shipped in the midst of the war, and were bound to the port of au enemy. 7. In the case of The Compte de Wohronzoff, the goods were shipped long after the existence and knowledge of the war, and in the regular prosecution of trade. 8. So in The Expedite von Rotterdam, the exportation of goods was from the enemy's country in the midst of the war. 9. In the case of The Bella Guidita, the voyage was direct to an enemy country with provisions. 10. In The Eenigheid, the voyage was to, not from, the enemy's country, and was after the knowledge of the war. In that case there might be treasouable intercourse, but here there could be none. 11. The Fortuna was the case of a voyage to the enemy's country, which might have been countermaudcd after knowledge of the war. 12. In the case of The Freeden, the voyage was also to an enemy's port after notice of the war. 13. In The William, which is a case much relied on by the opposite counsel, it appears in 8 T. R., 560, that the sugars in question were received by the British merchant's agent from the enemy, after the war broke out, and were received in the course of a general trade, which is the feature that distinguishes this case of The Mary from all that have been cited.

The claimants in those cases were general merchants in the regular prosecution of their trade; but ours is a single case of accidental remittance of funds, constituting no part of a general trade. To this long list of cases Sir John Nicholl, in Potts and Bell (8 T. R., 556), has added one more: The St. Philip, in 1747, where the lords refused evidence that the goods were bought before the war, being of opinion that the effects of British subjects taken trading with the enemy are good prize. This is certainly a hard case. It is very briefly stated; none of the particular circumstances being men-
139*] tioned. *It does not appear how long after the breaking out of the war the goods were shipped, which would be a very important consideration in the innocence or guilt of the transaction.

This court, it is presumed, will not push the law of war to its utmost extent, and certainly not further than it has been extended by the English courts.

As to costs. If the Mary was within the President's instructions, the captors are not entitled to costs and expenses.

STORY, J. When further proof has been ordered, are not costs and expenses to be allowed of course?

Pinkney, I think not.

February 25th. Absent—TODD., J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Nanning J. Visscher, an American citizen, administrator of General Garret Fisher, deceased, went to Great Britain in the year 1811, for the purpose of collecting the estate of the said General Garret Fisher in that country, and remitting it to the United States for those who were entitled to it by law. Immediately after the repeal of the orders in council, the said Nanning J. Visscher invested a considerable portion of the funds of the said estate in British merchandise, and engaged the brig Mary, a vessel having an American register, to convey it to the United States. The Mary was engaged at Woolwich and came round to Bristol, where her cargo was procured. She began to take it on board on the 3d of August, 1812; and on the 15th of August, having completed her lading, she sailed from the port of Bristol for the United States, having on board a British license dated on the 8th of July, 1812. While prosecuting her voyage she encountered such severe weather, and received such damage, as to be under the necessity, in order to avoid the danger of foundering at sea, to put into the port of Waterford, in Ireland, for the purpose of being repaired. While lying in 140*] Waterford *and undergoing repairs, she was also detained by a general embargo, imposed on all American vessels in the ports of Great Britain. The Mary, being released, by the High Court of Admiralty, and her repairs being completed, her license was renewed on the 27th of March, 1813, and she sailed from Waterford for Newport, in Rhode Island, on the 7th of the following month. On the 22d day of April she was captured by the American privateer Paul Jones, Captain Taylor, and brought into Newport, Rhode Island, where the vessel and cargo were libeled as enemy property. No claim being put in for the vessel, she was condemned; but the cargo, which was claimed by Nanning J. Visscher, for himself and the other heirs of General Fisher, was restored. From this sentence the captors appealed. In the Circuit Court the sentence of the District Court was reversed and the cargo was condemned. From this sentence of condemnation an appeal was taken to this court, and the case was argued at the last term.

The President's instructions of the 28th of August, 1812, were then for the first time relied on, but it was not admitted on the part of the captors that these instructions were known to Captain Taylor. For the ascertainment of this important fact it was necessary to admit further proof.

It being uncertain how this fact would appear, the court also directed further proof on other points which were involved in some degree of doubt.

It is now proved incontestibly that the instructions of the 28th of August were on board the Paul Jones at the time of the capture. These additional instructions direct "the public and private armed vessels of the United "States not to intercept any vessels belonging "to citizens of the United States, coming from "British ports to the United States, laden with "British merchandise, in consequence of the "alleged repeal of the British orders in council."

The effect and operation of these instructions were settled in the case of The Thomas Gibbons. The only inquiry to be made in this case is, do they apply to the Mary?

*To sustain their application it must [141 appear,

1. That the Mary belonged, at the time of capture, to a citizen of the United States.

2. That she was coming from a British port to the United States, laden with British merchandise, in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council.

1. Was the Mary the property of an American citizen?

She carried an American register, which represented her as the property of James B. Kennedy, a citizen of the United States.

She sailed from Charleston, in South Carolina, as an American vessel, commanded by Captain Stafford, a native American citizen, who continued to command her until her capture, and who always supposed her to be the property of Mr. Kennedy. Her first license, which was granted before intelligence of the declaration of war had reached England, was granted to her as an American vessel; and in the renewed license she was still considered as an American vessel.

In opposition to this testimony is the deposition of one of the mariners, who supposes one Smith, a British subject, to be a part owner of the Mary, because the captain so informed him, and because Smith ordered the people about as much as Mr. Kennedy or the captain.

So much of this deposition as refers to the information of the captain is not very probable; and, if true, must either discredit the captain's testimony, or be considered as a communication made for some particular purpose while the vessel was in a British port. That part of it which states Smith to have ordered the people about as much as Mr. Kennedy, is not very intelligible, since Mr. Kennedy, the owner of the Mary, does not appear to have been on board the vessel, or at Bristol, or at Waterford.

142*] *Had a claim been put in for the Mary, this testimony, opposed to the proof furnished by the register and the deposition of the captain, would have been light indeed.

But no claim was filed for the Mary, and she was consequently, according to the course of the Court of Admiralty, condemned as enemy property.

This sentence is now relied on by the captors as establishing the fact. The argument has been pressed with great earnestness, and is certainly entitled to serious consideration.

The conclusive effect which the captors would give to this sentence is founded in part on reasoning which is technical, and in part on the operation which the fact itself ought to have on the human mind in producing a conviction that the claim was not filed because it could not be sustained.

A sentence of a court of admiralty is said not only to bind the subject matter on which it is pronounced, but to prove conclusively the facts which it asserts. This principle has been maintained in the courts of England, particularly as applying to cases of insurance, and has been adopted by this court in the case of Croudson and others v. Leonard. Its application to the case at bar will be considered.

The Mary was not condemned by the sentence of a foreign court of admiralty in a case prior to and distinct from that in which the cargo was libeled. She was comprehended in the same libel with the cargo.

The whole subject formed but one cause, and the whole came on together before the same judge. By the rules of the court the condemnation of the vessel was inevitable; not because in fact she was British property, but because the fact was charged and was not repelled by the owner, he having failed to appear and to put in his claim. The judge could not close his eyes on this circumstance; nor could he, in common justice, subject the cargo, which was claimed according to the course of the court, to the liabilities incurred by being 143*] *imported in a hostile bottom. In the same cause, a fact, not controverted by one party, who does not appear, and therefore as to him taken for confessed, ought not, on that implied admission, to be brought to bear upon another who does appear, does controvert, and does disprove it. The owners of the cargo had no control over the owner of the vessel. Visscher could not force Kennedy to file a claim; nor could Visscher file a claim for him.

The evidence that the vessel was American property could not be looked into so far as respected the rights of Kennedy, because he was in contumacy; but Visscher was not in contumacy. He was not culpaple for, and therefore ought not to suffer for, the contumacy of Kennedy. That contumacy, in reason and in justice, ought not to have prevented the District Court from looking into the testimony concerning proprietary interest in the vessel, so far as the rights of other claimants depended on that interest. Nor is the court informed of a legal principle which should have restrained the district judge from looking into this testimony. If we reason from analogy we find no principle adopted by the courts of law or equity which, in its application to courts of admiralty, would seem to subject one claimant to injury from the contumacy of another.

A judgment against one defendant for the want of a plea, or a decree against one defendant for want of an answer, does not prevent any other defendant from contesting, so far as respects himself, the very fact which is admitted by the absent party.

No reason is perceived why a different rule should prevail in a court of admiralty, nor is the court informed of any case in which a different rule has been established.

If the District Court was not precluded by the non-claim of the owner of the vessel from examining the fact of ownership, so far as that fact could affect the cargo, it will not be contended that an appellate court may not likewise examine it.

This case is to be distinguished from those which *have been decided on policies [144 of insurance, not only by the circumstance that the cause respecting the vessel and the cargo came on at the same time before the same court, but by other differences in reason and in law, which appear to be essential.

The decisions of a court of exclusive jurisdiction are necessarily conclusive on all other courts, because the subject matter is not examinable in them. With respect to itself no reason is perceived for yielding to them a further conclusiveness than is allowed to the judgments and decrees of courts of common law and equity. They bind the subject-matter as between parties and privies.

The whole world, it is said, are parties in an admiralty cause; and, therefore, the whole world is bound by the decision. The reason on which this dictum stands will determine its extent. Every person may make himself a party, and appeal from the sentence; but notice of the controversy is necessary in order to become a party, and it is a principle of natural justice, of universal obligation, that before the rights of an individual be bound by a judicial sentence, he shall have notice, either actual or implied, of the proceedings against him. Where these proceedings are against the person, notice is served personally, or by publication; where they are in rem, notice is served upon the thing itself. This is necessarily notice to all those who have any interest in the thing, and is reasonable because it is necessary, and because it is the part of common prudence for all those who have any interest in it, to guard that interest by persons who are in a situation to protect it. Every person, therefore, who could assert any title to the Mary, has constructive notice of her seizure, and may fairly be considered as a party to the libel. But those who have no interest in the vessel which could be asserted to in the Court of Admiralty, have no notice of her seizure, and can, on no principle of justice or reason, be considered as parties in the cause so far as respects the vessel. When such person is brought before a court in which the fact is examinable, no sufficient reason is perceived for precluding him from re-examining it. The judgment of a court of common law, or the decree of a court of equity, would, 145*] under such *circumstances, be re-examinable in a court of common law, or a court of equity; and no reasou is discerned why the sentence of a court of admiralty, under the same circumstances, should not be re-examinable in a court of admiralty.

This reasoning is uot at variance with the decision that the scnteuce of a foreign court of admiralty, condemning a vessel or cargo as enemy property, is conclusive in an action against the underwriters on a policy in which the property is warranted to be neutral.

It is not at variance with that decision, because the question of prize is oue of which courts of law have no direct cognizance, and because the owners of the vessel and cargo were parties to the libel against them.

In the case of Croudson et al. v. Leonard, two judges expressed their opinions. Those who were silent, but who concurred in the opinion of the court, undoubtedly acquiesced in the reasons assigned by those judges. On the conclusiveness of a foreign sentence, Judge Johnson said: "The doctrine appears to me to rest "on three very obvious considerations: the pro- "priety of leaving the cognizance of prize ques- "tions exclusively to courts of prize jurisdic- "tion; the very great inconvenienee, amount- "ing nearly to an impossibility, of fully in- "vestigating such cases in a court of common "law; and the impropriety of revising the de- "cisions of the maritime courts of other nations, "whose jurisdiction is co-ordinate throughout "the world."

These reasons undoubtedly support the opinion founded on them; but it will be readily perceived that they would not apply to the case before the court.

After stating the conclusiveness of the sentence of courts of exclusive jurisdiction, Judge Washington said: "This rule, when applied to "the sentences of courts of admiralty, whether "foreign or domestic, produces the doctrine "which I am now considering, upon the ground "that all the world are parties in an admiralty "cause. The proceedings are in rem; but any "person having an interest in the property "may interpose a claim, or may prosecute an 146] "appeal from the sentence. *The in- "sured is emphatically a party, and in every "instanee has an opportunity to controvert the "alleged grounds of condemnation, by proving, "if he can, the neutrality of the property. The "master is his immediate agent, and he is also "bound to act for the benefit of all concerned; "so that in this respect he also represents the "insurer."

The very foundation of this opinion that the insured is bound by the sentcnce of condemnation is, that he was in law a party to the suit, and had a full opportunity to assert his rights. This decision cannot be applicable to one in which the person to be affected by the sentence of condemnation was not, and could not be, a party to it.

If the sentence condemning the Mary did not technically preclude the owners of the cargo from asserting in the court of admiralty her American character, the weight of the evidence on that point is to be fairly estimated.

In support of her American character, the documentary evidence is complete and unequivocal; and the corroborative testimony is calculated to strengthen a belief in the verity of the register. In support of her hostile character the omission of the owner to file his claim is chiefly relied on. The importance of this circumstance is not to be controverted. Its weight, however, is much diminished by the consideration that the case affords no reasonable ground for believing that the owner could have been restrained from making his claim by the apprehension of failing to support it. There is no testimony, and there is no reason to suspect that any testimony was attainable, which could have successfully opposed the register. This consideration gives plausibility to the argument that the worthlessness of the vessel, the bottomry bond with which she was charged, the expectation that the condemnation would relieve him from that debt, might be the motives for not resisting that condemnation. It is possible, too, that in point of fact he might not have actual notice of the proceedings. This is not to be presumed, and is not to benefit the owner; but it is possible, and may be taken into the *account in estimating the effect [147 of this negligence on persons who are not culpable for it.

It has been said that the owners of the cargo, and that Nanning J. Visscher, who held the bottomry bond, ought to have filed a claim. But the interest under the bottomry bond could not have been asserted; nor had the owners of the cargo any right to the vessel. Had they known that they were to be, in any manner, affected by the character of the vessel, they might, and most probably would, have exerted themselves to have brought forward Kennedy as a claimant, or to have accounted for his silence; but in the District Court the President's instructions were unknown, and their effect unthought of. The owners of the cargo, therefore, neither troubled themselves about the vessel nor attempted to account for the claim to her not being filed. When afterwards in this court the bearing of those instructions was discovered, and further proof was directed, that direction did not extend to proof which might account for the failure of Kennedy to assert his title to the vessel. This may excuse the claimants for not producing testimony to that point.

Upou the best consideration we have been able to bestow upon the subject. the court is of opinion that the Mary, in this claim, must be deemed to have been the property of an American citizen.

2. Did she sail from a British port in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council?

That the voyage in its inception was produced by the opinion that the repeal of the British orders in council would terminate the differences between the two nations, is too clear for controversy. Had the Mary proceeded directly from Bristol to her port of destination in the United States, the counsel for the captors would not contend that it was not a voyage described by the instructions of the 28th of August. But the delay in the port of Waterford, it is said, has broken the continuity of the voyage, and in deciding on its character, the departure from Waterford, not the departure from Bristol, must be considered as its commencement.

148*] *It is not denied that, in a commercial sense, this is one continued voyage, to take its date at the departure of the Mary from Bristol. But it is urged that where the rights of war intervene, a different construction must take place.

The court does not accede to the correctness of this distinction.

The Mary was forced into Waterford by irresistible necessity, and was detained there by the operation of causes she could not control. Had her departure been from a neutral port, and she had been thus forced, during the voyage, into a hostile port, would it be alleged that she had incurred the liabilities of a vessel sailing from a port of the enemy? It is believed that this allegation could not be sustained, and that it would not be made. But as between the captors and the captured in this case, the voyage was, in its commencement, as innocent as if made from a friendly port. The detention at Waterford, then, can no more affect the character of the voyage in the one case than in the other.

But it is said that the owners of the cargo ought to have applied to the American government for a license to bring it into the United States.

So far as respects the captors, there could be no necessity for a license, since the vessel was already protected from them by the orders of the President under which they sailed; and for any other purpose a license was unnecessary, provided the importation, if the voyage had been immediate and direct from Bristol, could be justified.

If a cargo be innocently put on board in an enemy country, if at that time it be lawful to import it into the United States, the importation cannot be rendered unlawful by a detention occasioned, in the course of the voyage, either by the perils of the sea or the act of the enemy, unless this effect be produced by some positive act of the legislature.

There is no such act.

149*] *It has been contended that the act for the remission of fines, penalties and forfeitures in certain cases, passed on the 2d of January, 1813, controls the instructions given by the President on the 28th of August, 1812, and limits the operation of those instructions to the specific cases described by Congress; and as that act protects only those importations which were made previous to its passage, it has been argued that the President's instructions can go no further.

Independent of the war, all British merchandise was excluded from the ports of the United States by a system of policy supposed to have been founded on the British orders in council.

The Secretary of the Treasury had power to remit forfeitures incurred under these laws. When the orders in council were repealed, large shipments were made of British merchandise by American merchants, in the full confidence that the American restrictive system would fall with the orders which produced it. This opinion and the proceedings in consequence of it, were thought excusable both by the executive and legislative departments of government. The President instructed the cruisers of the United States not to molest vessels of this description, "but, on the contrary, to give aid and assistance "to the same; in order that such vessels and "their cargoes may be dealt with on their ar"rival, as may be decided by the competent "authorities."

These instructions act solely on the rights of war, and regulate the conduct of the public and private armed vessels of the United States.

The legislature passed an act on the 2d of January, 1813, taking away the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and directing him absolutely to remit all penalties and forfeitures incurred by violating the non-intercourse laws, in all cases of importation made before the passage of the act, in American vessels, provided the goods were the property of citizens of the United States, and the vessels departed from any port of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland between the 23d day of June and the 15th of September then preceding.

*This act does not contemplate the [150 conduct of captors, or the rights of war. Its sole object is to remit certain penalties already incurred by a violation of municipal law. The legislature does not appear to have had in view the instructions given by the President to the armed vessels of the United States, much less to have intended to control those instructions.

But, in effecting these different objects, the executive and the legislature were impelled by the same motive—the peculiar hardship of exposing the citizens of the United States in such a case to the penalties either of war or of municipal law. The one intended to protect from capture, the other from forfeiture, property which had been shipped in the reasonable confidence that peace and commercial intercourse between the two countries were the fruits of the repeal of the British orders in council. The President recognized the principle, but left the time within which it should operate to be decided by the armed vessels and by the courts, according to the circumstances of each case. The legislature prescribed certain limits within which it should operate. This court, in construing the less explicit instructions of the President, with respect to the departure of a vessel from a British port, has respected the more explicit language of the legislature on the same subject. But the instructions of the President relate only to the departure of the vessel. They do not extend to the time of its arrival. In this respect there is nothing to be explained. Consequently the act of Congress can furnish no aid in their construction. That the instructions were intended to protect from capture all vessels which had sailed in that confidence which was inspired by the repeal of the British orders in council, however the voyage might be protracted, is apparent from their language, and from the fact that they continued to be delivered to the armed vessels of the United States after the passage of the act of the 2d of January, 1813.

It is the unanimous opinion of the court that the Mary was, at the time of her capture, protected by the instructions under which the captor sailed.

This opinion renders all inquiry into the character of the cargo unnecessary.

*The counsel for the captors have [151 claimed their costs and expenses, on the ground that there was probable cause of capture.

This claim is sustained by the court. Further proof has been required, and the lateness of the period at which the Mary was found on the ocean justified a suspicion that her case was not one to which the instructions of the President extended.

The sentence of the Circuit Court condemning the cargo of the Mary is reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court with directions to dismiss the libel so far as respects the cargo, and to restore the same to the claimants, and to allow the captors their reasonable costs and expenses.

DOE, LESSEE OF LEWIS AND WIFE, v. M'FARLAND AND OTHERS.

Absent—TODD, J.

It is not necessary that an executor of a will, made in Virginia, devising to the executor land in Kentucky, should take out letters testamentary in Kentucky, to enable him to maintain an ejectment for the land in Kentucky. If the plaintiff, in his declaration, claims the whole tract, a deed, showing that he has only an undivided interest in the tract, may be given in evidence.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, in an action of ejectment.

The case was submitted to the court at last term, by Wickliffe for the plaintiffs in error, and G. M. Bibb, for the defendants, upon notes of an argument, and was argued at this term by C. Lee for the plaintiffs in error.

February 27th. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a writ of error to a judgment rendered in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, in an ejectment by the plaintiffs in error, against the defendants.

152* *At the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs produced and read in evidence a patent from the commonwealth of Virginia, granting certain lands therein described, lying in the county of Nelson, in the now state of Kentucky, to John May, John Banister, Kennon Jones, Thomas Shore and Christopher M'Conico. He then offered in evidence the last will and testament of John May, deceased, which contained this clause: "I give and devise my land to my "executors, hereinafter named, and to the sur- "vivors and survivor of such of them as may "act, and their heirs, for the purpose of sel- "ling as much thereof as will pay all my "debts."

This will was proved and admitted to record according to the laws of Virginia, while Kentucky was a part of that state, and is duly certified by the proper authority. The plaintiff, Ann Lewis (wife of the other plaintiff, Thomas Lewis), who was an executrix named in the will of the said John May, alone qualified as executrix, and took upon herself the burden of executing the said will; but she did not qualify, and did not obtain her letters testamentary until after Kentucky had become an independent state.

The counsel for the defendants objected to the admissibility of the will and certificate thereto subjoined, because the said Ann had only qualified and sued out letters testamentary in the state of Virginia, and not in the state of Kentucky, where the land lies. The court sustained the objection, and the will was not permitted to go in evidence to the jury. To this opinion an exception was taken. There was also a second exception taken on the same rejection of evidence, which depends entirely on the correctness of the first opinion, and therefore need not be particularly stated.

It has been decided in this court that letters testamentary give to the executor no authority to sue for the personal estate of the testator out of the jurisdiction of the power by which those letters are granted. But this decision has never been understood to extend to a suit for lands devised to an executor. In such case the executor sues as devisee. His right is derived from the will, and the letters testamentary do not give the title. The executors are trustees for the purposes of the will. *This [153 will may be considered as requiring that the executors shall act to enable themselves to take under the devise to them; but when the condition is performed, those who have performed it take under the will. That the executrix took upon herself that character after the separation of Kentucky from Virginia is of no consequence. When she did take it upon herself, the condition on which the devise was made was performed, and she took as devisee under the will; and the act consummating her title had relation to the time of its commencement, which was before the separation of the two states. Were it even necessary, which is not admitted, to record this will in Kentucky, that objection was not made to the instrument, and therefore the court cannot suppose it to exist. The will was rejected because the executrix had not qualified in Kentucky, and this objection is not deemed a valid one.

An objection was also taken to a deed, which was offered in evidence, on the ground of an alleged variance between it, as proof, and the allegations in the declaration. The deed was not permitted to go in evidence to the jury; and to this opinion, also, an exception was taken.

The variance is not pointed out. If the objection to the deed is that it conveys only an undivided interest, while the declaration claims the whole tract, the objection ought not to have been sustained; but on the propriety of rejecting the deed it is not necessary to give an opinion since the judgment must be reversed on the first point.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to grant a new trial and to permit the will to be read in evidence.

CLARK'S EXECUTORS
v.
VAN RIEMSDYK.

Absent—TODD, J.

The answer of one defendant in chancery is not evidence against his co-defendant—nor is his deposition, although he had been discharged under the act of assembly of Rhode Island (of 1757) from all debts and contracts prior to the date of the discharge, and although the debt in suit was a debt contracted prior to such discharge, the debt having been contracted in a foreign country.

An answer in chancery, although positive, and directly responsive to an allegation in the bill, may be outweighed by circumstances, especially if it be respecting a fact which, in the nature of things cannot be within the personal knowledge of the defendant. A denial by the defendant that his testator gave authority to A to draw a bill of exchange, is not such an answer to an averment of such authority as will deprive the complainant of his remedy, unless the defendant also deny the subsequent assent of his testator to the drawing of such bill. For a subsequent assent is equivalent to an original authority. Semb: that a discharge under the act of assembly of Rhode Island (of 1756) from all debts, duties, contracts and demands outstanding at the time of such discharge, upon surrender of all the debtor's property, will not protect him against a debt contracted in a foreign country.

THIS cause was this day argued by Burgess and Stockton for the appellants, and Harper for the appellee, in the absence of the reporter.

154*] *February 28th. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from a decree made in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island.

The appellee filed his bill in that court, praying that the appellants and James Munro, Samuel Snow, and Benjamin Munro, late merchants trading under the firm of Munro, Snow & Munro, might be decreed to pay him the amount of a bill of exchange drawn in his favor at Batavia, by Benjamin Munro, at nine months sight, on Messrs. Daniel Crommelin & Sons, merchants, Amsterdam, for the sum of 21,488 guilders on account of advances made by the said Riemsdyk for the use of the defendants in the Circuit Court.

In the year 1805, John Innes Clark and Munro, Snow & Munro, being joint owners of the ship Patterson, in equal moieties, projected a voyage to Batavia, and appointed Benjamin Munro, one of the house of Munro, Snow & Munro, supercargo. The ship carried out some goods on account of the owners, and other goods on account of different persons, the whole to be invested in a return cargo, on the profits of which the ship-owners were to receive 45 per cent. instead of freight.

The bill charges that the supercargo was empowered verbally, in case of a deficiency of funds at Batavia, to load the ship with a return cargo, to take up money on the joint account of the owners, and, if necessary, to draw bills of exchange therefor on Messrs. Daniel Crommelin & Sons, of Amsterdam, or on the owners.

The Patterson returned in the Spring of 1806 with a cargo derived from the funds taken out in the outward voyage.

In March, 1806, the Patterson again sailed to Batavia on a voyage in all respects similar to the first. That part of the cargo which was furnished by the owners *consisted of [155 wines and some other inconsiderable articles. Being unable to sell the wine in Batavia, the supercargo placed it for sale in the hands of Mr. Van Riemsdyk, the defendant in error. Rather than return without filling the vessel for the owners, he drew bills on them to the amount of $2,389.89; and also drew on Messrs. Crommelin & Sons, merchants of Amsterdam, the bill for which this suit was brought. The bill is drawn by Benjamin Munro in his own name, but it contains a direction to charge the same to John Innes Clark and Munro, Snow & Munro, merchants of Providence, Rhode Island, North America. Of all these proceedings the owners were regularly informed by letter from Benjamin Munro, their supercargo.

The ship returned safe in March, 1807, and the proceeds of the cargo purchased by these bills were received by the owners. The bills drawn on the owners were duly paid; but no provision was made for that drawn on Daniel Crommelin & Sons.

In May, 1807, the ship proceeded on a third voyage to Batavia, with Benjamin Munro again supercargo. The owners appear to have relied on the wine placed in the hands of Van Riemsdyk on the second voyage for producing the funds with which to procure their part of the return cargo. In June, 1807, Munro, Snow & Munro became insolvent; and according to the laws of Rhode Island, obtained a certificate discharging them from the claims of their creditors, so far as such discharge could be affected by the law of a state. They had previously transferred, for a valuable consideration, to John Innes Clark, all their interest in the ship, the return cargo and the accruing freight, the whole of which came into his possession on the return of the vessel. In December, 1807, the bill was presented to Messrs. Daniel Crommelin & Sons, and protested for non-acceptance; and in October, 1808, it was protested for non-payment. Neither Clark nor Munro, Snow & Munro had any funds in the hands of Messrs. Daniel Crommelin & Sons.

John Innes Clark departed this life in November, 1808, having first made his last will and testament, of which the plaintiffs in error are executors, who have *assets in their [156 hands more than sufficient to satisfy the claim of Van Riemsdyk.

The defendants, Munro, Snow & Munro, in their answer, acknowledge all the material allegations of the bill, and expressly admit the authority of Benjamin Munro to draw the bill of exchange for which this suit was instituted. But they state their insolvency, and claim the benefit of the certificate of discharge granted them in pursuance of the laws of the state of Rhode Island.

Clark's executors deny that Benjamin Munro had any authority to take up money on credit for any purpose whatever, or to draw bills of exchange; and assert that both the complainant and Benjamin Munro knew that he had no such authority. They admit that if the money was taken up, it was for the joint use of the ship-owners, but not on their credit. It was, they say, on the sole credit of Benjamin Munro.

At the hearing, the bill was dismissed as to

Munro, Snow & Munro, and a decree was made against Clark's executors for the sum of $11,526.14, being the amount of the sum specified in the bill of exchange in the complainant's bill specified, together with ten per cent. damages for the non-payment thereof, and interest upon both these sums from the time when the said bill of exchange became due to the time of rendering the decree.

From this decree the executors of the said John Innes Clark prayed an appeal to this court.

In determining the extent of Clark's liability, the authority of Benjamin Munro to draw this bill becomes a question of material importance. If the answer of Munro, Snow & Munro, or their depositions taken in the cause, be admissible evidence against Clark's executors, this question is decided. But the admissibility of their answer, for this purpose, depends on the establishment of such a partnership as would authorize the draft of Munro as one of the partners; and the admissibility of their depositions depends on their being rendered disinterested witnesses by the certificate of discharge 157] stated *in the proceedings. The court, being satisfied on neither of these points, will exclude both the answer and the depositions, and consider the cause independently of them.

The letter of Benjamin Munro, written at Batavia, on the 3d of November, 1806, the day on which the bill in favor of Van Riemsdyk was drawn, and addressed to John Innes Clark, Esquire, and to Messrs. Munro, Snow & Munro, contains these passages: "I have shipped "on board the Patterson, on your account and "risk, 505 pecols Jacatia coffee, agreeably to "invoice and bill of lading inclosed. I have "drawn on you for the amount of $2,389.89, "at ninety days sight, in favor of the several "officers, &c., on board the Patterson, being "the amount of money they had remaining "over their privileges, and which I have al-"lowed them 15 per cent. advance thereon, "and which drafts you will please to honor. "A statement thereof I annex. I have also "drawn on Messrs. Daniel Crommelin & Sons, "merchants, Amsterdam, at nine months sight, "in favor of the Honorable William V. H. "Van Riemsdyk, of this place, for the amount "of 21,488 guilders on account of the Patterson, "and which bills you will, no doubt, prepare "for timely, as I have written those gentlemen. "I leave all the Madeira wine in the hands of "the Honorable Mr. Riemsdyk, as it will not "sell at all. I transmit his receipt for the "same. I have receieved no advance on the "wine."

To this letter was annexed a statement of the cargo of the Patterson, containing this item: "For owners of Patterson, 505 pecols coffee."

There was, also, the following memorandum:

"Memorandum of bills payable by you at "ninety days sight, viz.:

"Captain James Shaw, 1st, 2d, 3d, ex-"change, $748.75, &c., amounting in the "whole to $2,389.89.

"Amount of bills drawn on Messrs. Daniel "Crommelin & Sons, merchants, Amsterdam, 158] "payable by them *at nine months "sight, in favor of the Honorable Wm. V. H. "Van Riemsdyk, viz.:

"Four bills of exchange, 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, "for the amount of 21,488 guilders, equal to "$8,595. I have allowed Mr. Riemsdyk on "the money, 20 per cent. advance."

It is impossible to read this letter and these memoranda without feeling a conviction that Benjamin Munro believed himself to be acting within the scope of his authority, and supposed that neither his bills on the owners, nor that on Crommelin & Sons, would be considered by them as an extraordinary or unexpected transaction. He makes no apology for what had been done; gives no description of his difficulties and embarrassments at being disappointed in Batavia by not receiving the funds on which he relied for their return cargo, and of his doubts whether the measure to which he had resorted in consequence of that disappointment, would be approved by them. His language is the language of an agent acting within his powers on a contingency which had been foreseen and provided for. Having stated the bills drawn on them, he adds, in the usual style of letters of notice, "which drafts "you will please to honor." After stating the drafts on Crommelin & Sons, he adds, "which bills you will no doubt prepare for "timely, as I have written those gentlemen." This is not the language of an agent conscious of having transcended his powers.

But it will be admitted that the opinion of the agent on the extent of his powers will not bind his principals. Let us, then, inquire, so far as the testimony will inform us, into the opinion entertained on this point by the principals themselves.

On the 1st of November, 1806, at Batavia, Benjamin Munro stated an account current between himself and the owners of the ship Patterson, according to which the executors of John Innes Clark admit the settlement to have been made on the arrival of the vessel. That account debits the owners with $9,090, the amount of invoice of 505 pecols of coffee shipped on board the Patterson, on their account and risk, and with the 15 per *cent. ad- [159 vance on the bills drawn on them, and the 20 per cent. advance on the bills drawn on Crommelin & Sons, and credits them with the amount of those bills. The entry of the last-mentioned bills is thus expressed, "bills drawn on Messrs. "Daniel Crommelin & Sons, payable by you at "nine months sight."

This account charges the owners with the disbursements of the vessel, which exceed the funds in the hands of Munro, other than those produced by the bills of exchange, so that the whole return cargo was purchased by these bills. Not a sentence escapes either of the owners disapproving the conduct of Munro, or expressing surprise at it. With that full knowledge of the whole transaction which is given by the letter of Munro, by the statement annexed to it, and by the account; with full information that the whole cargo was purchased with bills drawn on them and on a house in Amsterdam, to be paid by them, they receive the cargo and dispose of it to a very considerable profit. Can they now be permitted, in a court of conscience, to question the authority by which the bills were drawn.

The circumstances which prove their acquiescence in this authority are not yet exhausted.

The Patterson sails on a third voyage to Batavia, and Benjamin Munro is again supercargo. His conduct in drawing bills on the second voyage is not censured. He is not informed that this is a power not confided to him; that he has mistaken the extent of his authority; that his principals are not bound by his drafts. He goes again to India in the full belief that his conduct had met with perfect approbation, and that no intention existed to throw upon him the bills he had drawn on Amsterdam for moneys with which he had purchased the second cargo. In this belief the proceeds of the wines, placed in the hands of Van Riemsdyk, are drawn out of his hands and invested in another return cargo for the owners of the Patterson.

Had there not been an entire acquiescence in the bill drawn by him on Crommelin & Sons, a full admission on the part of his principals that they were responsible for that bill, and that no attempt would be made to throw it on him, can it be believed that the proceeds of these wines 160] *would have been invested in a return cargo for the owners of the ship? Had Van Riemsdyk suspected that the owners would disclaim the authority of their supercargo to draw bills, and would fail to place funds in Amsterdam to meet them, and would endeavor to turn him over to that supercargo for payment, is it credible that he would have permitted the proceeds of this wine to pass out of his hands without an attempt to secure himself?

These circumstances strengthen the conviction growing out of the whole conduct of the owners, that in drawing the bill for which this suit was instituted, Benjamin Munro acted within his authority.

This testimony is opposed by the answer of Clark's executors; and the rule that an answer must prevail unless contradicted by one witness as well as by circumstances, is said to be so inflexible that the strongest circumstances will not themselves be sufficient to outweigh an answer.

The general rule that either two witnesses or one witness with probable circumstances will be required to outweigh an answer asserting a fact responsively to a bill, is admitted. The reason upon which the rule stands, is this: The plaintiff calls upon the defendant to answer an allegation he makes, and thereby admits the answer to be evidence. If it is testimony, it is equal to the testimony of any other witness; and as the plaintiff cannot prevail if the balance of proof be not in his favor, he must have circumstances in addition to his single witness, in order to turn the balance. But certainly there may be evidence arising from circumstances stronger than the testimony of any single witness.

The weight of an answer must also, from the nature of evidence, depend, in some degree, on the fact stated. If a defendant asserts a fact which is not and cannot be within his own knowledge, the nature of his testimony cannot be changed by the positiveness of his assertion. The strength of his belief may have betrayed him into a mode of expression of which he was not fully apprised. When he intended to utter only a strong conviction of the existence of a 161] particular fact, or what he deemed an *infallible deduction from facts which were known to him, he may assert that belief or that deduction in terms which convey the idea of his knowing the fact itself. Thus, when the executors say that John Innes Clark never gave Benjamin Munro authority to take up money or to draw bills, when they assert that Riemsdyk, who was in Batavia, did not take this bill on the credit of the owners of the Patterson, but on the sole credit of Benjamin Munro, they assert facts which cannot be within their own knowledge. In the first instance they speak from belief; in the last they swear to a deduction which they make from the admitted fact that Munro could show no written authority. These traits in the character of testimony must be perceived by the court, and must be allowed their due weight, whether the evidence be given in the form of an answer or a deposition. The respondents could found their assertions only on belief; they ought so to have expressed themselves; and their having, perhaps incautiously, used terms indicating a knowledge of what in the nature of things they could not know, cannot give to their answer more effect than it would have been entitled to had they been more circumspect in their language.

But were the court to allow to this answer all the weight which is claimed for it by counsel, it would not avail his clients. It asserts that Munro drew bills without authority from his owners, but does not assert that his owners never confirmed his acts. It will not be denied that the acts of an agent, done without authority, may be so ratified and confirmed by his principals as to bind them in like manner as if an original authority had existed. The application of this principle to the case at bar is as little to be denied as the principle itself. The transactions which have been urged to show an original authority to draw the bill in question, will be recollected without being recapitulated. The court is of opinion that they amount to a full confirmation of those proceedings of their agent which had been communicated to his principals, and to an undertaking to perform the engagements he had made for them.

It is urged, on the part of the appellees, that this undertaking is not joint, but several, and binds each party to the extent of his interest, and no farther.

*The court does not so understand [162 the transaction. The undertaking not being express, its extent must be determined by the character of their acts of confirmation, and by the character of the act confirmed.

The bill is to be charged, as expressed upon its face, to John Innes Clark, and to Munro, Snow & Munro.

In his letter of the 3d of November, 1806, addressed to his owners, Benjamin Munro, after mentioning the bills, says, "which bills you" (that is, John Innes Clark and Munro, Snow & Munro) "will no doubt prepare for timely."

In the account with his owners, rendered by Benjamin Munro, and dated the 1st of November, 1806, he charges them jointly with the coffee purchased by these bills, jointly with the premium advanced, and credits them jointly with the amount of the bills. This account is afterwards referred to by John Innes Clark himself as a settled account.

The court cannot understand the undertaking, proved by these papers and by the conduct of the parties, to be other than a joint undertaking of the owners to put themselves in the place of Benjamin Munro, and to provide funds to take up the bill.

It is the unanimous opinion of the court that the liability of the owners of the ship Patterson for the bill drawn by Benjamin Munro in favor of Riemsdyk is precisely the same as if it had been drawn by themselves. They have made his act their act.

It is said that, even on this principle, the decree is for too large a sum, because the premium and the damages cannot be recovered in a court of chancery.

There is no evidence that the contract is not allowable by the laws of Batavia; nor did the owners, when informed of it, complain of its terms. This court cannot presume that it is illegal.

The damages form no part of the contract, and certainly cannot be decreed by a court of 163] chancery, unless, *by the laws of the place where the bill was drawn, they become a part of the debt. Upon this point the court has no information; and for this reason the decree must be reversed.

It is also the opinion of the court that the dismissal of the bill of the complainants as to James Munro and Samuel Snow, the surviving partners of Munro, Snow & Munro, was irregular:[1] and that a decree ought to have been made against them also. For these causes the decree must be in part reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court with directions to reform the decree according to this opinion.

The decree of this court is as follows:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island, and was argued by counsel; which being considered, the court is of opinion that John Innes Clark in his life-time, and Munro, Snow & Munro, the owners of the ship Patterson, were jointly liable for the bill of exchange, in the complainant's bill mentioned, to the same extent as if the said bill had been drawn by them; and that the estate of the said John Innes Clark, in the hands of his executors, is, in equity, chargeable with the said debt, as far as the said John Innes Clark in his life-time was chargeable therewith. This court is therefore of opinion that there is no error in so much of the said decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island as directs the respondents, the executors of the said John Innes Clark, deceased, to pay to the complainant the amount of the said bill with interest thereon from the time when the same became payable to the day on which the said decree was made, and the same as to so much thereof is affirmed. And this court is further of opinion that the defendants ought not to have been ordered to pay damages on the said bill without proof that, by the law of the place where the same was drawn, damages were made payable; in which case the persons bound to pay the said bill are liable in a court of equity, as well as in a court of law, to pay such damages. This court is also 164] *of opinion that so much of the said decree as dismisses the bill of the complainants as to James Munro and Samuel Snow, the surviving partners of Munro, Snow & Munro, is irregular, and that a decree ought to have been made against them likewise. It is, therefore, the opinion of this court that so much of the said decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, made in this case, as directs the appellants to pay to the complainant in that court, damages at the rate of ten per centum on the amount thereof, with interest thereon; and so much of the said decree as dismisses the bill of the complainant to James Munro and Samuel Snow, the surviving partners of Munro, Snow & Munro, is erroneous and ought to be reversed, and the same is reversed accordingly. And this court doth further order and decree that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, with directions to receive proof of the law of Batavia respecting protested bills of exchange, to conform its decree to this opinion, and to make the same against the surviving partner or partners of the late commercial house of Munro, Snow & Munro as well as against the appellants; all which is ordered and decreed accordingly.

1.—It is probable that the court did not observe that the dismissal of the bill as to Munro, Snow & Munro, was with the assent of the complainant.

FINLEY v. WILLIAMS AND OTHERS.

Absent—TODD, J.

In Kentucky the courts of law will not look beyond the patent, but courts of equity will; and will give validity to the elder entry against an elder patent.

Between pre-emption rights, the prior improvement will hold the land against a prior certificate, entry, survey and patent.

It is not essential to the dignity of an entry upon a pre-emption warrant, that the entry should, in terms, call for the improvement, although it must in fact include the improvement.

An entry calling for "the Big Blue Lick," will not support a survey and patent for land at the Upper Blue Lick, the Lower Blue Lick being generally called "the Big Blue Lick," although there may be other calls in the entry which seem to designate the Upper Blue Lick as the place intended.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, in a suit in chancery, brought by Finley to compel Williams and others, who had the elder patent, to convey certain lands to the complainant, which he claimed by virtue of a prior settlement.

The cause was argued by Pope for the appellants, and Clay for the appellees, on the 22d of February, 1813, in the absence of the reporter

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This cause depends on the land law of Virginia, which is also the land law of Kentucky, that state having formed a part of Virginia when the act was passed in which the titles of both plaintiff and defendant originated. Both parties claim the land in controversy by virtue of improvements made previous to the first day of January, 1778, which improvements were recognized by the act generally termed "the previous title law," and gave the persons making them a pre-emption of one thousand acres of land, to include the improvement, on paying therefor the price at which the state sold its vacant lands, "provided they respectively "demand and prove their right to such pre-"emption before the commissioners for the "county to be appointed by virtue of this act, within eight months."

In the year 1781 an act passed which, after reciting that by the discontinuance of the commissioners in the District of Kentucky, many good people of the commonwealth were prevented from proving their rights of settlement and pre-emption in due time, owing to their being engaged in the public service of this country, enacts that the county courts, in which such lands may lie, be empowered and required to hear and determine such disputes, and that the register of the land-office be empowered and directed to grant titles on the determinations of such courts, in the same manner as if the commissioners had determined the same.

It appears that in the year 1773, John Finley, the plaintiff in the cause, marked and improved the land in controversy. He entered into the continental service in the year 1776, and continued therein throughout the war. His claim was not made before the commissioners, but was made to the court of the county in which the lands lie, by which court his claim was allowed, and the following certificate was granted: "At a court held for the county of "Fayette, March 12th, 1782, application and "satisfactory proof being made, this court "doth certify that John Finley is entitled to 166] "the *pre-emption of 1,000 acres of "land, situate on the main branch of Licking "Creek, to include an improvement made in "the year 1773 by said Finley, and to be "bounded by a survey made, at the time, for "him, which includes the Upper Blue Lick, "by virtue of such marking out and improv-"ing, and his being in public service when the "commissioners sat in the district, and thereby "prevented applying for the same."

A pre-emption warrant was obtained, and on the 14th day of November, in the year 1783, an entry was made with the proper surveyor in the following words: "John Finley enters "1,000 acres of land on a pre-emption warrant, "No. 2526, on Licking, to include the Upper "Blue Lick, and bounded on three sides by "the line of an old survey made in the year "1773, beginning," &c. This entry was surveyed, and a patent issued thereon.

William Lynn, under whom the defendants claim, made an improvement on the same ground in the year 1775, and laid his claim before the commissioners, who allowed the same, and granted a certificate therefor, dated the 20th day of November, in the year 1779, in the following words: "William Lynn this day "claimed a pre-emption of one thousand acres "of land at the state price, lying on the south "side of Licking Creek, known by the name "of the Big Blue Lick, to include the said "lick, lying in a short bent of the said creek, "by improving the same in the year 1775, &c." On the 22d of June, 1780, Lynn, having obtained a pre-emption warrant, entered the same with the proper surveyor, in these words: "William Lynn, James Barbour and John "Williams enter 1,000 acres of land upon a "pre-emption warrant, beginning a quarter of a "mile below the Big Blue Lick on Licking, on "the south side thereof, running on both sides "of the said creek, and cast and south for "quantity." This entry was so surveyed as to include the lands in dispute, and a patent was obtained thereon of an earlier date than that of Finley. Upon this patent an ejectment was brought, and judgment obtained by Lynn, Barbour & Williams. Finley has brought this suit to compel a conveyance of that part of the land held by Lynn and others, which is included in his patent. On a hearing, *it was [167 the opinion of the Circuit Court that Lynn and others held the better title; in conformity with which a decree was made. From that decree Finley has appealed to this court.

The peculiar state of titles to land in Kentucky, a senior patent being in many cases issued on a junior title, and it being a rule in their courts of law not to look beyond the patent, have settled the principle that courts of equity will sustain a bill brought for the purpose of establishing the prior title by entry, and of obtaining a conveyance from the person holding under a senior patent issued on a junior entry. The courts of the United States have conformed to this practice, and adopted the the principle.

It is also settled in Kentucky that between pre-emption rights the prior improvement will hold the land, although the certificate of the commissioners, the entry, the survey and the patent, be all posterior in point of time to those obtained by the person who has made an improvement of a later date.

It follows from these established principles, that Finley must prevail, unless he has lost the right acquired in consequence of his improvement.

The Circuit Judge was of opinion that this right was lost by the form of his entry with the surveyor. Not having in that entry called, in terms, for his improvement, that judge was of opinion that although his entry does in fact comprehend his improvement, yet he has surrendered the preference which his pre-emption warrant gave him, and sunk his claim to the level of a common treasury warrant. This court can perceive no reason for that opinion. The law requires that the entry shall in fact include the improvement, but does not make it essential to the dignity of the entry that the improvement shall in terms be called for. The certificate expressly states that the land granted is to include the improvement; and the entry, which is made with remarkable precision, conforms exactly to the certificate in the description of the land intended to be taken.

*But it is contended by the defendant [168 that, whatever may be the opinion of the court on this point, Finley's title as to a pre-emption must yield to that of Lynn, in consequence of his having omitted to assert his claim before the court of commissioners. The legislature could not, it is said, after permitting the time for making this claim to expire, revive it to the prejudice of any other person who had acquired title to the land. It is added that the decisions in Kentucky have been adverse to titles to pre-emptions depending on certificates granted by the county courts, in cases where they come into competition with titles gained before the grant of such certificates.

This court would not willingly depart from the state decisions, if they have settled the principle the one way or the other; and would, therefore, have deferred the determination of this cause until more certain information could be obtained, had it rested solely on the validity of the plaintiff's title as founded on a pre-emption. But, on an inspection of the record, the entry of the defendants is deemed so radically defective as necessarily to yield to the title of the plaintiff, should his warrant even be reduced to the grade of a treasury warrant.

The law requires that the holder of a land warrant "shall direct the location thereof so "specially and precisely as that others may be "enabled with certainty to locate other war-"rants on the adjacent residuum."

Such has been the difficulty of making special locations that much of the precision which the law would seem to require has been dispensed with; but a reasonable and practicable certainty has always been deemed necessary; and wherever the material and principal call of a location has been calculated, instead of informing, to misguide subsequent locators, the location itself has been brought into hazard, and it has often been determined that the survey was made on other land than that which the entry covered.

In examining these questions, the courts of Kentucky have universally and properly determined that all subordinate calls in an entry 169] must yield to a principal *call to which they may be repugnant. If a great and prominate object, immovable and durable in itself, and of general notoriety, be called for in a location, that object must fix and locate the entry, although other minor and temporary objects, to be discovered only by a strict and successful search, might prove that the locator really intended to take other land.

In the entry of Lynn and others there is such a principal call. The Big Blue Lick is perhaps an object of as universal notoriety as any in Kentucky. But there are two Blue Licks on the same creek, and both of them are large licks. In such a case the locator would certainly be at liberty, and it would be his duty to designate the lick he intended to take; for if his entry would apply to the one as well as to the other, it would be justly chargeable with a vagueness which would leave subsequent locators unable to locate with certainty the adjacent residuum. This entry has, in its terms, designated the lick intended to be included. It is "the Big Blue Lick." The entry does not call for a Big Blue Lick, but for the Big Blue Lick, thereby excluding any other lick than that which was emphatically denominated the Big Blue Lick.

We are then to ask which of these licks a man in Kentucky, holding a warrant which he intended to locate, would suppose was the Big Blue Lick.

Upon this subject the testimony is not doubtful. It is in full proof that at the time the entry of the defendants was made, and for some years before, the Lower Blue Licks were generally called the Big Blue Licks; and that where the defendants have surveyed was known by the name of the Upper Blue Licks. They were sometimes, though rarely, distinguished from each other as the Upper Big Blue Licks and the Lower Big Blue Licks; sometimes as the Upper and the Lower Blue Licks; but the term the Big Blue Licks, when used without the word "upper" or "lower," was universally understood to designate the Lower Blue Licks.

The company which made this location in 1775, had not discovered the Lower Blue Licks, and therefore denominated the spring which they did discover, "the *Big Blue [170 Lick;" but the name originated and expired with themselves. It was never adopted by the people of the country. It is probable that Lynn did contemplate the Upper Blue Licks when he made his entry; but between conflicting entries a mistake of this kind is fatal to the person who commits it. In the case of Taylor and Hughes it was impossible not to perceive that Taylor intended one creek when he named another; but subsequent locators could judge of his intention only from the words of his entry.

But it is contended that there are other explanatory calls in the entry which cure the defect which has been stated, and designate, with sufficient certainty, that the Upper Blue Lick was intended to be included in the entry.

The entry is said to require a lick on the south side of Licking, and the spring which issues at the Upper Blue Lick is on the south side. The words are, "beginning one-quarter "of a mile below the Big Blue Lick on Lick-"ing, on the south side thereof." The locator intends to describe his beginning; and these words are to be construed with reference to that intention. Do the words "on Licking" describe the place of beginning, or the location of the Big Blue Lick? The latter was unnecessary, because there was no Big Blue Lick except on Licking; and because, were the fact otherwise, the lick would be ascertained by calling for a beginning a quarter of a mile below it on Licking. But the beginning might be a quarter of a mile below the lick, and yet not on the creek. The beginning would be, in some degree, uncertain, unless it be fixed by those words. The entry is understood as if it were expressed thus: "Beginning on Licking, on the south side thereof, a quarter of a mile below the Big Blue Lick." If reference be had to the certificate granted by the commissioners, that places the land, not the lick, on the south side of the creek.

A cabin and a marked tree in a country full of cabins and marked trees, cannot control a call made for an object of such general notoriety as the Big Blue Lick. A subsequent locator would look for them only at the Big Blue Lick.

*It is the opinion of this court that the [171 decree of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled, and that the defendants be decreed to convey to the plaintiff so much of the land comprehended within this grant as appears by the survey made in this cause to lie within the bounds of the grant made to the complainant.[1]

WALKER AND ANOTHER.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., STORY, J., and TODD, J.

If there is nothing in a patent to control the call for course and distance, the land must be bounded by the courses and distances of the patent, according to the magnetic meridian.

Course and distance must yield to a call for natural objects.

All lands are supposed to have been actually surveyed, and the intention of the grant is to convey the land according to the actual survey.

If a patent refer to a plat annexed, and if in that plat a water-course be laid down as running through the land, the tract must be so surveyed as to include the water-course, and to conform as near as may be to the plat, although the lines thus run do not correspond with the courses and distances mentioned in the patent, and although neither the certificate of survey nor the patent calls for that water-course. Quære. Whether parol evidence can be given that the surveyor intended to express the courses according to the true, and not according to the magnetic meridian.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee, in an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendants.

The case is thus stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court:

On the trial the plaintiff produced two patents for 5,000 acres each, from the state of North Carolina, granting to Stockley Donalson, from whom the plaintiff derived his title, two several tracts of land lying on Crow Creek, the one, No. 12, beginning at a box elder standing on a ridge corner to No. 11, &c., "as by the plat "hereunto annexed will appear." The plat and certificate of survey were annexed to the grant.

The plaintiff proved that there were eleven other grants of the same date for 5,000 acres each, issued from the state of North Carolina, designated as a chain of surveys joining each other from No. 1 to No. 11, inclusive, each calling for land on Crow Creek, as a general call, and the courses and distances of which, as described in the grants, are the same with the grants produced to the jury. It was also proved that the beginning of the first grant was marked and intended as the beginning corner of No. 1, but no other tree was marked, nor was any survey ever made, but the plat was made out at Raleigh, and does not express on its face that the lines were run by the true meridian. It was also proved that the beginning corner of No. 1 stood on the north-west side of Crow Creek, and the line running thence down the creek, and called for in the plat and patent, is south 40 degrees west. It further appeared that Crow Creek runs through a valley of good land, which is on an average about three miles wide, between mountains unfit for cultivation, and which extends from the beginning of the survey No. 1 in the said chain of the surveys, until it reaches below survey No. 13, in nearly a straight line, the course of which is nearly south thirty-five degrees *west by the [*174 needle, and south forty degrees west by the true meridian. That in the face of the plats annexed to the grants, the creek is represented as running through and across each grant. The lines in the certificate of survey do not expressly call for crossing the creek; but each certificate and grant calls generally for land lying on Crow Creek. If the lines of the tracts herein before mentioned—No. 12 and 13—in the said chain of surveys be run according to the course of the needle and the distances called for, they will not include Crow Creek or any part of it, and will not include the land in possession of the defendants. If they be run according to the as pre-emption rights, yet by their subsequent acts in making their entries with the surveyor, they have reduced them to the footing of treasury warrant claims, by omitting in their entries to call for their respective improvements, the foundation and essence of pre-emption rights. (Hughes's Rep., 194, Bryan & Owings v. Wallace.) These circumstances render it unnecessary for the court to express an opinion as to the description of persons contemplated to be relieved by the act of the Virginia legislature which passed in May, 1781.

The defendants derive their title under an entry made the 22d of June, 1780, in the words following, to wit: "William Lynn, James Barbour and John "Williams enter 1000 acres upon a pre-emption war- "rant, beginning one-quarter of a mile below the "Big Blue Lick, on Licking, on the south side "thereof, running up both sides of the said creek, "and east and south for quantity," which, being of elder date than that of the complainants, the defendants holding the elder grant for the lands in controversy, I shall therefore consider the validity of their entry first, and test thereby their right to the land in dispute, which, if it be defective and cannot be supported, must yield to the complainant, whose entry, in that case, is deemed good and valid for so much as it can legally cover.

The important call in the entry of the defendants is "the Big Blue Lick on Licking, on the south side "thereof."

The validity of this entry rests on the following points: Was the lick, described in the connected plat filed in this suit by the name of the Blue Lick, on the 22d day of June, 1780, and prior to that time generally known and called by the name of "the Big Blue Lick?" Does it lie on the south side of Licking? Is it a big lick? If the lick was not notoriously known by the name the "Big Blue Lick" prior to June, 1780, is the identity thereof so described as to put a subsequent locator on his guard?

By the testimony taken in this cause the lick in controversy was discovered by the complainant and his fellow-adventurers in the year 1773, and was by them called the Upper Blue Lick, in contradistinction to another and larger lick which had then been discovered by some of the company lower down Licking.

In the year 1775 another company of adventurers, consisting of five persons, of whom William Lynn was one, discovered the lick, and by them it was called the "Big Blue Lick," and from the entry made with the surveyor by Lynn, it was so known to him, and called by that name on the 22d day of June, 1780.

From the year 1777 to the present day the lick has been generally, and perhaps universally, with the above exception by Lynn, designated by the name of the Upper Blue Lick. The weight of testimony preponderates, as to the name of the lick, in favor of the complainant. Therefore, as to the notoriety of the lick by the name of "the Big Blue Lick," the entry of the defendants is defective.

Although it often happens that notoriety of an object called for in an entry cannot be satisfactorily proved, yet the identity thereof may be so described *that it may be found by reason- [*172 able inquiry and searching therefor, and when found, known by the description. In that case, identity is equal to notoriety.

I will now inquire how far the identity of the lick called for in the entry of the defendants can be supported.

All the witnesses in the cause speak of the lick in question as being a blue lick, and it is so admitted by the parties who, in their admission, represent the salt water issuing from the spring to be of a bluish color. There is no testimony which proves true meridian, or so as to include Crow Creek, they will include the lands in possession of the defendants. Whereupon the counsel for the plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury,

1. That the lines of the said lands ought to be run according to the true meridian and not according to the needle.

2. That the lines ought to be run as to include Crow Creek and the lands in possession of the defendants.

The court overruled both these motions and instructed the jury that the said grant must be run according to the course of the needle and the distances called for in the said grants, and that the same could not be legally run so as to include Crow Creek, and that the said grants did not include the lands in possession of the defendants. To this opinion an exception was taken by the plaintiff's counsel. A verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendants, and that judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

The Chief Justice, in stating the case, omitted the fact that testimony was offered by the plaintiff at the trial to prove "that the surveyor "who made the plats and certificates of survey "annexed to the grants, had regard to the true "meridian, and not to the course of the needle, "in making the said certificates of survey, and "inteuded the courses of the survey so to be "run;" which testimony was rejected by the court below as inadmissible; but the court ad-

175*] mitted evidence "that *the general "practice of making surveys by surveyors has "been to run to the courses of the needle."

Swann, for the plaintiff in error.

The court below ought not to have rejected the testimony to prove the intention of the surveyor to run the lines of these grants by the true meridian. It corroborates the plat annexed to the grant. The rule of construction as to grants from the state, especially in Virginia, North Carolina and Tennessee, differs from the rule as to other deeds. Course and distance may be controlled by parol evidence of the actual manner in which the survey was made, and of the actual marks and bounds made upon the land at the time of the survey. The courts have not stopped at a natural object called for, if parol evidence be given that according to the actual survey the line extended beyond that object. The marks control the course and distance of the patent. (1 Hen. and Mun., 77, Baker v. Glasscock; Taylor's N. Carolina Rep., 116; Hayward's Rep., 238, 378; MS. Rep., Blount's Lessee v. Masters; 3 Call., 239, Herbert v. Wise.)

If the witness had testified that a survey had been actually made and that it included the creek, it would have been admissible testimony. But the plat was intended to be a substitute for an actual survey. It was a part of the patent, annexed to it and referred to by it. It was as much a part of the patent as if it had been inserted in it. It shows that the land ought to be laid off so as to include the creek, as plainly as if the patent had expressed it in words. The course, south 40 degrees west, is ambiguous—it may mean a maguetic or a meridional course. The question is, what was the intention of the surveyor? How shall it be ascertained? The most direct mode of ascertaining it is to prove his declarations at the time. It is true that by proving what was the general practice of surveyors you may infer his intention; but that is a secondary mode of proof, and less certain than that proof of his declarations at the time he made the particular survey in question. This is not bringing parol evidence to contradict or to control the plat, but to corroborate and confirm it.

If a grant is capable of two constructions, the court *must adopt that which is most [176 beneficial to the grantee. (1 Taylor's Rep., 163.)

the existence of any Blue Lick ou Licking, except the Upper and Lower Blue Licks. The testimony establishes two salt springs on the south side of Licking; that the one lowest down is less than the upper spring; that there is another salt spring on the north side of Licking, at the place called the Lower Blue Licks, which is larger than that on the south side of the stream; and that there is no salt spring on the north side of Licking opposite the upper lick. The witnesses also, when speaking of the lower salt springs, describe them generally as one entire object, "the Lower Blue Lick," or Licks; and William Brooks describes both the Upper and Lower Blue Licks as big licks, and that the upper spring discharges most water.

The courts in this country have always endeavored to sustain an entry, if by reasonable construction it be possible. For this purpose they will reject an absurd or superfluous call; they will supply a word; they will consider a call not proved as expunged; and although there are more allegations than are proved, yet if enough is proved to render the entry sufficiently certain, the court will support it.

These observations are made to show that the courts will go great lengths to support defective entries in imperfect and uninportant calls, and are not applicable to the entry now under consideration, which, in itself, is considered as possessing sufficient identity to put a subsequent locator upon inquiry, and when found, to know the place by the description contained in the entry. The Upper aud Lower Blue Licks had received appropriate names as early as the year 1777. The Lower Blue Licks, although there were at that place two salt springs, one on the north and the other on the south side of Licking, had received an appropriate name conveying the idea of unity This was not the situation of the Upper Blue Lick, which, although it had also an appropriate name by which it was most generally known at the time the entry of the defendants was made, yet it lies altogether on the south side of Licking.

The testimony taken in this cause supports every call in the entry of the defendants. All the witnesses concur that the place designated in the connected plat as a blue lick is entitled to that appellation. Brooks says that both the licks, i. e., the Upper and Lower Blue Licks, are big licks; and in answer to a request to express his opinion which of the two was the largest, said he would recommend an examination; and the upper lick is on the south side of Licking. These facts apply to the description given in the defendants' entry, and will not apply to the Lower Blue Licks. Therefore, as no entire blue lick is proved to exist on the south side of Licking, except that designated in the connected plat, the entry of the defendants is sustained, and the court is of opinion that no doubt could exist in the mind of a subsequent locator, upon viewing the Upper and Lower Blue Licks, and comparing the situation and other circumstances attending the Upper Blue Lick, with the entry, but that it was the place described and would defeat any idea of ambiguity, if it had occurred.

On examining the connected plat I find that the defendants have commenced their survey on Licking, about one hundred poles below the lick, whereas, by the entry, they ought to have begun only eighty, that being the precise distance called for as the point of beginning of their survey; to rectify which a new survey was ordered, upon the return of which the defendants were decreed to convey to the complainants so much of the land was in the defendants' original survey, and was now left out by the new survey, as interfered with the complainant's survey, and that the complainant's bill be dismissed as to all the residue.

The general practice of the country is to survey by the compass, and all the courses expressed in surveys refer to the magnetic meridian. A certificate of survey, therefore, is always supposed to express maguetic courses unless the contrary is expressed on its face. No parol proof can be admitted to contradict what is so strougly implied. It would be a dangerous practice—it would be a difficult thing for a common surveyor to ascertaiu the true meridian, and thcre is no law of North Carolina which compels him to do it. The testimony offered was not to prove any act of the surveyor, but his intentions.

There is no natural boundary called for in the patent. The general expression that the land is on Crow Creek cannot control the course and distance. The expression in the patent, "as by the plat hereunto annexed will appear," refers only to the course and distances, and not to the actual location of the land. The figure of a creek dclineated on the plat, without any reference to it in the certificate of survey, cannot coutrol the bouudaries actually described. Not a word is said about the lines including or crossing Crow Creek; and in order to include the creek you must deviate from the straight line called for.

C. Lee, in reply.

The intent of a grant must be effectuated, if by any means, consistent with the rules of law, it can be done. The intent of this grant cannot be effectuated by the mode of survey of the court below. The plat annexed to the grant shows the intent to be to make the survey conform to the nature of the ground so as to include the creek and the valley, and exclude the mountains. The law of North Caroliua requires the plat to be auuexed to thc deed, which is thereby, aud by the reference to it in the body of the deed, made a part thereof; and contains a plain declaration that the grantec shall have the valley through which the creek 177*] runs. *On what ground could the testimony of the intention of the surveyor have been rejected by the court, when they admitted testimony to show the general practice to be to survey by the magnetic meridian? That general practice was only a fact from which the jury might infer, in the absence of positive testimony, what the intent of the surveyor was. It was a grade of evidence inferior to positive testimony of the intentiou. It was only prima facie, not conclusive, evidence of his meaning. Therc was no law of North Carolina which required the surveyor to go by the magnctic aud not by the true meridian. He was at full liberty to adopt the true meridian if he pleased. We say he did so, and the plat itself is evidence of the fact, for it could not otherwise be consistent with itself. You must run the liues according to the true meridian to include the creek.

MARSHALL, Ch. J.

Does not a difficulty arise in consequence of the grant having beeu made without actual survey?

C. Lee. That is a matter between the state and the grantee. After a graut, no stranger can take advantage of such a defect. The state may waive the objection if it chooses to do so.

Swann. It has becn settled, I believe, in North Carolina, that when a grant has actually been made no enquiry shall be made by the state as to the survey, &c.

In Hayward's Rep., 358, the judge says, "when a grant has issued we can look no "further back; all previous proceedings must "be considered as regular."

March 1st. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"It is undoubtedly the praetice of surveyors, and the practice was proved in this cause, to express in their plats and certificates of survey, the courses which are designated by the needle; and if nothing exists to control the call for course and distance, the land must be *bounded by the courses and distances [178 of the patent, according to the magnetic meridian. But it is a general principle that the course and distance must yield to natural objects called for in the patent. All lands are supposed to be actually surveyed, and the intention of the grant is to convey the land according to that actual survey; consequeutly if marked trees and marked corners be found conformably to the calls of the pateut, or if watcr-courses be called for in the patent, or mountains or any other natural objects, distances must be lengthened or shortened, and courses varied so as to conform to those objects.

The reason of the rule is, that it is the intention of the grant to convey thc land actually surveyed, and mistakes iu courses or distances arc more probable and more frequent than in marked trees, mountains, rivers or other na-

NOTE.—Where reference is made in a deed to a recorded plat, evidence in an action of ejectment, to show that the recorded plat thus referred to differed from the original plat, is inadmissible. Until an action to reform the deed was brought, and the deed reformed for mistake, in equity, the deseription given in the deed by reference to the recorded plat is conclusive upon the parties. Jones v. Johnston, 18 How. 150.

Where both parties claimed under deeds which referred to a recorded plat, as a means of describing the premises, it is immaterial whether the plat is recorded precisely as required by the statute. If the description in the deed was made sufficiently certain, by reference to the plat, to locate and identify the lots intended to be conveyed, the title of such lots passed by the deed to the grantees whether the plat conformed to the statute or not. Noonan v. Lee, 2 Black. 499.

Where, in an action of ejectment, parol evidence was given by plaintiff that two of the calls in his deed were not applicable to a lot of which he was in possession, unless another lot, of which defendant was in possession, was also included, defendant may give parol evidence of the acts and declarations of plaintiff, to show that defendant's lot was not included in the description contained in plaintiff's deed. Atkinson v. Cummins, 9 How. 479; Pancoast v. Barry, 1 Cranch, C. C. 176.

Extraneous evidence is competent to show the existence and locality of objects called for, but not to explain or construe the words of an entry. Meredith v. Pickett, 9 Wheat. 573.

Where deed conveyed property to D "as trustee," without saying for whom, parol evidence is admissible to show what was the trust, to prevent D's claiming adversely to the beneficiaries. Railroad Co. v. Durant, 5 Otto. 576.

Where no ambiguity exists in the patent as to the person described as patentee, parol evidence is intural objects capable of being clearly designated and accurately described. Had the survey in this case been actually made, and the lines had called to cross Crow Creek, the courses and distances might have been precisely what they are; it might have been impracticable to find corner or other marked trees, and yet the land must have been so surveyed as to include Crow Creek. The call in the lines of the patent to cross Crow Creek would be one to which course and distance must necessarily yield. This material call is omitted, and from its omission arises the great difficulty of the cause.

That the lands should not be described as lying on both sides of Crow Creek, nor the lines call for crossing that creek, are such extraordinary omissions as to create considerable doubt with the court in deciding whether there is any other description given in the patent of sufficient strength to control the call for course and distance.

The majority of the court is of opinion that there is such a description. The patent closes its description of the land granted by a reference to the plat which is annexed.

The laws of the state require this annexa-
179*] tion. In *this plat, thus annexed to the patent, and thus referred to as describing the land granted, Crow Creek is laid down as passing through the tract. Every person having knowledge of the grant would also have knowledge of the plat, and would, by that plat, be instructed that the lands lay on both sides of the creek. There would be nothing to lead to a different conclusion, but a difference of about five degrees in the course, should he run out the whole chain of surveys in order to find the beginning of No. 12; and he would know that such an error in the course would be corrected by such a great natural object as a creek laid down by the surveyor in the middle of his plat. This would prove, notwithstanding the error in the course, that the lands on both sides of Crow Creek were intended to be included in the survey, and intended to be granted by the patent.

It is the opinion of the majority of this court that there is error in the opinion of the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee in this, that the said court instructed the jury that the grant, under which the plaintiff claimed, could not be legally run so as to include Crow Creek, instead of directing the jury that the said grant must be so run as to include Crow Creek, and to conform as near as may be to the plat annexed to the said grant; wherefore it is considered by this court that the said judgment be reversed and annulled and the cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court, that a new trial may be had according to law.

The Chief Justice added that he did not think the question about the true meridian had much to do with the case. The court decided it upon the plat. If it had not been for the plat they should have said that the land ought to be surveyed by the magnetic meridian.

In determining what lands are embraced in an ancient deed, the description in which is ambiguous, all the circumstances attending the making the grant are admissible, to give the court the same advantages for construing the deed which was possessed by the parties themselves. v.

THE CARGO OF THE SHIP FANNY, JENNINGS, MASTER.

Absent—TODD, J.

Under the non-intercourse act of 1809 a vessel from Great Britain had a right to lay off the coast of the United States, to receive instructions from her owners in New York; and, if necessary, to drop anchor, and in case of a storm to make a harbor; and if prevented by a mutiny of her crew from putting out to sea again, might wait in the waters of the United States for orders.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Connecticut, restoring the property to the claimants.

The American ship Fanny was laden at Greenock, in Scotland, with a cargo of British goods, the property of citizens of the United States, and sailed from thence on the 4th day of July, 1812, after the repeal of the orders in council, and before the war between Great Britain and the United States was known in Greenock. The orders to the captain were to proceed to New York; but unless he was perfectly sure of being allowed an entrance for ship and cargo at New York, he was not to go into the waters of the United States, but to send up a pilot boat with his letters so that the consignees might fix upon a port of discharge. The master had no knowledge of the war until his arrival on the coast, when he received it off Montaug Point, from a pilot boat, who also informed that several British frigates were off Sandy Hook, capturing American vessels. Whereopon he dispatched the pilot boat with letters for his owners by the way of New London. Soon afterwards it became calm, and the ship drifting too near the shore he dropped anchor. In the course of the night it came on to blow a gale, and finding it impossible to lay there he attempted to get under weigh and stand off, but before he could get up the anchor and make sail he drifted so far in that he could not fetch Montaug Point, and the pilot informing him that there was good anchorage ground in Fort-pond-bay, and that it would not be safe to keep out, he proceeded with the ship to that bay, intending to stand out as soon as the storm abated. Having there cast anchor and rode out the gale, his crew refused to get under weigh to go out of the waters of the United States, alleging that they understood he had a British license, and was going to put his ship *under the [*182 protection of British ships of war, and they were afraid of being impressed. He then determined to come out into the sound and there wait for orders, without going into any port. He did so, but was boarded about half way from Fort-Pond-bay to the race, Fisher's Island bearing north, and seized by a revenue cutter, who carried him into New London, where the cargo was libeled for having been shipped in Great Britain with the knowledge of the master, with intent to be imported into the United States, contrary to the provisions of the non-intercourse act of 28th June, 1809, (vol. 10, p. 13). In the District Court the cargo was condemned, but was restored by the Circuit Court. From this sentence the United States appealed.

The cause was argued by Jones for the United States, and Daggett for the claimants, in the absence of the reporter.

March 1st. Absent—TODD, J.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This case bears every feature of fairness. The voyage was undertaken upon the repeal of the orders in council. The vessel was laden in the short space of four days, and sailed without a knowledge of the war. Her destination was alternative—to New York, if she could enter; if not, to a British port. Upon arriving off Montaug, she receives notice of the war, and of the danger of capture in prosecuting her voyage to New York. A pilot boat is then dispatched to New London by the captain with notice to his owners of his situatiou, and a request for instructions.

To call off for instructions was fair and justifiable; and to obtain them it was necessary that he should await the return of the pilot boat. Thus circumstanced, a calm obliges him to drop anchor to prevent his drifting on shore, and a storm forces him into a bay for shelter. Whilst there his crew mutiny, and prevent his leaving the bay in order to lie off and await the return of his messenger; and whilst plying in the waters between *Montaug and New [*183 London, he is seized by the revenue cutter and forced into the latter port. We are of opinion that there was nothing either in action or intention which subjected this vessel to municipal forfeiture. A condemnation is claimed on no other ground; and the decree of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be affirmed.

The claims of the several parcels of merchandise seized in the Fanny rest on the same circumstances, and must likewise be restored.

THE FRANCES, BOYER, MASTER.

(Dunham & Randolph's claim.)

Absent—TODD, J.

If a British merchant purchase, with his own funds, two cargoes of goods in consequence of, but not in exact conformity with, the orders of an American house, and ship them to America, giving the American house an option within 24 hours after receipt of his letter to take or reject both cargoes—and if they give notice within the time that they will take one cargo, but will consider as to the other; this puts it in the power of the British merchant either to cast the whole upon the American house, or to resume the property and make them accountable for that which came to their hands. The right of property in the cargo not accepted does not, in transitu, vest in the American house, but remains in the British subject and is liable to condemnation, he being an enemy.

IN this case further proof was ordered at the last term. (See Ante, vol. 8. p. 354.)

Pinkney, for the claimants.

The property vested in Dunham & Randolph by the shipment. It was made in consequence of, although not strictly in conformity with, their orders; and delivery to the master of the vessel was tantamount to a delivery to themselves. The invoices and bills of lading all stated the goods to be shipped on their account and risk.

But if the property did not pass by the shipment, there is no reason why it should not pass in transitu, so that it be before capture. It is true that it cannot vest in transitu so as to defeat a vested belligerent right. But if the transfer take place, according to the original terms of the contract, before a belligerent right has accrued, it is not within the principle nor the spirit of the rule. If the further proof shows that the property had absolutely vested in Dunham & Randolph before the capture, it must be restored.

The further proof shows that the invoice, stating the shipment to be made for their ac-
184*] count and risk, was *sent to them; and that D. & R. wrote a letter before the capture of the Frances accepting the goods by the Fanny, and saying that they would consider as to those by the Frances.

The question then is, whether the whole of both cargoes did not thereby vest, eo instanti, in Dunham & Randolph.

The documentary evidence is clear and positive; it behooves the captors to show how it is qualified.

The condition upon which the property was to vest in the claimants was performed before the capture. They agreed to take the goods by the Fanny, and were instantly bound to take both shipments. They could not afterwards refuse that by the Frances. Their letter agreeing to take the goods by the Fanny was dated the 22d of August. The Frances was not captured until the 28th.

Emmett, on the same side.

The surplus of goods beyond the order, were chiefly if not entirely in the Fanny and accepted by D. & R., so that there can be no question on the ground that the goods by the Frances were not ordered.

Dunham & Randolph's letter of 19th of September explains the cause of their partial acceptance.

Dexter, contra.

This court has decided that this was a condition precedent, and that the transfer could not take place until the condition was performed.

The first question is, whether, if the goods were accepted by Dunham & Randolph, either in fact or in law, the property could pass in transitu. The general principle is, that it could not. The question always is, in whom was the right of property at the time of shipment? The simplicity and celerity with which the trial of captures must be conducted require that the question should be limited to the time of shipment. For the same reason prize courts [
185 have rejected equitable liens. If it were not so, further proof would be required in every case. (6 Rob., 329, note, Twen Venner Monk.) This rule is reasonable. Possession is evidence of ownership. Change of title in transitu is only an exception to the general rule. The exception should be confined to the cases in which it has been held necessary, as where possession could not be delivered, &c. The papers on board are always sufficient for the captors. In a prize court the documentary evidence is all important. This point is settled in the case of the claim of Jones & M'Gee in The Venus at this term.

As to the further proof produced in this cause, it is of very little importance. Dunham & Randolph did not comply with the condition upon which the property was to vest in them. They agreed to take a part only, and therefore were not entitled to any. It is immaterial whether this bound them to take the whole or not. It did not bind Thompson. He had a right to refuse to let them have any part, as they had not accepted the whole, or he might insist upon their taking the whole. It was at his option to call upon them to account, as his factors, for the whole. If Thompson had such a right, the captors have such a right, for by the capture they succeeded jure belli to all the rights of Thompson.

The time was past when they accepted the goods by the Fanny; they were in the custody of the law under the seizure of the revenue officers. Dunham & Randolph could only accept them conditionally; i. e., if they should be restored; but if they should be condemned they could not receive them.

It is not credible that they should have received them absolutely at the time they were under seizure. They did not bona fide accept them. It is not to be believed that they would take upon themselves the risk of their condemnation. It was probably done as a cover for the benefit of Thompson. The goods not being according to order, they were not bound to accept them. Thompson made a new proposal to them. They did not accept it, but offered new terms on their part, to which Thompson did not assent; so that there was no agreement. The property never passed.

Emmett, in reply. [*

There are two questions in this cause:

1. The first is a question of fact; did Dunham & Randolph accept the goods?

2. The second is a question of law; can such an acceptance change the title in transitu?

1. Dunham & Randolph, relying on the justice of the United States, and that they would protect goods the property of citizens of the United States, shipped on the faith of the declarations of their agents respecting the effect of the repeal of the orders in council, did bona fide accept them. This appears from their letter of the 19th of September. They had no motive to make the goods appear American rather than British—for in each case they would be equally liable to condemnation. They relied entirely upon the justice of the government.

The acceptance of the goods by the Fanny was absolute. The language used in regard to those by the Frances was intended to deceive the enemy, in case of British capture.

Thompson had no right to annex the condition to the acceptance. The goods were ordered by Dunham & Randolph. Thompson had agreed to execute the order, and was bound so to do. In shipping the goods he was executing an order, not making a bargain. Dunham & Randolph had a right to take to their own account the goods ordered, and receive the residue as a consignment to sell for the account of Thompson. If the question were now open, I should say that these goods never belonged to the shipper. They were purchased by the agent of Dunham & Randolph by their order and for their account.

2. In point of law, what was the effect of the acceptance? The acceptance was good for both cargoes or it was good for neither. Thompson either had or had not a right to annex the condition. If he had not, then the goods were the property of Dunham & Randolph ab initio. If he had a right to annex the condition, they 187] *had no right to reject it. They were bound to take all or none—if they took part they were bound to take the residue. Their reservation of a right to consider as to the goods by the Frances, was void. The only remaining question is, whether belligerent property can change in transitu.

Belligerent rights, in derogation of the common law, are to be construed strictly. They are not to be extended further than the state of war requires. (5 Rob., 161, Vrow Anna Catharina. The rules of war are not to be changed for the convenience of captors. It is true that the captors are to judge by the ship's papers; but here the ship's papers all showed the truth of the case; and nothing but a single letter cast any doubt upon it.

The rule extends no further than that a neutral title shall not originate during the voyage.

If the title originated anterior to the war; if the shipment was made before the war, and not in contemplation of war; and if the condition upon which the title was to change was annexed before the war, such a contract could not be in violation of the belligerent rights.

Thompson had not an option to hold Dunham & Randolph to the acceptance or not as he pleased. If they did an act which bound them, he was bound also.

The acceptance must be considered absolute, and the condition not in derogation of belligerent rights.

March 2d. Absent—TODD, J.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This claim is interposed to obtain restitution of three bales and nineteen boxes of goods captured in the Frances. As early as the 23d of July, 1811, these claimants, anticipating a repeal of the orders in council, give an order to Alexander Thompson, of Glasgow, to ship them a variety of articles. In July, 1812, upon the repeal of the orders in council, Thompson ships the articles ordered; and, originally intending 188] to ship to *the claimants a consignment on his own account, intermingles with the goods ordered a variety of others not contained in the order of the claimants. These goods are shipped by two vessels, the Fanny and the Frances; and, by a letter dated the 11th of July, 1812, Thompson advises the claimants of these shipments; and, after descanting on the merits of the articles, and declaring his reason for blending other goods with those shipped to their order, and his subsequent determination to make them an offer of the additional goods, he continues in these words: "I leave it with "yourselves to take the whole of the two ship-"ments, or none at all, just as you please. If "you do not wish them, I will thank you to "hand the invoices and letters over to Messrs. "Falconer, Jackson & Co. I think twenty-"four hours will allow you ample opportunity "for you to make up your minds on this point; "and if you do not hand them over within that "time, I will of course consider that you take "the whole. You will see, I think, the rea "sonableness of your taking the whole or none "of the shipment."

The Fanny reached the waters of the United States in safety; and, being seized by a revenue cutter, was carried into New London, where she has been finally restored. The Frances was captured on the 28th of August, by the privateer Yankee, and carried into Rhode Island. On the 22d of August, after the arrival of the Fanny, the claimants write to Falconer, Jackson & Co., and accept of the shipment by the Fanny; but with regard to that by the Frances they write in the following words: "His letter also speaks of another ship-"ment of thirty-one packages per Frances, "which, on arrival, we shall then hand in our "determination." On the first of September following they again write to Falconer, Jackson & Co., intimating their acceptance of the shipment by the Frances.

On this state of facts it is contended that the claimants are entitled to restitution—that they either had an original interest in the goods shipped, or had acquired one before the capture.

In the ordinary course of mercantile transactions, a delivery to a ship-master is a delivery to the consignee. *But it is evident that [189 this delivery may be absolute or qualified, and that the effect of it must vary accordingly. A voluntary agent has the option either to enter upon his agency in strict conformity with the instructions of his principal, or with such reservations or conditions as he may think proper to prescribe; and the only consequence is, that in the latter case he leaves his principal at liberty to adopt or repudiate his acts. The shipper who purchases goods on his own credit or with his own funds, is not acting in the ordinary capacity of a factor. If he were, the goods, even before shipment, would be the property of the individual on whose order the purchase is made. Such shipments are in the nature of a mercantile credit, and the shipper always retains the uncontrolled exercise of discretion in extending it. There was, therefore, nothing inconsistent with the relative rights of the parties in Thompson's imposing upon the consignees the condition of taking all or none of the two shipments; and the consequence was, that the delivery was not absolute, but qualified; and, until the condition performed the goods remained the property of the shipper; and had they suffered shipwreck the loss would have been his.

But it is contended that the condition was performed, and that this case forms an exception from the rule that, as to the exercise of belligerent rights, there shall be no transfer in transitu.

The acceptance of the cargo by the Fanny was on the 22d, the capture of the Frances on the 28th of August. It is contended that the acceptance of the Fanny's cargo was conclusive as to both shipments; and that, although partial in terms, it must, in law, have effect as to the whole, since such was the condition imposed by the shipper; and that it was, in fact, the intention of the claimants that such should be the effect of the acceptance; but the reservation was intended only as a ruse de guerre to guard against the effects of hostile capture.

There is certainly nothing illegal in resorting to devices to elude hostile capture; and where it can be clearly shown that property is really neutral or friendly, its being covered under 190] hostile habiliments for the purpose *of evasion, will not necessarily subject it to condemnation. But the evidence must be less equivocal than that relied on in this case. The property was already captured and libeled and as liable to American capture when the claimants' letter of the 19th of September was written. To receive such evidence, under such circumstances, to so critical a point, would be to surrender every belligerent right to fraud and imposition. The letter of the 22d of August must, therefore, be taken on its plain import, and such effect given to it as its words imply.

This letter contains an express exclusion of the goods under consideration; but it is contended that, as Thompson's letter left them no latitude, but obliged them either to choose or refuse the whole, their acceptance of part cast on them the property in the whole.

But we are of opinion that such was not the effect of this act of the claimants. The consequence of such a doctrine would be, that where a property is to be acquired upon a condition performed, the condition may be rejected, and yet the property acquired. It certainly put it in the power of the shippers either to cast the whole property upon the claimants or resume the property and make the consignee accountable for that which had come to his hands. Falconer, Jackson & Co., upon the arrival of the Frances, had she not been captured, would have had an undoubted right to demand the shipment made by her, on the ground of the claimants' not having accepted it within the time limited; and it would have been in vain for the claimants to have contested their right, whilst they held the letter of the 22d of August and Thompson's instructions on the subject of the acceptance. If, then, it rested with Thompson or his agent to retain the property in this shipment, or cast it upon the claimants, the consequence is, that the legal interest still remained in the shippers.

This conclusion on the state of interest in the parties, renders it unnecessary to consider the argument urged to except this case from the rule relative to changes of property in transitu; and we hope it will be, at all times, recollected that the reasoning in this case is not founded on the implied admission of the distinction taken by the claimants' counsel on this subject.

*THIRTY HOGSHEADS OF SUGAR,

(Adrian B. Bentzon, claimant,) [191

v.

BOYLE AND OTHERS,

Being the officers and crew of the privateer Comet.

Absent—TODD, J.

The produce of an enemy's colony is to be considered as hostile property so long as it belongs to the owner of the soil, whatever may be his national character in other respects, or whatever may be his place of residence.

An island in the temporary occupation of the enemy is to be considered as an enemy's colony.

In deciding a question of the law of nations, this court will respect the decisions of foreign courts.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, condemning 30 hogsheads of sugar, the property of the claimant, a Danish subject, it being the produce of his plantation in Santa Cruz, and shipped after the capture of that island by the British, to a house in London, for account and risk of the claimant, who was a Danish officer and the second in authority in the government of the island before its capture; and who, shortly after the capture, withdrew, and has since resided in the United States and in Denmark. By the articles of capitulation the inhabitants were permitted to retain their property, but could only ship the produce of the island to Great Britain. This sugar was captured in July, 1812, after the declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain, and libeled as British property.

Harper, for the appellant, made two questions:

1. Is this case within the rule of the British prize courts, that the produce of a plantation in an enemy's country shall be considered, while such produce remains the property of the owner of the soil, as the property of an enemy, whatever may be the general national character of the owner?

2. If it be within that rule, is the rule to be considered in this country as a rule of national law?

1. Sir William Scott, in laying down the rule in the case of The Phœnix (5 Rob., 26, 20), refers to the case of Juffrow Catharina in 1783, and the reason of the rule seems to be that the proprietor of the soil incorporates *him- [192 self with the permanent interests of the country. The rule is modern, and several exceptions have been made to it. In the case of The Phœnix the claim was made by persons of Germany for property taken on a voyage from Surinam to Holland, and described as the produce of their estates in Surinam, which was then a colony of Holland, with which Great Britain was at war, Germany being neutral. Sir William Scott admits that if the estates had been purchased while Surinam was in the possession of the British, the case would not have been within the general rule. So in the case of The Diana (5 Rob., 60, Eng. Ed.), those who settled in Demarara while it was under British protection were held not to be within the rule; and the case of The Vrow Anna Catharina (5 Rob., 161, Eng. Ed.) is another modification of the rule. These cases were excepted because the proprietors had not incorporated themselves with the permanent interests of the nation.

In the present case Mr. Bentzon never incorporated himself with the interests of the British nation, either permanently or temporarily. The character was forced upon him against his will; he always disclaimed it. He was by birth, and always continued, a Danish subject. He did not voluntarily purchase a plantation in the country of the enemy. When he purchased his estate Santa Cruz was neutral. The occupation of the island by the British was temporary; it was neither permanent in fact nor in law. Peace has restored the island to Denmark. Mr. Bentzon could not, by means of his estate in Santa Cruz, incorporate himself permanently with the interests of Great Britain.

2. But if the case comes within the British rule, are we to adopt that rule and extend it to a neutral nation which has never itself adopted it?

It is but the ordinary case of a neutral carrying on his lawful trade with our enemy; and has nothing in it contrary to the law of nations.

The rule contended for is a mere arbitrary rule, calculated to extend the field of rapine and to increase the maritime power of Great Britain. We have no interest in aiding those views.

193*] *What is the law of nations? Not a rule adopted by one nation only, but the law of nature, of reason, and of justice, applied to the intercourse of nations, and admitted by all such as are civilized. What is there in the code of any other nation to support this rule? It is to be found only in the maritime code of Great Britain, which is not more binding upon us than that of any other maritime power. It can have no force with us, but in cases where the rule of reciprocity or of retaliation will justify its use.

But Denmark has never used nor acknowledged the rule; and, therefore, we cannot justly enforce it against her. But if this court should adopt the rule, we trust it will be with the strictest limitation.

Pinkney, contra.

By the capture of Santa Cruz by the British, it immediately became the colony of an enemy. It is not necessary that the occupation should be perpetual; for the time it was indefinite, and during the occupation it was as much the colony of an enemy as any of his other possessions.

If, then, Santa Cruz was an enemy's colony, its produce, while it remained the property of the owner of the soil, was the property of an enemy. Sir W. Scott, in the case of The Phœnix (5 Rob., 21, Eng. Ed.), says that the rule has been so repeatedly decided both in that and the Superior Court that it is no longer open to discussion. No question can be made upon the point of law at this day.

The opposite argument goes to show that if the property in the soil be acquired before the capture of the island the owner would not be considered an enemy, although the island should remain permanently a British colony.

The case of The Phœnix contains no exception to the general rule; it is, however, said that the case of The Diana shows an exception; but that was a mere question of domicile. The rule now under consideration was not discussed.

*It is said that the party, in order to [*194 acquire the hostile character as to the produce of his estate, must incorporate himself with the interests of the enemy while the soil is in possession of the enemy. But the rule is not so. There is no difference whether he acquire the estate before or after it come into the possession of the enemy; if he continues to hold the estate, he becomes immediately incorporated with the nation jure belli.

But it is asked, is Great Britain to legislate for other nations? We say no. But this court will pay great respect to the English decisions on this subject; especially as the rule has been acquiesced in by all the nations of Europe. Not one of them has remonstrated—not even Denmark. It has, therefore, the positive authority of England, and the negative authority of all the residue of Europe. The rule is not harder than that of domicile, to which it is analogous.

Harper, in reply.

It is said that the rule is general, because all the nations of Europe have acquiesced in the English decisions. Several reasons may be given for this appearance of acquiescence. It is a recent rule. No authority can be produced for it earlier than 1783, just at the close of the American war. Peace having immediately taken place, removed the cause of complaint. And as to the late war with France, no case of the kind appears to have arisen. The edicts of France, &c., had a different bearing. It is said that the rule is analogous to that of domicile. But the rule of domicile rests upon a different principle—the principle of allegiance and the safety of the state. A man found in the enemy's country at the breaking out of the war receives the protection of that country, and is bound to do nothing to its injury; and if he do not remove in a reasonable time is to be considered as having incorporated himself with the interests of that country. The rule of domicile is rather a rule of municipal than of national law; and the principal ground of the rule is the necessity of preventing treasonable intercourse with the enemy. It becomes a part of national law only when it applied to neutrals. It has no analogy to the rule now in question, which *was adopted merely to prevent the [*195 interference of neutral with belligerent rights.

March 4th. Absent—Todd, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The island of Santa Cruz, belonging to the kingdom of Denmark, was subdued, during the late war, by the arms of His Britannic Majesty. Adrian Benjamin Bentzon, an officer of the Danish government, and a proprietor of land therein, withdrew from the island on its surrender and has since resided in Denmark. The property of the inhabitants being secured to them, he still retained his estate in the island under the management of an agent, who shipped thirty hogsheads of sugar, the produce of that estate, on board a British ship, to a commercial house in London, on account and risk of the said A. B. Bentzon. On her passage she was captured by the American privateer, the Comet, and brought into Baltimore, where the vessel and cargo were libeled as enemy property. A claim for these sugars was put in by Bentzon; but they were condemned with the rest of the cargo; and the sentence was affirmed in the Circuit Court. The claimant then appealed to this court.

Some doubt has been suggested whether Santa Cruz, while in the possession of Great Britain, could properly be considered as a British island. But for this doubt there can be no foundation. Although acquisitions made during war are not considered as permanent until confirmed by treaty, yet to every commercial and belligerent purpose they are considered as a part of the domain of the conqueror, so long as he retains the possession and government of them. The island of Santa Cruz, after its capitulation, remained a British island until it was restored to Denmark.

Must the produce of a plantation in that island, shipped by the proprietor himself, who is a Dane residing in Denmark, be considered as British, and therefore enemy property?

196*] *In arguing this question, the counsel for the claimants has made two points.

1. That this case does not come within the rule applicable to shipments from an enemy country, even as laid down in the British courts of admiralty.

2. That the rule has not been rightly laid down in those courts, and consequently will not be adopted in this.

1. Does the rule laid down in the British courts of admiralty embrace this case?

It appears to the court that the case of The Phœnix is precisely in point. In that case a vessel was captured in a voyage from Surinam to Holland, and a part of the cargo was claimed by persons residing in Germany, then a neutral country, as the produce of their estates in Surinam.

The counsel for the captors considered the law of the case as entirely settled. The counsel for the claimants did not controvert this position. They admitted it; but endeavored to extricate their case from the general principle by giving it the protection of the treaty of Amiens. In pronouncing his opinion, Sir William Scott lays down the general rule thus: "Certainly "nothing can be more decided and fixed as "the principle of this court and of the Su- "preme Court, upon very solemn arguments, "than that the possession of the soil does im- "press upon the owner the character of the "country, as far as the produce of that planta- "tion is concerned, in its transportation to any "other country, whatever the local residence of "the owner may be. This has been so repeat- "edly decided, both in this and the Superior "Court, that it is no longer open to discussion. "No question can be made on the point of law "at this day."

Afterwards, in the case of The Vrow Anna Catharina, Sir William Scott lays down the rule, and states its reason. "It cannot be doubted," he says, "that there are transactions so radically and fundamentally national as to impress the national character, independent of peace or war, and the local residence of the 197*] parties. The *produce of a person's own plantation in the colony of the enemy, though shipped in time of peace, is liable to be considered as the property of the enemy, by reason that the proprietor has incorporated himself with the permanent interests of the nation as a holder of the soil, and is to be taken as a part of that country, in that particular transaction, independent of his own personal residence and occupation."

This rule laid down with so much precision does not, it is contended, embrace Mr. Bentzon's claim, because he has not "incorporated "himself with the permanent interests of the "nation." He acquired the property while Santa Cruz was a Danish colony, and he withdrew from the island when it became British.

This distinction does not appear to the court to be a sound one. The identification of the national character of the owner with that of the soil, in the particular transaction, is not placed on the dispositions with which he acquires the soil, or on his general character. The acquisition of land in Santa Cruz binds him, so far as respects that land, to the fate of Santa Cruz, whatever its destiny may be. While that island belonged to Denmark, the produce of the soil, while unsold, was, according to this rule, Danish property, whatever might be the general character of the particular proprietor. When the island became British, the soil and its produce, while that produce remained unsold, were British.

The general commercial or political character of Mr. Bentzon could not, according to this rule, affect this particular transaction. Although incorporated, so far as respects his general character, with the permanent interests of Denmark, he was incorporated, so far as respected his plantation in Santa Cruz, with the permanent interests of Santa Cruz, which was, at that time, British; and though as a Dane he was at war with Great Britain, and an enemy, yet, as a proprietor of land in Santa Cruz he was no enemy; he could ship his produce to Great Britain in perfect safety.

The case is certainly within the rule as laid down in the British courts. The next inquiry is, how far will that rule be adopted in this country?

*The law of nations is the great [198 source from which we derive those rules, respecting belligerent and neutral rights, which are recognized by all civilized and commercial states throughout Europe and America. This law is in part unwritten, and in part conventional. To ascertain that which is unwritten, we resort to the great principles of reason and justice; but, as these principles will be differently understood by different nations under different circumstances, we consider them as being, in some degree, fixed and rendered stable by a series of judicial decisions. The decisions of the courts of every country, so far as they are founded upon a law common to every country, will be received, not as authority, but with respect. The decisions of the courts of every country show how the law of nations, in the given case, is understood in that country, and will be considered in adopting the rule which is to prevail in this.

Without taking a comparative view of the justice or fairness of the rules established in the British courts, and of those established in the courts of other nations, there are circumstances not to be excluded from consideration, which give to those rules a claim to our attention that we cannot entirely disregard. The United States having, at one time, formed a component part of the British empire, their prize law was our prize law. When we separated it continued to be our prize law, so far as it was adapted to our circumstances, and was not varied by the power which was capable of changing it.

It will not be advanced, in consequence of this former relation between the two countries, that any obvious misconstruction of public law made by the British courts will be considered as forming a rule for the American courts, or that any recent rule of the British courts is entitled to more respect than the recent rules of other countries. But a case professing to be decided on ancient principles will not be entirely disregarded, unless it be very unreasonable, or be founded on a construction rejected by other nations.

The rule laid down in The Phœnix is said to be a recent rule, because a case solemnly decided before the lords commissioners in 1783, 199] is quoted in the margin *as its authority. But that case is not suggested to have been determined contrary to former practice or former opinions. Nor do we perceive any reason for supposing it to be contrary to the rule of other nations in a similar case.

The opinion that ownership of the soil does, in some degree, connect the owner with the property, so far as respects that soil, is an opinion which certainly prevails very extensively. It is not an unreasonable opinion. Personal property may follow the person anywhere; and its character, if found on the ocean, may depend on the domicile of the owner. But land is fixed. Wherever the owner may reside, that land is hostile or friendly according to the condition of the country in which it is placed. It is no extravagant perversion of principle, nor is it a violent offense to the course of human opinion, to say that the proprietor, so far as respects his interest in this land, partakes of its character; and that the produce, while the owner remains unchanged, is subject to the same disabilities. In condemning the sugars of Mr. Bentzon as enemy property, this court is of opinion that there was no error, and the sentences is affirmed with costs.

EVANS v. JORDAN AND MOREHEAD.

Absent—TODD, J.

The act of January, 1808, for the relief of Oliver Evans, does not authorize those who erected his machinery between the expiration of his old patent and the issuing of the new one to use it after the issuing of the latter.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, in which the judges were divided in opinion upon the question whether, after the expiration of the original patent granted to Oliver Evans, a general right to use his discovery was not so vested in the public as to require and justify such a construction of the act passed in January, 1808, entitled "an act for the relief of Oliver Evans," as to exempt from either single or treble damages, the use, subsequent to the passage of the said act, of the machinery therein mentioned, which was erected subsequent to the expiration of the original patent and previous to the passage of the said act. The act (vol. 9, p. 20) authorizes the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Oliver Evans in the manner and form prescribed by the general patent law, granting to *him for the term of 14 years the [200 exclusive right of making, using, and vending for use, the machinery in question, "provided, "that no person who may have heretofore paid "the said Oliver Evans for license to use his "said improvements shall be obliged to renew "the said license, or be subject to damages for "not renewing the same; and provided also, "that no person who shall have used the said "improvements, or have erected the same for "use, before the issuing of the said patent, "shall be liable to damages therefor."

Harper, for the plaintiff.

The former patent of the plaintiff having expired, Congress, in consideration of the particular circumstances of his case, authorized a new patent to issue for another term of 14 years. Between the expiration of the old and the issuing of the new patent, the defendants had erected and used, and continued to use, the plaintiff's machinery in the manufacture of flour, contending that they were protected by the proviso of the act of January 21st, 1808.

We contend that the proviso does not authorize them to continue the use of the machinery after the issuing of the new patent, but merely protects them from damages for having used and for having erected for use the machinery in question, prior to the issuing of the new patent.

The second patent was intended to place Evans in the situation in which he would have been if the first patent had continued in force, except as to his right to damages for acts done in the intermediate time between the first and second patent. If the defendants chose to continue to use the machinery after the new patent, they were bound to pay for the right to use it.

E. I. Lee and P. B. Key, contra.

If the construction contended for on the other side be correct, the proviso was wholly useless, because the defendants needed no such protection. Evans could have no claim against them for acts done after his patent had expired, and before the issuing of the new patent. The defendants had a full and perfect right to erect and use the machinery. A law to oblige them now to abandon *their property or to [201 pay what Mr. Evans may choose to exact, is in the nature of an ex post facto law; and although it may not be absolutely unconstitutional, yet is so far within the spirit of the constitution that this court will not give such a construction to the proviso, if it can possibly be avoided. The proviso says that no person who shall have erected the machinery for use shall be liable to damages therefor. The defendants had erected the machinery for use, and are consequently not liable therefor. What can the proviso mean, unless to give those who are in the situation of the defendants the right to use their own machines lawfully erected? The inventions had become public property; every one had a right to use them. Congress did not mean to take away that vested right from those who had availed themselves of it. To deprive a person of the use of his property is equivalent to depriving him of the property itself. Congress could not mean to do this. This court will give the act such an equitable construction as will give effect to the proviso.

Harper, in reply.

The words of the proviso are clear and explicit, and admit not of construction. The legislature may have supposed that the new patent, which was intended to be a continuation of the old one, might have subjected those who had already erected the machinery to damages, and intended to guard against them. It is not certain that under the law under which the patent issued, this would not have been the effect; but it is sufficient if the legislature supposed it would have been. We are not bound to show the motives of the legislature; if their words are clear and explicit, there is no room for construction. The acts which are protected by the proviso are acts done before the issuing the patent; the opposite counsel contend that the legislature, when they said "before," meant after.

The proviso is too plain to bear an argument.

March 4th. Absent—TODD, J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

202*] *The question certified to this court by the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, and upon which the opinion of this court is required, is whether, after the expiration of the original patent granted to Oliver Evans, a general right to use his discovery was not so vested in the public as to require and justify such a construction of the act passed in January, 1808, entitled, "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," as to exempt from either treble or single damages, the use, subsequent to the passage of the said act, of the machinery therein mentioned, which was erected subsequent to the expiration of the original patent and previous to the passage of the said act.

The act, upon the construction of which the judges of the Circuit Court were opposed in opinion, directs a patent to be granted, in the form prescribed by law, to Oliver Evans for 14 years, for the full and exclusive right of making, constructing, using, and vending to be used, his invention, discovery and improvements in the art of manufacturing flour and meal, and in the several machines which he has discovered, invented, improved, and applied to that purpose.

The proviso upon which the question arises is in the following words: "Provided, that no person who may have heretofore paid the said Oliver Evans for license to use the said improvements, shall be obliged to renew said license, or be subject to damages for not renewing the same; and, provided also, that no person who shall have used the said improvements, or have erected the same for use, before the issuing of the said patent, shall be liable to damages therefor."

The language of this last proviso is so precise, and so entirely free from all ambiguity, that it is difficult for any course of reasoning to shed light upon its meaning. It protects against any claim for damages which Evans might make, those who may have used his improvements, or who may have erected them for use, prior to the issuing of his patent under this law. The protection is limited to acts done prior to another act thereafter to be performed, to wit, the issuing of the patent. To extend it by construction to acts which might be done subsequent to the issuing of the patent, would be to make, not to interpret the law.

*The injustice of denying to the de- [203
fendants the use of machinery which they had erected after the expiration of Evans's first patent and prior to the passage of this law, has been strongly urged as a reason why the words of this proviso should be so construed as to have a prospective operation. But it should be recollected that the right of the plaintiff to recover damages for using his improvement after the issuing of his patent under this law, although it had been erected prior thereto, arises, not under this law, but under the general law of the 21st of February, 1793.[1] The provisions in this law profess to protect against the operation of the general law, three classes of persons—those who had paid Evans for a license prior to the passage of the law; those who may have used his improvements; and those who may have erected them for use before the issuing of the patent.

The legislature might have proceeded still further, by providing a shield for persons standing in the situation of these defendants. It is believed that the reasonableness of such a provision could have been questioned by no one. But the legislature have not thought proper to extend the protection of these provisos beyond the issuing of the patent under that law, and this court would transgress the limits of judicial power by an attempt to supply, by construction, this supposed omission of the legislature. The argument, founded upon the hardship of this and similar cases, would be entitled to great weight, if the words of this proviso were obscure and open to construction. But considerations of this nature can never sanction a construction at variance with the manifest meaning of the legislature, expressed in plain and unambiguous language.

The argument of the defendants' counsel, that unless the construction they contend for be adopted the proviso is senseless and inoperative, is susceptible of the same answer.

*Whether the proviso was intro- [204
duced from abundant caution or from an opinion really entertained by the legislature that those who might have erected these improvements or might have used them prior to the issuing of the patent, would be liable to damages for having done so, it is impossible for this court to say. It is not difficult, however, to imagine a state of things which might have afforded some ground for such an opinion.

Although this court has been informed, and the judge who delivers this opinion knows, that the former patent given to Evans had been adjudged to be void by the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania, prior to the passage of this law, yet that fact is not recited in the law, nor does it appear that it was within the view of the legislature; and if that patent right had expired by its own limitation, the legislature might well make it a condition of the new grant that the patentee should not disturb those who had violated the former patent. This idea was certainly in the mind of the legislature which passed the act of the 21st of February, 1793, which, after repealing the act of the 10th of April, 1790, preserves the rights of patentees under the repealed law only in relation to violations committed after the passage of the repealing law.

1.—The 5th sec. of the act of 21st of February, 1793, which is the only section of that act which gives damages for violation of the patent right, is repealed by the 4th sec. of the act of the 17th of April, 1800, vol. 5, p. 90, the 3d sec. of which act gives treble damages, for the violation of any patent granted pursuant to that act, or the act of 1793.

If the decision above mentioned was made known to the legislature, it is not impossible but that a doubt might have existed whether the patent was thereby rendered void ab initio, or from the time of rendering the judgment; and if the latter, then the proviso would afford a protection against all preceding violations. But whatever might be the inducements with the legislature to limit the proviso under consideration, as we find it, this court cannot introduce a different proviso totally at variance with it in language and intention.

It is the unanimous opinion of this court that the act passed in January, 1808, entitled "an act for the relief of Oliver Evans," ought not to be so construed as to exempt from either treble or single damages, the use, subsequent to the passage of the said act, of the machinery therein mentioned, which was erected subsequent to the expiration of the original patent, and previous to the passage of the said act. Which opinion is ordered to be certified to the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia.

205*] *CARGO OF THE SHIP HAZARD
v.
CAMPBELL AND OTHERS.

Absent—TODD, J.

Neutral cover of British property. Time for further proof refused.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, affirming that of the Circuit Court which condemned the cargo of the Russian ship Hazard, as British property.

The Hazard was captured in December, 1813, about 6 miles from the land of Amelia Island, by a boat from the United States Flotilla, and carried into St. Mary's, in Georgia. The boarding officer, after examining the ship's papers, returned them to the captain, and asked the captain's permission to stay on board that night, which was granted; and at the request of the captain the boarding officer assisted in piloting the ship over the bar of the St. Mary's River, and brought her to anchor, after which he asked again for the ship's papers and then declared his intention to take the ship to St. Mary's. The captain in his protest states that the ship anchored nearer to the Spanish shore and harbor than to any other. The cargo was claimed in behalf of Luning, Gogel & Co., of Gottenburg.

Charlton and P. B. Key, for the appellants, contended,

1. That inasmuch as Russia and the United States had both adopted the principles of the armed neutrality, the principle that free ships should make free goods was, as between those two nations, to be considered as part of the law of nations, and that the cargo was protected by the Russian flag.

2. That the capture was made within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain, and therefore void.

3. That the boarding officer practiced a ruse de guerre not justifiable towards a neutral. Fraud in war may be *practiced to- [*206 wards an enemy, but not towards a friend. (Duponceau's Bynkershoek, 15.) There ought to have been a vis major on the part of the Americans. They ought not to have decoyed the vessel out of neutral waters in order to capture her.

4. That the testimony was not sufficient to counteract the documentary evidence as to the interest of the claimants. And,

5. That as the original German instructions from Luning, Gogel & Co. were taken away by the captors, and not produced on the trial, the claimants ought to be allowed time for further proof.

Jones and Pinkney, contra, insisted,

1. That there was no foundation for the idea that there can be a law of nations in force between Russia and the United States which is not equally in force between the United States and all other nations. The United States do not contend that by the law of nations free ships make free goods.

2. That there is no foundation in fact for the allegation that the ship was captured within the jurisdiction of Spain; and if there was, Spain has not complained.

3. The artifice used (if any was used) was perfectly justifiable. A neutral vessel must submit at all events. The deceit produced no effect of which the claimants can complain.

4. That the evidence of fraud in the use of the names of Luning, Gogel & Co. to cover this property was too manifest to require argument. And,

5. That in a case so clearly fraudulent as this, further proof ought not to be allowed. It is alleged that the German instructions have been fraudulently withheld by the captors; their contents have been stated in substance by the supercargo; and if they were here they could not alter the state of the case.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The ship Hazard and cargo were libeled as prize of war in the District Court of Georgia, where the latter was condemned, and the ship restored to the master with an allowance for freight. This sentence being affirmed by the Circuit Court, an appeal as to the cargo was taken to this court.

The cargo was claimed in behalf of Messrs. Luning, Gogel & Co., subjects of Sweden, and residing at Gottenburg. It is impossible to look at the proofs in this cause without being at once convinced that this house never had any interest in it. The papers found on board leave not the smallest doubt as to the hostile character of the property, which is also abundantly proved by the witnesses who were examined in the District Court. The shipment was made by Mr. Worrall, a British merchant at Liverpool, and an English supercargo put on board by the name of Diggles, under whom Mr. Dalmer, who filed the claim, was to act as assistant supercargo. Between Mr. Worrall and Mr. Lowden, who makes some figure in this transaction, there is proved to exist such an intimate connection as to render the one chargeable for the declarations and acts of the other, so far as they regard this shipment. Mr. Lowden, in a letter to his correspondent at Charleston, which was on board of the Hazard, says: "There is "likely to be a great deal of business done be- "twixt this and Amelia Island. The vessel "that this goes by has about £9,000 worth on "board. The parties interested are my par- "ticular friends." And a little further on: "It may perhaps be satisfactory to know that "we have full and unlimited authority from a "respectable house in Gottenburg, to make use "of their name upon any occasion whatever; "so that in case of capture or detention the "necessary proof could easily be produced of "the neutrality of the property." Mr. Worrall writes to Mr. Smith, of Charleston, that the "Russian vessel Hazard, bound to Amelia "Island, was laden by him in conjunction with "some other friends." There was, also, a memorandum on board for the government of 208] the supercargo, signed by Lowden, *containing, among others, this instruction: "Should "you be boarded at sea by men of war or pri- "vateers, you must uniformly declare the prop- "erty to belong to Luning, Gogel & Co., of "Gottenburg, as it is represented to be by the "documents accompanying the cargo. Men of "war are apt to board under false colors, and "if you don't stick to the text you may be de- "ceived." It may be asked here, why was the supercargo thus cautioned to be on his guard, unless he was in the secret, as he doubtless was, that the documents were colorable, and the property in fact British?

Mr. Dalmer, in the claim interposed by him for the cargo, does not swear to its neutrality, but only that the gentlemen at Gottenburg are owners thereof, as far as he is informed; and it is deserving of attention that Mr. Diggles, the supercargo, not only does not unite with the assistant supercargo in filing this claim, but, on being brought before the commissioners, refuses to be sworn or examined as a witness in the cause. On his examination, sometime afterwards, before the district judge, he states that "he is not acquainted with the owners of the "cargo or any part of it, and cannot swear that "Luning, Gogel & Co. are the owners; that he "received his instructions from Mr. Worrall as "agent of that house."

There was a short letter of instructions on board, to Diggles & Dalmer, dated 8th October, 1813, and proved to be signed by Luning, Gogel & Co., but the body of which must, no doubt, have been written by Mr. Worrall, or under his direction.

Now, although the invoice be made out in the name and for the account and risk of Luning, Gogel & Co., and a letter of instructions signed by them was found on board, it would be giving more weight to these formal documents than they are entitled to, should we say that they have satisfied us, notwithstanding the mass of evidence which this cause presents to the contrary, that the property was other than British through every stage of this transaction. Indeed, the advocates of the appellant, despairing to convince the court of its neutrality, rely principally on an irregularity in the capture, and on a suppression by the captors of a letter of instructions *from Luning, Gogel & [209 Co., which, it is said, came to their hands.

The capture, it is alleged, was made within the limits and jurisdiction of Spain. Of this there is no sufficient evidence, which renders it unnecessary to say what influence that fact, if established, might have on the ultimate decision of the court. The suppression of the paper in question is also very imperfectly made out; and if it had been brought into court and formed part of the evidence in the cause, it could not possibly do the appellant any good; for a paper merely signed by Luning, Gogel & Co., and converted into a letter of instructions by Mr. Worrall, in Liverpool, to suit his own purposes, as must have been the case here, could have but little effect in removing any one of the numerous doubts which the circumstances of this case are so well calculated to excite.

A motion has also been made for an order for further proof. If the court entertained any difficulty as to the reality of this transaction, or believed that Messrs. Luning, Gogel & Co. could prove that they were, in fact, the owners of this property, perhaps it might listen to the application, late as it is; but believing, as it does, that the evidence, as it now stands, is not susceptible of any satisfactory explanation, and that the captors have made out a clear title to the whole cargo shipped by Mr. Worrall, it cannot, in justice to them, make any such order.

* The sentence of the Circuit Court is therefore unanimously affirmed with costs.

SHIP SOCIETE, MARTINSON, MASTER

Absent—TODD, J.

If a neutral vessel be captured on her outward voyage from England to Amelia Island carrying a hostile cargo, which is condemned, and if, by the charter-party, the outward cargo is to be carried free of freight, but the homeward cargo is to pay at a certain rate to be ascertained by the nature of the cargo, yet the court will decree freight pro rata itineris of the outward cargo, to be assessed upon the principles of a quantum meruit. This court will not allow a new claim to be interposed here, but will remand the cause to the Circuit Court, where it may be presented.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, affirming the decree of the District Court, which allowed freight pro rata itineris, to the Swedish ship Societe, captured on her outward voyage from *England to Amelia Island, with a Brit- [210 ish cargo on board, which was condemned as prize of war.

By the charter-party, the outward cargo to Amelia Island was to be carried freight free, and the homeward cargo was to pay at the rate of threepence halfpenny a pound for cotton, and in the same proportion for other goods.

Pinkney and Jones, for the ship-owner,

Contended, that the freight ought to have been given according to the charter-party, and not to be ascertained by assessors, as ordered in the court below.

Swann stated that he wished to interpose a claim to the cargo of the ship Societe, in behalf of the officers and crews of the United States brigs Rattlesnake and Enterprize, as having been concerned in her capture; and was not certain whether this court would now receive the claim, or whether it should be presented to the court below.

The court said that it must be laid before the Circuit Court.

March 6th. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

William Little, a naturalized citizen of the United States, entered into a charter-party with Magnus Martinson, master of the Swedish ship called the Societe, at London, on the 10th day of November, 1813, whereby the said Martinson let, and the said Little took the said ship to freight for the voyage and on the terms mentioned in the charter-party.

It was agreed, among other things, that the vessel should take on board a cargo, prepared for her in the Thames, and deliver it at Amelia Island, freight free. At Amelia Island she was to take on board such return cargo as might be tendered to her. If she could not be loaded there, she was to proceed to such port in the 211*] *United States as the agent of Little should direct, and there receive her cargo. There were other provisional stipulations, and it was agreed that the freight on the return cargo should be a sum specified in the charter-party, which exceeded what would have been paid as freight on the return cargo alone had it been totally unconnected with the outward voyage.

On her voyage to Amelia Island the Societe was captured by an armed vessel of the United States, and brought into the District of Georgia, where the cargo was libeled and condemned as enemy property.

A claim for freight was interposed by the master of the Societe, and the District Judge appointed commissioners to ascertain the value of the freight on the voyage to Amelia Island, and decreed freight conformably to their report.

The claimant of the cargo and the master of the ship both appealed to the Circuit Court, where the sentence of the District Judge was, in all things, affirmed. From that sentence an appeal was prayed to this court.

The cases already decided in this court on the questions of domicile and trading with the enemy having completely settled this case, so far as respected the claim to the cargo, that part of the sentence is affirmed without opposition.

On the part of the master, it is contended that his right to freight ought to be measured by his charter-party, not by any estimated value of the freight on the voyage to Amelia Island.

Had the charter-party contained any stipulation for freight to Amelia Island, that stipulation would unquestionably have governed the court. But the outward cargo was to be delivered freight free. So far, then, as the case is controlled by the express stipulations of the charter-party, the vessel is entitled to the whole freight on a return cargo never taken on board, or to nothing.

The court knows of no case of capture where the *neutral vessel has been allowed [212 freight for a cargo not taken with her. There is no lien on one cargo for freight which may accrue on another. The court can perceive no principle on which a cargo to be delivered freight free can be burdened with the freight agreed to be paid on a cargo to be afterwards taken on board. In this case, too, no sum in gross is to be paid for freight, but a sum depending on the quantity and quality of the return cargo. As between the captor and neutral owner, the court cannot consider this as one entire voyage, but as distinct outward and inward voyages.

If the claim to freight on the return voyage, not commenced at the time of capture, cannot be sustained, the court perceives no other rule which could have been adopted than that which the District Court did adopt. Freight has been allowed on the whole voyage to Amelia Island as on a quantum meruit.

The captors not having appealed, no question can arise on the propriety of having allowed the ship any freight whatever. The court, however, will say that it is satisfied with the allowance which is made, and which is certainly an equitable one.

The sentence is affirmed with costs.

The officers of the Rattlesnake and Enterprize, armed vessels of the United States, offered a petition to this court to be permitted to claim for themselves and their crew a share of the prize in the case of the Societe; alleging that they are entitled equally with the officers and crew of the gun-boat by whom the said cargo was libeled; which petition was rejected, and the claim was not received, it being the opinion of this court that the claim of the petitioners must be made in the Circuit Court, to which the cause is remanded.

v.
GILES AND OTHERS.

Absent—TODD, J.

If a marshal before the date of his official bond, receive, upon an execution, money due to the United States, with orders from the comptroller to pay it into the bank of the United States, which he neglects to do, the sureties in his official bond, executed afterwards, are not liable therefor upon the bond, although the money remain in the marshal's hands after the execution of the bond.

Quære. Whether the sureties in a marshal's bond conditioned for the faithful execution of his duty, "during his continuance in the said office," are liable for money received by him, after his removal from office, upon an execution which remained in his hands at the time of such removal.

The comptroller of the treasury has a right to direct the marshal to whom he shall pay money received upon execution, and a payment according to such directions is good, and it seems he may avail himself of it upon the trial without having submitted it as a claim to the accounting officers of the treasury.

No debtor of the United States can, at the trial set off a claim for a debt due to him by the United States, unless such claim shall have been submitted to the accounting officers of the treasury and by them rejected, except in the cases provided for by the statute.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of New York, in 213 which the opinions of the *judges of that court were opposed upon ten questions of law arising out of a special verdict.

It was an action of debt brought by the United States against Giles, late marshal of the District of New York, and his sureties, upon his official bond, dated the 9th of January, 1801, the condition of which was as follows: "Whereas, the above bound Aquila Giles hath been appointed the marshal, in and for the New York district in pursuance of the act, entitled "an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States." Now, therefore, the condition of the preceding obligation is such, that if the said Aquila Giles shall, by himself and by his deputies, faithfully execute all lawful precepts directed to the marshal of the said district under the authority of the United States, and true returns make, and in all things well and truly and without malice or partiality, perform the duties of the office of marshal, in and for the said District of New York, during his continuance in the said office, and take only his lawful fees, then the preceding obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue."

The defendants pleaded performance. The replication set forth six breaches of the condition of the bond.

1. That the United States having, in May, 1799, recovered judgment in the District Court against one John Lamb for the sum of $127,-952.99, debt, and $20 damages, a writ of fieri facias was thereupon issued and delivered to the defendant, Giles, then being marshal, upon which he returned in August, 1799, that he had taken goods and chattels to the value of $50, which remained unsold for want of buyers, whereupon a writ of venditioni exponas and fieri facias was issued and delivered to the said defendant, Giles, on the 9th of January, 1800, by virtue whereof he sold the said goods and chattels for $50, which sum he received; and also, by virtue of the said writ, sold lands of Lamb to the amount of $60,000, which sum he received and continued to hold until the 1st of February, 1801, when he converted the same to his own use, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his said bond.

*2. That by virtue of the said writ [214 the defendant, Giles, on the 17th of September, 1800, sold other lands of Lamb for $60,000, which he received on the 20th day of January, 1801, and on that day converted the same to his own use, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of the bond.

3. That on the 17th of December, 1800, the comptroller of the treasury of the United States directed the defendant, Giles, to pay into the office of discount and deposit of the bank of the United States, at New York, to the credit of the account of the Treasurer of the United States, all such sums of money as should be made from the property of Lamb, by virtue of the aforesaid writ. That the defendant, Giles, afterwards, on the 23d of December, 1800, by virtue of that writ sold other lands of Lamb, to the amount of $60,000, which he received on the 15th of January, 1801, but has not paid the same, nor any part thereof, into the said office of discount and deposit in the manner directed, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his said bond.

4. That on the 1st of February, 1801, the defendant, Giles, being marshal as aforesaid, had in his hands as marshal, 14 bonds, the property of the United States (particularly described), and on that day converted the same to his own use, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his bond aforesaid.

5. That the defendant, Giles, having, in September, 1800, made the sum of $309.87, by virtue of a fieri facias in behalf of the United States, against one Richard Capes, and having received the same, eonverted it to his own use on the 1st of February, 1801, eontrary to the tenor and effeet of the eondition of his bond.

6. That the defendant, Giles, having so received all the several sums of money before mentioned, retained the same in his hands until the 27th of Mareh, 1801, when he was duly removed and dismissed from his offiee of marshal, and ceased to be marshal of the New York distriet, and has retained the said several sums of money in his hands ever since. That on the 2d of June, 1804, he was duly notified according 215 to law, by the comptroller *of the treasury of the United States, to render to the auditor of the treasury of the United States on or before the 10th of October, then next, all his accounts and vouehers for the expenditure of all moneys received by him as marshal of the New York distriet, but he has never rendered the same; eontrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his bond aforesaid.

The defendants rejoined,

1. To the first breaeh, that the defendant, Giles, reeeived the sum of $50, and sold the lands of Lamb for $30,000 and no more. That by the orders of the eomptroller of the treasury of the United States, he reeeived on the 10th of December, 1800, from the purchasers, $11,000, and no more, in eash, in part of the said sum of $30,000, and took from them, by the like orders of the said comptroller, their respeetive bonds and mortgages, 30 in number, for $19,000, being the residue of the said sum of $30,000. That on that day the United States were justly indebted to the said Giles in the sum of $20,000, for money paid by him at their request for their use, and for fees justly due by them to him as marshal, and for services performed by him for them at their request, when he retained in his hands the said sums of $50, and $11,000, as it was lawful for him to do, in part payment and satisfaetion of the sum of $20,000 so due to him from the United States, and then and there delivered to the United States the said several bonds and mortgages in full payment and satisfaetion of the said residue of the said sum of $30,000. Without that, that he converted to his own use the said sums of $50 and $60,000, in the replieation, in assigning the first breaeh mentioned, or any part thereof in manner and form, &c., any otherwise than by retaining the said sums of $50 and $11,000 as aforesaid.

2. To the seeond breaeh they say, that on the 17th day of December, 1800, the defendant, Giles, by virtue of the said writ, sold other lands of the said Lamb for the sum of $29,383 and 30 eents, and no more, and that by order of the comptroller he received from the purehasers only the sum of $10,000, and took their bonds and mortgages, 30 in number, for the payment *of the balance, being $19,383 [216 and 30 eents. That the United States were on that day justly indebted to him in the sum of $20,000 for moneys expended, &c., and for fees, and serviees, &e., wherefore he retained in his hands $8,950, part of the $10,000, in part payment and satisfaetion of the said sum of $20,000; and paid to the United States the sum of $1,050, the residue of the said sum of $10,000, and delivered to the United States the 30 bonds and mortgages aforesaid in full payment and satisfaction of the aforesaid sum of $29,383 and 30 eents; without that, that the said Giles converted to his own use, &e., otherwise than by retaining the said sum of $8,950 as aforesaid, &e.

3. To the third breaeh they say, that the said Giles did not receive $39,000, pareel of the said $60,000, but that he received in all the sum of $21,000 only from the buyers of the lands of the said John Lamb; and that the United States were on the said 15th of January, 1801, justly indebted to the said Giles in the sum of $22,000, wherefore he did not pay the said sum of $21,000 or any part thereof into the office of diseount and deposit of the bank of the United States, &e., but then and there retained the same in his own hands, as it was lawful for him to do, &e.

4. To the fourth breaeh they say, that the said Giles, on the 1st of February, 1801, delivered the said bonds to the attorney for the United States; without that, that he converted them to his own use, &c.

5. To the fifth breach they say, that on the 8th of January, 1801, the United States were justly indebted to Giles, in the sum of $22,000, wherefore he retained the said sum of $309 and 87 cents, in part payment and satisfaction of the said sum of $22,000; without that, that he otherwise converted the same to his own use, &c.

6. To the sixth breach they aver, that Giles did render his accounts to the auditor on the 10th of October, 1804, as he was required to do.

To these rejoinders there were general sur-217 rejoinders *and issues, except as to the rejoinder to the third breach; upon which the plaintiffs took issue as to $39,000, and demurred as to the retainer of the $21,000, upon which demurrer the court gave judgment for the United States.

The jury found a special verdict which stated in substance, as follows:

1. As to the first breach, they find that the defendant, Giles, was authorized by the officers of the treasury department of the United States, in executing the aforesaid writ of fieri facias to sell the lands of the said John Lamb, on the following terms, viz.: One-fourth of the purchase money to be paid in cash, one-fourth with interest in 2 years, one-fourth with interest in 3 years, and the residue with interest in 4 years from the day of sale, to be secured by bonds and mortgages; and was directed by the comptroller of the treasury, on the 17th of December, 1800, to pay over all moneys he might receive therefor into the office of discount and deposit of the bank of the United States, in the city of New York, to the credit and account of the treasurer of the United States. That the sales were commenced on the 26th of November, and continued from time to time to the 23d of December, 1800. That Giles received from the purchasers before the 9th day of January, 1801 (the date of the bond), $3,713.98, and no more, which sum, together with the sum of $50, which he had before received for the sales of the goods and chattels of the said John Lamb, he never had, nor any part thereof, before the said District Court, to render to the United States, and never paid the same, nor any part thereof, into the said office of discount and deposit, and that he has never been required by any rule or order of the said District Court to bring the said moneys into the court, nor to pay them over in any manner whatever. That between August, 1800, and May, 1801, he arrested one Elias Hicks by virtue of a writ of ca. sa. in favor of the United States, for $80,000, and by an indorsement thereon was directed to levy, by virtue thereof, $33,156 and 38 cents, besides marshal's fees and poundage. That he kept the said Hicks in custody, in execution, until he was discharged by order of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, pursuant to the act of 218 *Congress, entitled "an act providing "for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts "due to the United States." That the poundage fees for the service of that writ, if any such fees were due to the defendant, Giles, thereon, have not been paid to him, and that they amounted to the sum of $419.57.

That the United States also became indebted to the defendant, Giles, in the further sum of $8,133.96, for his own fees and services in taking the second census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States in the said district; and for moneys paid by him as marshal as aforesaid to his assistants in taking the said census, pursuant to the act of Congress in such case provided, which several sums, so due from the United States to the said Giles, amount to the sum of $8,553.53, and that he has retained the said sums of $50 and $3,713.98, from the times when they were received by him, and still retains them, claiming to hold and retain the same towards the payment and satisfaction of an equal sum due to him from the United States as aforesaid. But whether upon the whole matter aforesaid, the said Giles did in law convert the said several sums of $50 and $3,713.98 to his own use, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his said bond, the jurors aforesaid are ignorant, &c., and if the said Giles did so convert, &c., they assess the damages at $3,763.98, and if, &c.

2. As to the second breach, they find that the said Giles, having received such instructions as aforesaid from the comptroller of the treasury, and having sold the lands as afore said, afterwards, and after the 9th of January, 1801 (the date of the bond), and at different times before the commencement of this suit, received of certain other purchasers of the said lands, several other sums of money, viz., before the 27th of March, 1801 (when he was removed from office), the sum of $1,683.52; and after that day the sum of $17,191.58, which two sums amount to $18,875.10, which was all the money he received from the said purchasers after the 9th of January, 1801; and that the poundage, and charges due to and paid by the said Giles upon the execution and the said sales, and *legally chargeable against [219 the proceeds of the said sales amounted to the sum of $1,332.85, which being deducted from the said sum of $18,875.10, left the net sum of $17,542.25 in the hands of the said Giles, of the money so received by him after the 9th day of January, 1801. That on the 13th of April, 1803, he paid part of the same—viz., $6,238.35 —to Edward Livingston, who was then the United States attorney for the New York district, which payment was so made with the assent and approbation of the comptroller of the treasury of the United States, and agreeably to the usage and practice in that district; that the said Giles never had the said sum of $6,238.35, nor any part thereof, before the District Court to render to the United States, and has never paid the same to the United States in any other manner than by the said payment to the said Edward Livingston (if such payment was a payment to the United States), and never paid the same, nor any part thereof, into the office of discount and deposit, &c.

That as to another part of the said sum of $17,542.25, to wit: as to the sum of $4,479.68, the said Giles never had the same, nor any part thereof, before the District Court to render to the United States, nor paid the same into the said office of deposit, &c., but has ever since held and retained the same, claiming to hold and retain the same towards payment and satisfaction of an equal sum so due to him by the United States as aforesaid.

That as to the residue of the said sum of $17,542.25, to wit: as to the sum of $6,824.25, the said Giles never had the same, nor any part thereof, before the District Court to render to the United States, nor paid the same to the United States nor into the office of discount and deposit, &c., but still retains the same; but whether, in law, he converted the said three sums, viz.: the $6,238.35, $4,479.68, and $6,824.25, or either of them, to his own use contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his said bond, they are ignorant, &c. If in law he so converted the whole to his own use, then 220] they so find and assess *damages at $20,613.12. If he did not so convert the first of the said three sums, but did so convert the other two, then they so find and assess damages, at $14,374.77. If he did not so convert the first and second of the said three sums, but did so convert the third, then they so find and assess damages at $9,895.09. If he did not so convert the said third sum, but converted the two first sums, then they so find and assess damages at $10,718.03. If he did not so convert the said second sum, but converted the first and third sums, then they so find and assess damages at $16,133.44. If he did not so convert the two last of the said three sums, but converted the first, they so find and assess damages at $6,238.35. If he did not so convert the first and third of the said three sums, but converted the second, then they so find and assess damages at $4,479.68. And if he did not so convert either of the said three sums to his own use, then they so find.

3. As to the third breach, the jurors find that the defendant Giles did not receive the sum of $39,000, and as to the judgment upon the demurrer respecting the retainer of the sum of $21,000, they assess damages at $21,000.06.

4. As to the 4th breach, they find that the defendant Giles kept possession of the said fourteen bonds from the 1st of Febrnary, 1801, until the 3d of January, 1803, when he delivered them, with the assent and approbation of the comptroller of the treasury of the United States to Edward Livingston, then being the United States attorney for the District of New York. That on the 12th day of the same January, the comptroller of the treasury of the United States directed the said Giles to deliver the said fonrteen bonds to his sncccssor in office, John Swartwout, marshal of the said district, which the said Giles did not do.

But whether upon the whole matter aforesaid, he did, in law, convert the same bonds to his own use, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his said bond, they are ignorant, &c., and if, &c., then they assess damages at $5,255.73.

221*] *5. As to the fifth breach, they find that the defendant Giles, having levied and received the said sum of $309.87, never had the same before the District Court to render to the United States, nor paid the same to the United States, bnt retains the same claiming to hold it in payment and satisfaction of so much due to him by the United States as aforesaid, but whether in law he converted the same to his own use, contrary to the tenor and effect of the condition of his said bond, they are ignorant; and if, &c., then they assess damages at $309.87.

6. As to the sixth breach, they find that the defendant Giles did not reudcr to the auditor of the treasury of the United States all his accounts and vouchers, &c., in manner aud form as the defendants in their rejoinder have averred, and assess damages at six cents.

This cause came up to this court in the year 1812, with a certificate from the court below, that after argument upon the special verdict thereunto annexed, "it appeared that the opin- "ions of the judges were opposed upon all the "points submitted by and in the said special "verdict, and thereupon, at the request of the "attorney of the United States for the said dis- "trict, the judges of the said conrt have di- "rected this disagreement of opinion to be "certified," &c.

The cause was argued in this court at February term, 1812, by Dallas and Pinkney for the United States, and by Harper for the defendants.

But this court, upon inspecting the record, was of opinion that the points on which the opinions of the jndges of the Circuit Court were opposed, were too imperfectly stated to enable this court to form an opinion thereon.

Whereupon the cause was remanded to the Circuit Court, and came back with a certificate that the opinions of the judges of that Court were opposed upon the ten following questions arising on the said special verdict, viz.:

1. Whether judgment onght to be given for the plaintiffs *or for the defendants, as [222 to the sum of $3,763.98, being the damages assessed upon the first breach.

2. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $20,613.12, being the first sum assessed as conditional damages upon the second breach.

3. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $14,374.77, being the second sum assessed as conditional damages on the second breach.

4. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $9,895.09, being the third sum assessed as conditional damages on the second breach.

5. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $10,718.03, being the fourth snm assessed as couditional damages on the second breach.

6. Whether, &c., as to the snm of $16,133.44, being the fifth sum assessed as conditional damages on the second breach.

7. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $6,238.35, being the sixth sum assessed as conditional damages on the second breach.

8. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $4,479.68, being the seventh sum assessed as conditional damages ou the second breach.

9. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $5,255.73, being the damages assessed upon the fourth breach, and,

10. Whether, &c., as to the sum of $309.87, being the damages assessed upon the fifth breach.

The cause was now again argued by Jones for the United States, and Harper for the defendants.

On the part of the defendants it was contended,

1. That the obligors in this bond are not answerable *for the money received by [223 Giles before the date of the bond.

2. That he had a right to retain the amount due to him by the United Statcs.

3. That his receiving the bonds was not an official act for which his sureties are liable upon this bond; but if it was, that he was discharged by delivering them over to E. Livingston, the attorney of the United States, with the assent of the comptroller of the treasury.

4. That the sureties upon this bond are not liable for the money received by the defendant Giles after he was removed from office.

5. That the payment of the $6,238.35, to E. Livingston, the attorney of the United States for the District of New York, with the assent and approbation of the comptroller, was a good payment to the United States, and ought to be applied to the discharge of the first money which Giles received.

1. This bond is prospective. It covers no past transgressions. He received $3,763.98 before the date of the bond, and the United States being indebted to him at the same time in a larger amount, he immediately applied and retained it in part satisfaction of their debt to him. If he had no right so to do, it was a conversion of it to his own use; and that conversion took place before the date of the bond. The defendants, therefore, are not liable therefor upon this bond. If Giles is answerable for it to the United States, it is not in this action.

2. The defendant Giles had a right to retain in his hands the amount which was due to him from the United States.

This is not claimed as a set-off, but as an equitable deduction to be taken into view by the court in deciding what sum is to be recovered under the penalty of this bond. By the 26th section of the judicial act (vol. 1, p. 65), it is provided, "that in all causes brought before "either of the courts of the United States to 224] "recover the *forfeiture annexed to any "article of agreement, covenant, bond or other "specialty, where the forfeiture, breach or non-"performance shall appear by the default or "confession of the defendant, or upon demur-"rer, the court before whom the action is shall "render judgment therein for the plaintiff to "recover so much as is due according to equity." If, then, in this case there had been judgment by default or upon demurrer, or even upon confession, the court must have decided upon the principles of equity. The case, if not within the words of the statute, is within its spirit. He who seeks equity must do equity. But the defendant Giles was not a common debtor of the United States. He was an agent of the government, or a receiver of money, and bound to account for what he received. To account is to retain what he had a right to demand, and to pay over the balance only. If this principle does not apply to the poundage in the case of Hicks, yet it does to his expenses and compensation in taking the census. By the act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1800 (vol. 5, p. 24), it was made his duty to commence the business of taking the census, on the first Monday in August, 1800, and to close it in nine months, and he was authorized to employ assistants, and if he did not make his return within the period limited, he was liable to a penalty of $800. The act provides for the compensation of the marshal and his assistants, but no appropriation of money was made by Congress for his payment, until after the service had been performed, nor until March, 1801. (Laws of the United States, vol. 5, p. 300.) The marshal had only three ways to obtain the money necessary for this business, viz., either to advance his own money, which he was not bound to do, or to get an advance from the treasury, which it had no right to make, or to apply the money of the United States in his hands for that purpose. Congress having ordered him to do the work, gave him the right to use all the necessary means. The jury has found the fact absolutely that the United States was indebted to him at the time, which fact cannot now be denied. His obligation was not absolutely to pay over all the money which he received, but to account for it. If he shows that he expended it for the use of the United States, in a work which he was required to perform, he accounts for it. It was not strictly retaining the money, but applying it in a manner in which he was authorized to apply it.

*He was also entitled by law to the [225 poundage upon the ca. sa. against Hicks. By the act of the 28th of February, 1799 (vol. 4, p. 273), the marshal is allowed "for all other services" not therein enumerated, "such fees "and compensation as are allowed in the Su-"preme Court of the state wherein such services "are rendered."[1]

3. It was not the official duty of the marshal to take the bonds from the purchasers of the property. He was only bound to execute all lawful precepts, according to the law of the land. He could officially sell for money only; not on credit. If by the order of the comptroller he sold on credit, he did not do it as marshal, but as the agent of the treasury department. The condition of his bond is that he shall faithfully do his duty. His sureties are not liable for any act not done in the course of his duty.

But if he did act as marshal in receiving the bonds, yet his delivery of them to the attorney of the United States, with the assent of the comptroller, is a complete discharge; and if it were not, and if the delivery of them to the attorney of the United States be a conversion of them to his own use, it was after his removal from office, and the defendants are not liable for it on their bond.

4. The sureties upon this bond are not liable for money received by the defendant Giles after his removal from office. The condition of the bond is that he shall faithfully execute the duties of marshal "during his continuance in the said office." Admitting that, for the purpose of finishing the business in his hands at the time of his removal, his authority may continue quoad hoc, yet the liability of his sureties is expressly limited, by their contract, to the time of his continuance in office. It is like the case of Arlington v. Merricke (2 Saund, 411), which was an action by the Postmaster-General against the sureties of one of his deputies, upon a bond, the condition of which was, "that whereas, the plaintiff had appointed one *Thomas Jenkins his deputy, &c., to ex-[226 ecute the said office from the 24th of June next coming, for the term of six months next following; now, if the said Thomas Jenkins shall, for and during all the time that he shall continue deputy-postmaster, &c., execute all the duties," &c. The breach assigned was in not paying over moneys received by Jenkins after the expiration of the term of six months, and upon demurrer

1.—LIVINGSTON, J. It has been settled in the courts of New York that upon a ca. sa. the sheriff is entitled to poundage upon the whole sum due. But upon a fi. fa. he is only to receive poundage upon the sum received.

it was held that the defendant was only bound for moneys received within the six months. So in the case of Barker, executor of Pyott v. Parker (1 T. R. 287), the condition of the bond was that one J. H. should pay to E. Pyott, his executors or administrators, all such moneys as he should receive belonging to the said E. Pyott, his executors or administrators; but it was held that the defendant was not liable for moneys received by J. H. belonging to the executors of Pyott in their own right. So also in the case of the Liverpool Waterworks Company v. Atkinson (6 East., 507), the condition of the bond reciting that the defendant had agreed with the plaintiffs to collect their revenues "from time to time for twelve months," and afterwards stipulating that "at all times there-"after, during the continuance of such, his "employment, and for so long as he should "continue to be employed," he would justly account, &c., was held to confine the obligation to the period of twelve months mentioned in the recital. A similar decision was given by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the case of the Commonwealth v. Benton (4 Dall., 282), upon a sheriff's bond.

5. The payment to the attorney of the United States, which is found to have been in conformity with the usage in New York, and with the assent and approbation of the comptroller of the treasury, is a good payment to the United States.

The United States are represented by their attorney, as to everything relative to actions, in the same manner as a common person is represented by his attorney; an attorney at law has a right, within the year and day after judgment, to receive payment of the debt, and to enter satisfaction of the judgment upon the record. (Doug., 623, Yates v. Freckleton; 1 Com. Dig. tit. Attorney, B. 10.) The comp-227*] troller is the agent of the United *States for the purpose of assenting, and his assent binds the United States.

The defendant Giles received $3,763.98 before the date of the bond, and $1,683.52 after that date and before his removal from office, making together the sum of $5,447.50. The payment of the sum of $6,238.35 to Mr. Livingston, not having been specifically appropriated to the payment of any particular part of the amount due from Giles, we contend ought to be applied to the payment of that part of the money which he first received, which will discharge all that the defendants can be liable for upon their bond.

On behalf of the United States, it was said:

1. As to the money received by Giles before the date of the bond, it remained in his hand at the time the bond was executed. It was as much his duty to pay it over afterwards as it was before; and by not paying it over he was guilty of default for which his sureties are liable. Besides, the writ was not returnable until after the date of the bond, and there was no breach of his duty until after the writ was returnable, when he ought to have had the money in court to render to the United States.

2. As to the marshal's right to retain money due to him by the United States, it was said, that the claim never had been submitted to the accounting officers of the treasury, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1797 (vol. 4, p. 423, § 4), by which it is enacted, "that in suits between the United "States and individuals, no claim for a credit "shall be admitted upon trial, but such as shall "appear to have been presented to the account-"ing officers of the treasury, for their examina-"tion, and by them disallowed in whole or in "part," &c. If a marshal might retain money to answer his own claims, there would be no necessity of an appropriation by law; and it would subject the whole revenues of the government to the caprice of juries. The jury had no right to find a debt due from the United States. It was a matter coram non judice, unless it had been first submitted to the accounting officers of the treasury.

*A defendant cannot set off a debt, [228
if he could not maintain a suit for it. (4 Dall., 303, Commonwealth v. Blacklock.) This defendant could not maintain a suit against the United States. To give him the benefit of the set-off would be a violation of the prerogative of the United States.

The court stopped the counsel for the United States, upon this point, saying they were satisfied.

3. As to the delivery of the 14 bonds to the attorney of the United States, it was said that they were made payable to the marshal for the time being, and ought to have been delivered to his successor. That in taking the bonds he acted officially. He could only sell as marshal whether he sold for cash or on credit. A plaintiff may waive a rule intended for his benefit, and authorize a marshal to sell on credit. He had no authority to sell as agent, nor had he any orders to deliver the bonds to the attorney. The assent of the comptroller is not sufficiently found, for the jurors find a fact inconsistent with such assent, viz., that the comptroller ordered him to deliver them to his successor. The violation of his duty in not delivering them to his successor was prior to his delivery of them to the attorney.

4. As to the question whether the sureties in this bond are liable for the money received by Giles after the revocation of his commission, it was said that by the 28th section of the judiciary act (vol. 1, p. 67), "every marshal, when "removed from office, shall have power, not-"withstanding, to execute all such precepts as "may be in his hands at the time of such re-"moval," and in case of the death of any marshal his deputies shall continue in office, unless otherwise specially removed, and shall execute the same in the name of the deceased, until another marshal shall be appointed and sworn; and the defaults or misfeasances in office of such deputies in the meantime, as well as before, shall be adjudged a breach of the condition of the bond given, as before directed, by the marshal who appointed them.

Here a liability is imposed upon the sureties which is not expressed in the condition of the bond.

*The words in the condition, "dur- [229
"ing his continuance in the said office," mean, so long as he shall have authority to act by virtue of the said office. So far as regarded the execution and return of the writ of fieri facias against John Lamb, his authority to act by virtue of his office continued after the revocation of his commission. The writ was not completely executed until it was returned fully satisfied. Quoad hoc he still continued in office within the meaning and intention of the bond. In all the cases cited by the opposite counsel, the time was limited by months, and not by such a general expression as this. The act of Congress contemplates a course of duty, and intended that the bond should cover all his responsibility, and no doubt the parties intended to give such a bond as the act required. Congress could not have intended that upon the removal of a marshal, perhaps for wasting the public money, or for insolvency, he should still go on to collect other moneys, after his sureties upon his official bond should be discharged by his removal from office.

5. As to the payment of the sum of $6,238.35 to the attorney of the United States, it was said that the district attorney, as such, has no authority to receive the public money collected by the marshal. In common cases the authority of an attorney at law arises from presumption, and is limited to a year and day after judgment, in which time, if execution be not taken out, the judgment is presumed to be satisfied. But as to the attorney for a government no such presumption of authority arises. The United States is considered as a moral person only, and can only act by proper organs legally appointed; and their acts can bind the United States only so far as they act within the powers given them by law. In no other government does the law officer receive the public money without the order of the treasury. The treasury department is to manage the whole fiscal concerns of the nation. There is no exception in favor of the attorney of the United States. His duty is only to support the claims of the United States. There is no necessity that such a power should be lodged in his hands. He gives no security. Why should the money be taken out of the hands of a responsible officer and given to one not responsible?

230*] *But this payment is claimed as a credit, and it is a sufficient answer to say, that it has never been submitted to the accounting officers of the treasury. The jury had no right to find such a credit, or even to act upon it.

But if it is to be considered as a payment to the United States, still it does not appear that at the time of payment it was applied to the discharge of any particular part of the money which Giles had received. The United States have therefore a right now to apply it to such part as they please, and this court will make such application of it as will be most beneficial to the United States. That is to say, if the court shall be of opinion that the sureties are not liable for the money received by Giles after his removal from office, they will apply this payment to that part of the debt, and leave the sureties liable for the part received while he was in office.

March 7th. Absent—TODD, J.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a joint action of debt on a bond dated the 9th of January, 1801, in the penalty of $20,000.

The condition of the bond is as follows: Whereas, the above bound Aquila Giles hath been appointed the marshal in and for the New York district, in pursuance of an act, entitled "an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," now, the condition of the preceding obligation is such, that if the said A. G. shall, by himself and his deputies, faithfully execute all lawful precepts directed to the marshal of the said district, under the authority of the United States, and true returns make, and in all things well and truly and without malice or partiality perform the duties of the office of marshal in and for the said District of New York during his continuance in the said office, and take only his lawful fees, then the obligation to be void, &c.

General performance is pleaded by the defendant, to which a replication is filed assigning six breaches, to all of which there was a rejoinder, sur-rejoinder and issue.

*On the issue joined on the first breach [231 the special verdict finds, that on the 20th of January, 1800, the said writ of vend. exp. and fi. fa. was delivered to Giles, who, before he proceeded to execute it, was authorized by the officers of the treasury to sell the land of Lamb, under said writ, for one-fourth part of the purchase money in cash, one-fourth part payable in two years from the time of sale, one-fourth part in three years, and the other fourth part in four years, with interest from the time of sale, to be secured by bonds and mortgages payable to Giles as marshal, or to the marshal of the district for the time being, to and for the use of the United States. That on the 17th of December, 1800, John Steel, being comptroller of the treasury, did instruct and order Giles to pay into the office of discount and deposit of the bank of the United States in New York, to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, all the moneys which might be levied from the property of Lamb, by virtue of the said writ of vend. exp. and fi. fa. That under these instructions Giles proceeded to sell the lands of John Lamb; the sales of which commenced on the 26th of November, 1800, and were continued until the 23d of December in the same year. That during the sales and afterwards, and before the execution of the bond by the defendants, Giles received from some of the purchasers several sums amounting to $3,713.98, and no more, which sums were paid as the fourth of the purchase money of the lands bought by them. That Giles has never brought into court, or paid into the bank, either of the said sums, of $50, which was received on the 20th of January, 1800, on a sale, by Giles, of the chattels of Lamb, or of $3,713.98, and that he never was required so to do by any order of the District Court. That while Giles was marshal as aforesaid, a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum was issued out of said court and delivered to him against Elias Hicks, on a judgment recovered by the United States, on which was indorsed a direction to Giles to levy the sum of $33,156.38, besides marshal's fees and poundage; that Hicks was arrested by Giles and in custody on said writ until discharged therefrom by the Secretary of the Treasury; that the poundage fees of Giles thereon, if any were due, have not been paid to him by anyone, and that they amount, if due at all, to $419.57. *That the United States became in- [232 debted to Giles, while marshal as aforesaid, in the sum of $8,133.96, for his fees and services, in taking the second census in his district, and for moneys paid to his assistants, in taking the said census, pursuant to the act in such case made and provided, which sums amount to $8,553.53, in part payment of which Giles retains the two sums of $50, and of $3,713.98. But whether in law he converted them to his own use contrary to the form and effect of the condition of the said bond, the jurors pray the advice of the court. If the court shall think that it was such a conversion the jurors assess damages on this breach at $3,763.98. But if the court shall be of opinion that such retaining was no conversion, then the jury say that he did not convert the same to his use.

2. The second breach assigned, is that Giles having, on the 17th of December, 1800, sold other lands of Lamb under the writ aforesaid for the further sum of $60,000, received the said sum on the 20th of January, 1801 (which was after the execution of the bond), and converted and disposed of the same to his own use.

On the issue joined on this breach, the jury find that Giles, having made the sales as aforesaid, and under the instructions and orders aforesaid, received from the purchasers, after the 9th of January, 1801, and before the 27th of March, 1801 (when he went out of office), the sum of $1,683.52; and after that day the sum of $17,191.58, amounting in the whole to $18,875.10, which sums were paid by the purchasers, as the cash payment which was to be made by them for the land so purchased (which sales took place between the 26th of November, and the 23d of December, 1800). That the poundage and charges due to and paid by Giles, and legally chargeable against the proceeds of these sales, amounted to $1,332.85, which leaves in the hands of Giles the net sum of $17,542.25 of the moneys received by him after the 9th of January, 1801. That on the 13th of April, 1803, he paid to Edward Livingston, who was district attorney, the sum of $6,238.35, which was receipted for on the said writ of execution. That it was then and yet is the usage and prac- [*233] tice *within the said district for the marshal to pay to the district attorney all moneys levied by executions issued by the said attorney, in suits in which the United States are plaintiffs. That this payment was made by and with the approbation of the comptroller of the treasury, and that Giles has never in any other way paid the said last-mentioned sum to the United States, or brought it into court in any other way than by paying it as aforesaid to the district attorney. That as to another part of the said sum of $17,542.25, to wit, the sum of $4,479.68, Giles retains the same towards satisfaction of an equal sum due to him as aforesaid from the United States. That the residue of the said sum, to wit, the sum of $6,824.22, Giles retains to this day. But they pray the advice of the court whether Giles converted to his own use, contrary to the condition of the said bond, the said several sums of $6,238.35, $4,479.68, and $6,824.22.

1. If he converted all of the said sums contrary, &c., then they assess damages at $20,613.12.

2. If he did not convert the said sum of $6,238.35, paid to Livingston, but converted the other two sums, then they assess damages at $14,374.77.

3. If he did not convert the two first sums, to wit, the sum of $6,238.35 and $4,479.68, but did convert the sum of $6,824.22 to his own use, then they assess damages at $9,895.09.

4. If Giles did not convert to his own use the sum of $6,824.22, but did convert the other two sums, then they assess damages at $10,718.03.

5. If Giles did not convert to his own use the said sum of $4,479.68, but did so convert the other two sums, they assess damages at $16,133.44.

6. If Giles did not convert to his own use the two sums *of $4,479.68 and $6,824.22, [*234 but did so convert the other sum of $6,238.35, then the damages are assessed at $6,238.35.

7. If Giles did not so convert the two sums of $6,238.35 and $6,824.22, but did so convert the other sums of $4,479.68, they then find damages to the amount of $4,479.68.

8. If, in the opinion of the court, Giles converted neither of those sums to his own use, contrary to the effect of the said condition, then the jury find that he did not so convert either of them.

On the issue joined on the fourth breach, the following facts appear on the special verdict: That, on the 1st of February, 1801, Giles had in his hands, as marshal, 14 bonds, described in assigning the fourth breach, belonging to the plaintiffs. That Giles continued marshal until the 27th of March, 1801, when he was duly removed and dismissed from office, and John Swartwout on the same day appointed marshal of the said district in his place, who continued marshal until the commencement of this suit. That the said bonds continued in the hands of Giles until the 3d of January, 1803, when they were delivered by him to Edward Livingston, who was then district attorney, by and with the assent and approbation of the comptroller of the treasury. That on the 12th of January, 1803, Gabriel Duval being comptroller of the treasury, as such did instruct, order and direct Giles as late marshal to deliver immediately the said 14 bonds to the said John Swartwout, his successor in office, which he did not do. If the court shall think this was a conversion of these bonds, the jury assess damages at $5,255.73. If the court think otherwise the jury find it to be no conversion.

On the subject of the fifth breach, it is found that Giles, on the 1st of September, 1800, received as marshal $309.87, on an execution issued against one Richard Capes at the suit of the plaintiffs, which he retains towards satisfaction of an equal sum due from them to him. If this be deemed a conversion by the court, *the jury assess damages at $309.87. [*235 But if the court shall not think so, then the jury, on this breach, find for the defendants.

It is certified that the Circuit Court were divided in opinion on the following points arising on this record:

1. Whether judgment should be given for the plaintiffs, or for the defendants as to the sum of $3,763.98, being the damages assessed upon the first breach assigned.

2. The like question as to the sum of $20,613.12, being the first sum assessed as conditional damages on the second breach.

3. The same question as to the sum of $14,374.77, being the second sum conditionally assessed on the second breach.

4. The like as to the sum of $9,895,99, being the third sum assessed conditionally on the second breach.

5. The like as to the sum of $10,718.03, being the fourth sum assessed on the second breach.

6. The like question as to the sum of $16,133.44, being the fifth sum assessed on the second breach.

7. The like question as to the sum of $6,238.35, being the sixth sum assessed on the second breach.

8. The like question as to the sum of $4,479.68, being the seventh sum assessed on the second breach.

9. The like question as to the sum of $5,255.73, being the damages assessed on the fourth breach.

10. The like question as to the sum of 236] $309.87, *being the damages assessed on the fifth breach.

The first point on which the direction of this court is asked will require a decision of the following questions:

1. Had Giles a right to retain out of the public moneys in his hands any sums which might be due to him for his services or for advances made by him as marshal?

2. Are the defendants liable, under the condition of their bond, for the two sums of $50, and of $3,713.98, received by Giles, the first sum on the 20th of January, 1800, and the other on some day prior to the 9th of January, 1801, which is the date of their bond?

The act of Congress providing for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the receivers of public moneys is so explicit as to preclude every difficulty in deciding on the first question. The third section of the law provides, that where a suit shall be instituted against any person indebted to the United States, the court shall grant judgment at the return term, on motion, unless the defendant shall in open court make oath or affirmation that he is equitably entitled to credits, which had been, previous to the commencement of the suit, submitted to the consideration of the accounting officers of the treasury, and rejected, specifying each particular claim so rejected in the affidavit. The next section declares that in suits between the United States and individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon trial but such as shall appear to have been submitted to the accounting officers of the treasury for their examination and by them disallowed, unless it shall appear that the defendant at the time of trial is in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting a claim for such credit by absence from the United States, or by some unavoidable accident.

It is clear, then, that if this had been an action against Giles for moneys received by him as 237] marshal, he could not *have availed himself of any credit against the public, however well founded the claim might be, unless he had previously submitted his title to such a credit to the accounting officers of the treasury and they had rejected the same, or unless he had been prevented from so doing by one of the accidents mentioned in the law.

On this subject the special verdict, on the issue joined on the sixth breach, finds that Giles did not render to the auditor of the treasury all his accounts and vouchers for the expenditure of moneys received by him as marshal as aforesaid.

If, then, in a suit against Giles himself, a claim for these credits, under existing circumstances, could not be sustained, neither can it in an action on this bond, without permitting the defendants to do indirectly what the marshal could not have done directly, and in this way avail themselves of what the law seems to regard as a default, or at least a negligence on the part of their principal.

We are next to consider whether the defendants are liable for the sum of $50, and the sum of $3,713.98, received by Giles. The first sum was received on the 20th of January, 1800, on the fi. fa. and vend. exp. issued against the estate of John Lamb; and the other was received on the same writ after the 27th of November, 1800, but before the date of the bond upon which the action is brought.

It is contended by the defendants that the retaining of moneys which were received by Giles anterior to the date of the bond, cannot be considered a conversion by him within the terms of its condition; while the plaintiffs, on the contrary, maintain that as these sums were in his hands at the time of its execution and have not been paid over to this day, his official delinquency is made out within the meaning of this instrument, and the responsibility of the defendants thereby established.

On this point two of the judges think that the conversion of these sums by Giles was complete by his not paying them into the bank, agreeably to the directions of the comptroller of the treasury under which he had acted, and that this having taken place prior to the execution of the *bond the defendants are not [238 liable therefor within the terms of its condition, which are entirely prospective. Two other members of the court are of opinion that no demand appearing on the record to have been made on the marshal for these sums, either by rule of court or otherwise, no conversion of them is made out; and that therefore the defendants are not liable. The other two judges think that although these two sums were received before the date of the bond, yet as they remained in the hands of the marshal, afterwards, and have not been paid over to this day, the defendants are accountable for them.

Judgment must therefore be rendered for the defendants as to the sum of $3,763.98, being the damages assessed upon the first breach assigned.

The next question, on which the court below was divided, related to the sum of $20,613.12, being the first sum assessed as conditional damages upon the second breach.

By recurring to the special verdict it appears that Giles, having had a fieri facias put into his hands on the 20th of January, 1800, against the real estate of John Lamb, was directed by the officers of the treasury to make sales of it for one-fourth of the purchase money in cash, and for the other three-fourths on certain credits and securities specified in said instructions. These sales commenced on the 26th of November, 1800, and continued until the 23d of December following.

After the 9th of January, 1801, and before he went out of office, which was the 27th of March, following, Giles received of the purchasers of Lamb's estate, $1,683.52, and after that day the sum of $17,191.58, amounting in the whole to 18,875.10. Deducting the poundage and charges which the special verdict finds to be legally chargeable against this sum, there was left in Giles's hands the net sum of $17,542.25 of the moneys received by him after the 9th of January, 1801. On the 13th of April, 1803, he paid to E. Livingston, who was district attorney, with the assent and approba-239*] tion of the *comptroller of the treasury, the sum of $6,238.35.

Before we examine into the deductions claimed by the defendants against the sums received by Giles for cash payments, it will be necessary to settle for what portion of these sums they are chargeable under the condition of their bond.

Of these sums a majority of the court think they are liable for the sum of $1,683.52, which was received between its execution and the marshal's dismission from office.

Are they also responsible for the sum of $17,191.50, which was received by Giles after another marshal came into office?

The bond on which this action is brought having been given for the faithful performance of the duties of Giles as marshal, during his continuance in office, two of the judges are of opinion that his sureties are not liable for the conversion of the last-mentioned sum, which took place after he was out of office, by not paying it as directed by the comptroller of the treasury. Two of the judges do not consider the finding of the jury as fixing upon Giles a conversion of this sum at any time, inasmuch as it does not appear that he was ever demanded to pay the same into court, or in any other way. The other two judges are of opinion that the marshal, being authorized to do certain acts even after his removal from office, the condition of the bond embraces defaults committed after such dismission, as well as before, and that the defendants are therefore liable for the said sum of $17,191.50, although received by Giles after he ceased to be marshal.

It is, however, the opinion of the majority of the court that the defendants are not so liable under this bond.

Another question arises under this opposition of opinion in the Circuit Court; and that is whether the payment to Edward Livingston in April, 1803, was a payment to the United States.
240*] *It was supposed that this payment, being made contrary to the comptroller's order of the 17th of December, 1800, which was to pay all moneys received under this execution into the branch bank, at New York, cannot be regarded as valid.

It is true such instructions are found by the jury, which certainly do not authorize such payment, yet it is also found, possibly, from some subsequent instructions of the comptroller which do not appear, or at any rate from evidence, which must have satisfied the jury that such payment was made with the assent and approbation of the comptroller of the treasury. This finding, correct or not, must conclude the court; and it has only to say whether a payment be good if made under such authority.

The comptroller is authorized by law "to direct prosecutions to be commenced for all debts due to the United States." During such prosecutions he gives directions how they shall be conducted, and how the moneys recovered shall be paid. If, therefore, he directed, or assented to, the payment to Livingston, it is difficult to say that Giles erred, or was guilty of any fault, either in pursuing his instruction or in making a payment with his assent and approbation.

It yet remains to settle, under this branch of the division of the Circuit Court, how the payment to Livingston is to be applied. For although the sum paid to him is much greater than the sum of $1,683.52, for which it is decided that the defendants are liable, the benefit, which they may derive from such payment, will depend in some measure on the manner of its application.

It does not appear that any direction was given by Giles, or that any election was made by either party how it should be applied. Nothing more is known than that Giles, being then indebted to a much larger amount for moneys received at different times under the execution against the property of Lamb, made this payment without declaring what particular item in the account of the United States against him should thereby be discharged. If there be no designation how a sum paid on account *shall be credited, and there be sureties [241 for part of the debt, as was the case here, it seems reasonable to some of the judges to let them have the benefit of it, by applying the credit in such a way as to exonerate them, so far as the sum paid shall be sufficient for that purpose. If regard be had to the order of time in which the moneys were received by Giles, it will be seen that the sum of $3,763.98, which is the first sum for which he is in arrear, was received by him prior to the 9th of January, 1801; and the next sum for which he is accountable, to wit, the sum of $1,683.52, came into his hands after that day, but previous to the 27th of March, 1801, and after this other moneys were received by him. These two sums together are not equal to the payment which was made to Livingston.

Following this order, the sum for which the defendants are liable being among the first that were received, and being recoverable with interest on their bond, would on this principle be extinguished by the first payment if it were sufficient, as was the case here, to discharge all the moneys which had been received prior to the receipt of the sum for which the defendants are answerable, and that also. But this is not the opinion of a majority of the judges. They think, and such is the decision of the court, that the United States have yet a right to apply these payments in a way most beneficial to themselves and so as not to extinguish the sum of $1,683.52, for which the defendants are accountable.

The court, then, is of opinion that judgment must be given for the defendants as to the sum of $20,613.12, being the first sum assessed as conditional damages upon the second breach.

Judgment must in like manner be given for the defendants as to all the other sums assessed as conditional damages upon the second breach.

It is next to be decided whether the conditional damages of $5,255.73, assessed on the fourth breach, be recoverable against the defendants.

These damages are given in consequence of 242 a supposed *conversion by Giles of the fourteen bonds mentioned in the special verdict. But it being found that these bonds were delivered to Edward Livingston, by and with the assent and approbation of the comptroller of the treasury, the court is unanimously of opinion, for reasons already assigned, that such delivery was no conversion of these bonds by Giles, and that therefore judgment must be rendered for the defendants, as to the said sum of $5,255.73, being the damages assessed as aforesaid on the fourth breach.

The last question which is submitted to us regards the sum of $309.87, which it appears by the finding under the fifth breach assigned, was received by Giles on the first of September, 1800, on an execution at the suit of the United States, against Richard Capes, which was retained by Giles towards satisfaction of an equal sum due to him. This sum being received prior to the execution of the bond, must be regarded within the reasons assigned for not considering the defendants liable for the two sums of $50 and of $3,713.98, herein before mentioned, and judgment must, accordingly, in the opinion of a majority of the court, be given for the defendants, as to the said sum of $309.87, being the damages assessed upon the fifth breach.

It will be seen that the court is of opinion that the defendants are liable under their bond for the sum of $1,683.52, which was received by the marshal after its execution, and before he went out of office; but by not one of the findings on the different breaches assigned does it appear to have been contemplated that this sum alone might be recoverable in this action, and accordingly no conditional damages are assessed to suit that state of the case.

The court, therefore, can only give its directions as to the questions submitted to them, which are:

That it must be certified to the Circuit Court for the District of New York in the second circuit.

1. That judgment must be given for the defendants as to the sum $3,763.98, being the 243 damages *assessed upon the first breach of the condition of the bond assigned in the replication of the plaintiffs.

2. That judgment must be given for the defendants as to the several sums of $20,613.12, of $14,374.77, of $9,895.09, of $10,718.03, of $16,133.44, of $6,238.35, and of $4,479.68, being the several sums assessed, as conditional damages on the second breach.

3. That judgment must be given for the defendants for the sum of $5,255.73, being the damages assessed upon the fourth breach, and,

4. That judgment must be given for the defendants for the sum of $309.87, being the damages assessed upon the fifth breach.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
JOB L. BARBER.

Absent—TODD, J.

Fat cattle are provisions, or munitions of war, within the meaning of the act of Congress of the 6th of July, 1812, to prohibit American vessels from proceeding to or trading with the enemies of the United States, and for other purposes.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Vermont, the opinions of the judges of which court were opposed.

Barber was indicted, "for that he being a citizen of the United States, and inhabiting the same, with force and arms, at," &c., "did attempt to transport over land thirty head of fat cattle, which were then and there articles of provision and munitions of war, and were all of the value of $300, from a place in the United States, to wit, from Berkshire, in the said District of Vermont, to a place in the province of Lower Canada, to wit, to St. Armons, in the province aforesaid, contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute of the United States, in such case made and provided," &c. There was another count in which he was charged with the actual transportation of them. After a verdict against him, he obtained a rule to show cause why judgment *should not be [244 arrested, because fat cattle were neither provisions nor munitions of war within the meaning of the act of Congress entitled "an act to prohibit American vessels from proceeding to or trading with the enemies of the United States, and for other purposes" or any other act of Congress.

By the second section of the act referred to, which was approved on the 6th of July, 1812, (vol. 11, p. 300), it is enacted, "that if any citizen of the United States, or person inhabiting the same, shall transport or attempt to transport, over land, or otherwise," "naval or military stores, arms or the munitions of war, or any article of provision, from any place of the United States to any place in Upper or Lower Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick," "the person or persons aiding or privy to the same shall" "be considered as guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to be fined in a sum not exceeding $500, and imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, in the discretion of the court."

March 7th. Absent—TODD, J.

This court ordered it to be certified to the Circuit Court, that it is the opinion of this court that fat cattle are provisions, or munitions of war, within the true intent and meaning of the act entitled "an act to prohibit American "vessels from proceeding to or trading with "the enemies of the United States, and for "other purposes."

THE SCHOONER ADELINE AND CARGO.

Absent—TODD, J.

American property recaptured may be restored on payment of salvage, although the libel prays condemnation of it as prize of war, and does not claim salvage. Salvage is an incident to the question of prize.

A test affidavit ought to state that the property at the time of shipment, and also at the time of capture, did belong, and will, if restored, belong to the claimant, but an irregularity in this respect is not fatal.

A test affidavit by an agent is not sufficient, if the principal be within the country, and within a reasonable distance from the court. But if test affidavits, liable to such objections, have been acquiesced in by the parties in the courts below, the objections will not prevail in this court.

By the act of the 3d of March, 1800, one-sixth part only is allowed to a privateer for salvage upon the recapture of the cargo on board a private armed vessel of the United States, although one-half be allowed for the recapture of the vessel.

The property of persons, domiciled in France, (whether they be Americans, Frenchmen or foreigners) is good prize, if recaptured after being 24 hours in possession of the enemy, that being the rule adopted in the French tribunals.

Further proof will be allowed by this court, where the national character and proprietary interest of goods recaptured do not distinctly appear.

Property unclaimed will be decreed as good prize.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of New York.

The American letter of marque schooner Adeline sailed from Bourdeaux for the United States with a cargo, owned in part by citizens 245] of the United States, and *in part by French subjects. On the 14th of March, 1814, she was captured, in the bay of Biscay, by a British squadron, who put a prize crew on board and ordered her for Gibraltar. After being six days in the possession of the British she was recaptured, near Gibraltar, by the American privateer Expedition, who put a crew on board and ordered her for the United States, where she arrived and was libeled, with her cargo, by the recaptors, in the District Court at New York, as prize of war. The vessel was claimed by citizens of the United States residing therein, as was also part of her cargo.

Another part of the cargo was claimed by French subjects resident in the United States. Another part by French subjects, resident in France. Another part by citizens of the United States, resident in France. Another part by French subjects whose residence was not stated, and another part by citizens of the United States, whose residence was not stated, and another part by "alien friends," without stating of what nation, or where resident. Some of the claims stated the property, at the time of capture, to belong to the persons therein mentioned, and did not state to whom it belonged at the time of shipment.

The District Court condemned, as good prize, all the property owned by Frenchmen and other persons resident in France, and all the property of those persons whose residence was not stated; and restored all the property belonging to persons resident in the United States, upon payment of one-sixth for salvage. The vessel was restored, by consent of parties, on payment of one-half for salvage. The sentence was affirmed pro forma, by consent, in the Circuit Court.

The recaptors appealed as to the rate of salvage, which they contended ought to have been one-half, and those claimants, whose property was condemned, also appealed.

The case was submitted to the court by J. Woodward and Emmet for the recaptors, and by Irving and D. B. Ogden for the claimants, upon their written notes for argument.

*J. Woodward, for the recaptors, [246 made the following points:

1. That such claims as date the property from the time of capture, instead of the time of shipment, are insufficient and invalid.

2. That the recaptors are entitled to the whole of the French property, by the rule of reciprocity.

3. That the captors are entitled to a rate of salvage of one-half upon the American property, or such other and higher rate than the rate decreed in the courts below, as this court may adjudge.

4. That the recaptors are entitled, by the same rule of reciprocity, to the whole of the property of such Americans as were at the time of capture domiciled in France, or resident there for commercial purposes.

5. That the recaptors are likewise entitled to all property the national character of which is not defined by the evidence.

6. That the property of those Frenchmen who are described as having a mere temporary residence in the United States, cannot be considered as American.

7. That the property of persons described as alien friends, without mentioning to what nation they belong or where they reside, must also be taken to be French, or decreed to the captors for uncertainty.

8. That the persons described in the claims as citizens of the United States, without stating their residence at the time of shipment, or at any other time, must, under the circumstances of the case, be considered as residing in France.

There are claims which date the property from the time of capture. This we say is insufficient. The claims should state the property from the time of shipment at least. This is necessary to prevent transfer in transitu, and to give effect to, and preserve the simplicity and dispatch of the preparatorio investigation.

*An important question in this case [247 is, what is to become of the American part of the cargo of an armed American vessel, recaptured by an American private armed vessel?

The recaptors in the first place contend that the part of the cargo above mentioned is casus omissus as to the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1800.

If the court should decide that there is a casus omissus, then the fate of this part of the cargo will depend upon the common law.

The recaptors contend that the common law is, that if property so situated has remained twenty-four hours in possession of the enemy of the captured party, they are entitled to the whole of the property as prize of war. To this they cite Grotius de jure belli ac pacis, lib. 3, ch. 16. (Vattel, book 3, ch. 13, § 196.) This right upon recapture is here clearly laid down to privateers to be devested only by the laws of each state and treaties. Our treaty with France is silent except as to restoration on capture by pirates; this being ex delicto, there is no change of property by the original capture. (See also Professor Marten's summary of the law of nations, book VIII, ch. 3, § 10). "In "order to encourage privateering, those con- "cerned in it are allowed to hold all the mer- "chant vessels and merchandise they take from "the enemy or his subjects, without any re"serve whatsoever with respect to the redemp-

"tion of them by the proprietor."

The only remaining question on this point would be, what kind of possession consummates the right of the privateer? Twenty-four hours' possession has been considered "firm" possession, and sufficient to consummate this right by an almost common usage, and recognized by almost all the treaties of maritime powers. (1 Rob., 151, Amer. ed.; 2 Azuni, 306, 308, 312, in a note 275, 276, and 282.)

If the above considerations are inapplicable and the salvage of this part of the cargo is governed by the acts of Congress, then by those acts the recaptors are entitled to one-half.

248*] *The unqualified right of the privateer to the property captured, or recaptured, is, after firm possession, clear at common law, and the doctrine of taking away that right by salvage is derogatory to that law. If this be so, the act of Congress is derogatory to the common law, and must be liberally construed in favor of privateers.

The reward has always been out of the whole subject matter—the cargo as well as vessel and armament; and it is with confidence contended that a separation of the cargo so as to subject it to one-sixth salvage, while the vessel and armament affords one-half, is, if it exists at all, anomalous to the act of the 3d of March, 1800, and at war with the usage and treaties of all maritime states.

The reason of increasing the salvage upon an armed vessel is the merit of battle, and it is evident that the cargo is as well won by battle as the armament and vessel.

But if the whole of the act of Congress be to be taken together, and the 2d section be permitted to reflect a light upon the 1st section, it will appear that Congress could have had no other meaning than that the salvage should be increased upon the cargo as well as the vessel and armament. In the second section where they give a salvage upon their own property thus captured by a private armed vessel, they give one-half of the goods on board as well as of the vessel and armament.

But should not the cargo be considered as a mere incident to the vessel and follow its fate and character?

As to the French property we are entitled to the whole as prize of war by the foregoing rule of twenty-four hours' possession, which is the rule in France. Reciprocity is the rule in this case. (See the act of 1800, section 3.)

The twenty-four hour rule is established in France by ordinance of 15th June, 1779, with respect to all recaptures by privateers. France, in her treaty with Holland, 1st May, 1781, secures the twenty-four hour right to privateers. The court will find those acts of France referred to in 2 Azuni 276 and 282; 2 Dallas, 2, Miller et

249*] al.* v. Ship Resolution. This is a strong case establishing the twenty-four hour right. It refers to an ordinance of Congress declaring this rule as to us, and refers to the French ordinance to the same point. It admits the twenty-four hour rule, but excludes its application to that case, that being the case of a neutral capture which conveyed no right. (See also the case of The Mary Ford, 3 Dall., 188, M'Donough v. Dannery.)

On the right of the recaptors on the 4th point of the case, they will not enlarge by argument, as they consider it well established; nor on that of the 5th point, than merely to observe that it appears to be just, ex necessitate, and comes under the description of confusion in the civil law; nor as to the 6th point, than to observe that there is no standard by which a character can be reflected upon these claimants but the voyage itself; which makes them either American or French. The description of the claim negatives the idea of their being American; they must, of course, be French. The 7th point must meet the same construction for the same reason.

As to the principle contended for in the 8th point of the case, it may be remarked, for elucidation, that some of the claimants described as in this point, turn out, by the evidence, to be resident in France for commercial purposes.

Is the owner of the vessel entitled to freight exclusive of salvage?

The recaptors say the vessel is not entitled to freight because she would have been condemned had she been brought into England. But if entitled to freight, the captors have saved that freight, and are therefore entitled to one-half as salvage. Freight may remain, after all the rights of the captors are deducted, to be adjusted between the vessel and the freighters.

This question can only apply to the American part of the cargo; for as to the French, the rule is to vest the property absolutely in cases of recapture after twenty-four hours' possession; the postliminii right and all its incidents are destroyed.

Irving*, in behalf of the owners of [250 the vessel, and of such parts of the cargo as were claimed by persons resident in the United States.

The schooner Adeline is a registered American vessel owned by Isaac Levis and William Weaver, native citizens of the United States, and residents of Philadelphia, and was commissioned as an American letter of marque. She commenced her voyage from Bourdeaux, to a port in the United States, in the month of March, 1814, having on board a cargo owned principally by citizens of the United States and others residing in our territory. In the course of this voyage she was first captured by two British vessels of war, and was afterwards, and before her condemnation as prize, recaptured by an American private armed vessel. Upon her first capture most of her papers were taken from on board by the captors, and those which were left have been delivered up to the District Court at New York, and transcripts of the same are contained in the record before this court.

In these cases most of the claims and test affidavits specify the property respectively claimed, at the time of shipment in the Adeline, and at the time of capture, to have been owned by citizens and residents in the United States.

Many of the claims and test affidavits testify that the goods thus claimed vested in the claimants before and at the time of capture and recapture; and generally all the claims are supported by the respective bills of lading. In truth, there is not a paper attached to this record which falsifies any claim or casts any suspicion upon them. An objection has been taken to some of those claims, because they do not state that the property vested in the claimants at the time of shipment, and that, for aught that appears to this court, the property might have been transferred in transitu.

Admitting this to be the fact, how can such transfer prejudice those claimants? The vessel was an American vessel coming from a French port to a port of the United States.

The rule that the character of property must 251] be determined *by its shipment, that the same cannot be transferred in its transit, but, as respects belligerent rights, must be considered as remaining the same as at the time of shipment, applies only to enemy property. (Danckebaar Africaan, 1 Rob., 99, Amer. Edit.; The Vrow Margaretha, 1 Rob., 285, Amer. Edition.)

But the claims objected to will be found, on examination, to agree with those which are in common use in the admiralty courts of England, even in cases where the property is captured as prize of war. (The Fortuna, 2 Rob. in the Appendix, 313.) It is sufficient to assert property in the claimants and to negative the allegation of title in the enemy at the time of capture. Those claims and teste affidavits are testimony in a prize cause, and will be deemed satisfactory, unless there is some evidence in the ship's papers or preparatory examinations to invalidate them. (See the Duke of Newcastle's letter in the appendix to Chitty; 6 Rob., 55, The Haabet.)

But to proceed to the merits of this case. Upon examining the libel of the captors, the first inquiry will be, whether this property could be captured as prize, for it has been so libeled.

The commission to our private armed vessels, under the act declaring war, authorizes the retaking of property captured which was originally American. The property thus retaken can only present a case of salvage, because the title of the original proprietors never has been devested; and that equally whether the property was originally American or neutral.

The interest of the captured property does not vest in the captor until after final adjudication. (5 Rob., 167, Am. Edit., The Elsebe; 4 sect. prize act, 11th vol. United States laws.) And the 5th section of the prize act provides, "that all vessels, goods and effects the property of any citizen of the United States, or of persons within and under the protection of the United States, or of persons permanently resident within and under the protection of any foreign prince, government or state in amity with the United States, which have been captured by the enemy and which have been recaptured by vessels commissioned as aforesaid, shall be restor-252] ed to the rightful owners, upon *payment by them respectively of a just and reasonable salvage, to be determined by the mutual agreement of the parties concerned, or by the decree of any court having competent jurisdiction, according to the nature of each case, agreeably to the provisions heretofore established by law."

The present case, then, before the court, determines itself to be a case of salvage, if there was a right to recapture, and if the service rendered was meritorious. The right is not questioned, for the recapture was from the enemy; nor is the service questioned, for the property would have been otherwise lost.

It becomes, however, a matter of inquiry, whether the recaptors under their present libel can have a decree for salvage. The papers taken from on board the vessel, and the examinations in preparatorio proved that the recaptured vessel was an American vessel, and that her cargo was in part American and in part French. It was evident, therefore, that the recapture could only present a case of salvage; and as such the vessel and cargo should have been libeled. But the libelants have proceeded against the property as prize of war, and have asserted title to it as such in all their allegations. Must they not make out those allegations, and, if they fail, can they, as a last resort, seek for salvage, when such has not been prayed for in their libel, nor in any manner spread upon the record before this court?

But if the court should be of opinion that a decree for salvage can be made upon the libel, claims and disclosures in this record, then the only question will be the amount of this salvage. The recaptors contend for a moiety, and we, that they should have but a sixth. Which is right, must depend upon a just construction of the act in cases of recapture, passed 3d March, 1800 (5 vol. United States Laws, 38; 1 Graydon, 418).

The first branch of the first section of this act provides that "a recaptured vessel, other than a vessel of war or private armed vessel, shall be restored, on payment of one-eighth (if taken by a public armed vessel) of the value of the recaptured vessel and cargo; and if retaken by a private armed vessel, of one-sixth."

*The second branch of that section [253 provides, "that if the recaptured vessel shall appear to have been set forth and armed as a vessel of war before such capture, or afterwards and before the retaking, the salvage shall be one moiety of the true value of such vessel of war or privateer."

The act contemplates two descriptions of cases as to vessels, viz., armed and unarmed; the former are to pay a moiety, the latter a sixth. The law having settled the amount, the court, when it ascertains what the law is, will adhere to the provision. Now, the construction must depend on the evident meaning and intent of the legislature, as clearly to be gathered from a view of the whole provision; and it may be adopted as a fundamental rule, that where there is an express provision, there shall not be a provision by implication; expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

The first clause provides for the case of unarmed vessels and goods. It commences by stating, "that when any vessel unarmed, or when any goods" (not on board such vessel, but wholly. in the disjunctive), when any goods (reaching any and every case of goods), when any such are captured by a private armed vessel, one-sixth shall be allowed. It proceeds throughout the whole clause in the disjunctive, saying that such vessel or goods shall be restored on payment of one-sixth as salvage.

The second clause is studiously confined to vessels, "and if such vessel" (passing by goods altogether and leaving the general provision for goods unimpaired), and if such vessel is armed, then one moiety of the true value of such vessel is to be allowed; repeating and carefully confining the provision to the vessel, and that, too, with a peculiar particularity. Congress in express words distinguish; they place private unarmed vessels and all goods recaptured on the same footing.

The fifth section of the prize act, laws of the United States (vol. 11, p. 240, § 5), declares that the above provisions are to regulate cases of salvage.

But it is contended that the intent of a stat- 254*] ute is to be *considered, that the design of the legislature is to be consulted. I grant it, wherever there is any ambiguity in a statute. In such case it is the privilege and duty of the court to give a just construction. But this only holds in cases where there is great obscurity, not in cases where the provisions of the statute are clear and explicit. To hold that a court can intermeddle with such provisions is to clothe the court with legislative as well as judicial powers—to authorize it to make laws instead of only expounding them.

It is laid down in Parker, 233, that where the words of a statute are expressed, plain and clear, they ought to be construed according to the genuine and natural signification and import, unless by such exposition a construction or inconsistency would arise in the statute by reason of some subsequent clause from whence it might be inferred that the inteut of parliament was otherwise."

But it is said that from the provision contained in the second section of the statute we may gather that it was the intent of the legislature to give a moiety of the goods on board a private armed vessel to the recaptor, as well as a moiety of the vessel. When we come to examine this section, which is thus pressed into the service of the first, we shall find that it relates entirely to the property of the United States which may be re-captured. It has no reference to the first section; it speaks of property of a different description, differently owned. In the last clause it provides, that if a vessel of war of the United States is recaptured by a private armed vessel, a moiety of any goods on board shall be allowed. The government, deeply interested in the preservation of our public vessels; the national character, deeply interested in the rescuing from the enemy our vessels of war and in not permitting them to exist as mementos of their triumph; the national prosperity, deeply interested in preserving to us the means of our own strength and in preventing the same from being added to that of the enemy; these are sufficient inducements for our goverument to make an extraordinary provision. The service is not rendered to an individual, it is rendered to the nation; it is more meritorious; feelings of patriotism more than of interest may have impelled to the performance of the duty; 255*] *the danger was greater, the object more important; the recompense should therefore be increased.

But the first and second sections of this statute are wholly independent. The first relates to the recapture of private property, either by our public or private armed vessels. The second relates to the recapture of public property, either by our public or private armed vessels. Each section is perfect in itself, and each independent of the other; neither requires the interpositiou of any court to explain them.

"Wherever any words of a statute are obscure or doubtful, the intention of the legislature is to be resorted to in order to find the meaning of the words." (Plowden 57, Wimbish v. Tailbois.)

Where words of a statute are plain and positive, it is not the province of the court to search after new constructions.

Justice Buller remarks in the case of Bradley and another v. Clark (3, T. R. 201), "that, with regard to the construction of statutes according to the intention of the legislature, we must remember that there is an essential difference between the expounding of modern and ancient acts of parliament. In early times the legislature used to pass laws in general and in few terms; they were left to the courts of law to be construed, so as to reach all the cases within the mischief to be remedied. But in modern times, great care has been taken to mention the particular cases in the contemplation of the legislature, and therefore the courts are not permitted to take the same liberty in construing them as they did in expounding the ancient statutes."

But the provisions in this statute respecting salvage were not unadvised provisions hurried over without deliberation. Congress, in consequence of the partial war with France, had been called on to legislate repeatedly upon the subject.

The first provision was by statute 28th June, 1798 (4 vol. United States' Laws, p. 154, § 2d). This is general *for vessel and cargo [256 armed or unarmed, one-eighth; all are placed on the same footing.

The second provision was by statute of March 2d, 1779 (4th vol. United States Laws, p. 472). That gives, if detained 24 hours, one-eighth; if 48 hours, one-fifth; if 96 hours, one-half; without any distinction between vessel and goods, or armed and unarmed.

The next year, induced by the inconvenience or inequality of the former laws, they made a deliberate provision. The subject was fresh; every clause was weighed. Those provisions had been a matter of investigation for three successive sessions of Congress, and had been successively amended. Can it be said, then, that Congress had not a view of the whole ground, that they were hurried in the passing of this law. The very law they were considering was an amendment, and would naturally cause inquiry and reflection.

In mature deliberation, therefore, they, in the year 1800, enact the present law. They discriminate between private unarmed vessels and goods, allowing one-sixth for salvage, and for the vessel alone, if armed, a moiety. The recaptured property of the United States is placed in a distinct section, wholly unconnected with the other.

If we attend to the language of the last clause of the first section, giving to the recaptors the moiety of a private armed vessel, we shall ascertain the reason why a greater salvage was given for the vessel than the goods.

The section states, "and if the vessel so retaken shall appear to have been set forth and armed as a vessel of war." If the enemy are thus possessed of the means of injuring our trade and of capturing other vessels, then, as the wresting those weapons from their hands prevents the perpetration of further mischief, for this meritorious service we will give to you one-half of those instruments of annoyance and destruction. The same reasoning will not apply to the goods; the public reap not the same benefit from their recapture.

But it has been heretofore argued in this cause, that a greater rate of salvage should be 257] allowed than one-sixth, *and that a construction to that effect should be given to the statute, because the service was very meritorious; the property had almost reached an enemy port, and but for the management and intrepidity of the recaptors would have been wholly lost. And is not that the case in every capture by a belligerent? Did not Congress know, when they passed this law, the difficulty of getting prizes home? Were they not then in fact more destitute of a navy than at present? In pursuance of this argument of extraordinary merit upon the present occasion, it has been urged that the recaptured vessel was armed; and that life was hazarded equally in recapturing the goods as in recaptnring the vessel. In the present instance it is idle to talk of danger; the Adeline, from her armament, was incapable of making resistance, and whether she did or not is problematical, as from the preparatory examinations there appears to be an uncertainty whether any resistance was attempted. It is, however, certain that the resistance, if any, was a mere parade, and that having fired one or two guns, the vessel instantly surrendered. Not a soul was hurt on either side, and the privateer did not deem the resistance sufficiently important to return.

But admitting that the service, by any chance, might have been very meritorious; that great gallantry might have been displayed and many lives lost; yet under this statute I know not how any court can interfere with its settled provisions.

In the case of The Apollo (3 Rob., 250), which vessel was cut out from under the guns of a French fortress, where much daring spirit was evidenced on the part of the recaptors, and much danger hazarded, and where extraordinary salvage was applied for, Sir William Scott says, "all recaptures within the act are put upon the same footing of merit and reward; therefore all that is said on the particular gallantry of the service is foreign to any singularly favorable application of this act which has provided but one measure for all cases, without reference to circumstances."

With respect to the property of alien friends resident in the United States, and recaptured in 258] this vessel, I *only remark that the provisions in the prize act apply equally to them as to our own citizens residing within our territory.

A claim has also been interposed by the owners of the schooner Adeline for freight and primage of that part of the cargo which is not owned by them. That such should be allowed I would respectfully contend there can be no question, as the voyage has been performed, and the cargo delivered at its port of destination. But the recaptors assert that they are entitled to a salvage of this freight. On the part of the owners this is opposed; first, because salvage of the freight is not given by the statute, and, second, because it is in fact allowed in the value of the goods.

The act has prescribed the terms on which the vessel and goods are to be restored. The court cannot add to those terms. The recaptors have no means of procuring this salvage except by withholding the goods; but the act declares that the goods shall be given up, upon payment of one-sixth of their value, without making any provision for salvage of freight. Against whom could the decree for a salvage of the freight lie? Not against the goods, for they are delivered up; not against the owners of the goods, for they are not before the court.

But salvage of freight is in fact paid in the increased value of the goods. The presumption is that the merchandise is enhanced that value by the importation. Now, the salvage is not on the invoice value, but on the true value of the goods. This value is ascertained by sale or appraisement at the place where the property is brought; no deduction is made except imports and duties. Besides, the recaptors should not claim an additional recompense for perfecting that without which they could not participate in the cargo. The bringing this property safely in entitles them to the one-sixth of its value, and that alone is specified in the statute as their reward.

The District Court, from whose decision the recaptors have appealed, decreed, on the 9th of August, 1814, that the recaptors should have as salvage one-sixth part of all the goods on board this vessel owned by American *citizens [259 and alien friends residing in the United States, and also a moiety of the vessel, her tackle, apparel, &c.

In this decree the claimants of that description acquiesced.

The recaptors have by successive appeals brought this case before this court. The funds arising from a sale of this property, which sale took place before the decision of the District Court, have been lying unproductive in the last-mentioned court ever since. If this court should affirm the decree of the Circuit Court in the above-mentioned cases, then those claimants pray that costs and damages may be awarded them.

D. B. Ogden, for all the claimants.

This vessel and cargo were recaptured by the expedition from the English, who had captured her, on a voyage from Bourdeaux to New York. The Adeline is American property, and her cargo part of it American, part French.

The Adeline and cargo are libeled as enemy's property, and the libel prays that they may be condemned as such. The claims deny the fact of its being enemy's property, and aver that in some cases it is American property, in others that it is the property of alien friends.

Before I consider the questions raised by the captors, I must first beg leave to call the attention of the court to some observations upon the nature of this cause as it appears from the libel, claims and evidence.

The libel charges the property as being enemy's, and prays for its condemnation as such. The claim denies the fact of enemy's property, and avers that it is American or the property of alien friends.

It is evident that the only point in issue, the only question arising between these parties upon the claim and libel, is whether this property be or be not enemy's, and as such liable to condemnation.

In all cases of prize there must be a regular 260] judicial *proceeding, and so in all other cases in a court of admiralty as well as in any other court. (See the answer to the Prussian memorial, in the appendix to Chitty's Law of Nations, 314, also to be found in collectanea juridica.)

All regular judicial proceedings consist of the proofs and allegations of the parties. The allegations of the parties are first made, and then the proofs are produced to support them. I understand the rule to be universal in all courts in which there are regular judicial proceedings, that as a party cannot recover upon allegations without proof, so neither can he recover upon proofs without proper allegations. The judgment of the court must be according to the proofs and allegations.

What are the allegations of the parties in this case?

The libel is in the nature of a declaration in a common law court, or of a bill of complaint in a court of equity. It must state sufficient facts for condemnation, with sufficient certainty, and conclude with a proper and sufficient prayer. It must apprise the person claiming the property libeled of the grounds upon which a condemnation will be asked, otherwise it would be more than useless to require a libel at all.

Now, this libel alleges or charges that this is enemy's property, and asks for a condemnation of it as such.

Unless the evidence in the cause proves it to be enemy's property, I apprehend the court never will, under this libel, condemn it.

The documents on board the captured vessel, and all the examinations in preparatorio, so far from proving the property to be enemy's property, prove directly the reverse; and indeed it is not pretended by the counsel for the captors that there is the least ground to suspect the property or any part of it to be hostile.

Can the captors have a decree for salvage in this case? I think not, because they do not ask for it in their libel; because the question here is not whether the captors are entitled to salvage 261]or not, but whether this is enemy's *property or not? I do not believe a single case can be produced in the books where salvage has been decreed unless it was especially asked for by the libel. A libel, like a declaration, may contain several grounds of a decree, or, to speak in common law language, several counts; and there must be a count for salvage, or it cannot be decreed.

In Hall's Admiralty Practice, 144, will be found a precedent of a libel where salvage is claimed, drawn by one of the most learned and experienced lawyers, particularly as a civilian, in the United States; which, although no authority, will certainly be considered as entitled to some weight, as showing the opinion of an enlightened lawyer upon the subject.

It is no answer to this argument to say that where property has been libeled as prize, property of friends is frequently condemned upon the ground of residence in an enemy's country or trading with an enemy, because such property is considered, quoad hoc, as enemy's property, and therefore comes within the allegation of enemy's property in the libel.

If I am right in the argument upon this subject, then I think it follows of course that if this is not enemy's property it cannot be condemned to the captors, but must be wholly restored to the claimants without any salvage whatever. It is no hardship to the captors to acquit the property; they knew the facts when they filed their libel; they made their election in what way to proceed against it; and, like all other parties in a court of justice, they must be bound by that election.

This being property recaptured from the enemy, must be considered, prima facie, not as enemy's property. It cannot be presumed that they would capture their own property.

Now, property recaptured from an enemy never can be proceeded against as prize of war; it is not considered as enemy's property until, in some countries, it has been carried infra presidia; in others, has been twenty-four hours in possession of the enemy; in England, and *under our prize act, until it has been [262 condemned in a competent court.

If the captors have any claim to any part of this property, it must be because recaptured from the enemy. But no such claim is set up in the libel; the right of property remains in the claimants; it has never been changed, and must therefore be restored to them.

But it is said that some of these claims are insufficient, because they do not say that the property belonged to the claimants at the time of shipment, but merely at the time of capture.

I answer, if the property belongs to the claimants now it is all which the court will require in this case. I have already endeavored to show that the captors have no claim to the property; it follows, then, that the court will restore it to the proper owners at the time of the decree. Suppose, however, that I am wrong in the principles which I have endeavored to establish, and that the captors can have a decree in their favor in this case; let me inquire whether the claims above alluded to are not sufficient? All that is necessary for the claim is to deny the material allegations in the libel. The allegation here is that the property is enemy's property, and as such liable to be condemned. This allegation is expressly denied by the claim. Nothing more is ever required in a claim.

Where there are any circumstances which raise a presumption that the property is enemy's, such as coming from an enemy's port, found on board an enemy's vessel, &c., &c., then it becomes necessary for the claimant to explain away those circumstances, to prove the friendly nature of the property, to show it to have been friendly at the time of its shipment, &c., which is done in what is called "the teste affidavit," not in the claim.

But in cases where the property, from the circumstances of the case, must necessarily be presumed to belong to our own citizens or our friends (as in the case of a recapture), then no test affidavit can be necessary; then no explanation is asked, because none is required.

*If these claims are insufficient, does [263 it follow that this property must be condemned?

The claims being insufficient, the court will either suffer the claimants to amend them or they will consider them as no claims, and dispose of the property accordingly.

If an amendment is allowed, there can be no difficulty in removing this objection.

If the claims are considered as no claims, is the property to be condemned as a matter of course?

If the captors in case of capture send in a vessel, after taking out the master, supercargo and every other person who would probably claim, and leave on board only one or two of the crew whose examinations may be taken in preparatorio, and who are wholly ignorant as to the property on board; if a vessel and cargo thus sent in is libeled as prize, is it to be condemned, of course, as prize, because no claim is put in or filed for it?

If all the papers and documents, and evidence in preparatorio prove the property not liable to condemnation, is it to be condemned because no claim is filed for it by the owner?

This doctrine would follow from the arguments upon the other side, but is too monstrous to be supported by any court.

I take the law upon this subject to be this, viz.: The proceedings in a court of admiralty are in rem. The subject matter is, in substance, in possession of the court, and they never will decree it to the captors or to any other person, unless they can show a right to it. They never will give the captors my property because I do not claim it, not being, possibly, in a situation to know that it has been captured or libeled.

If there be no claim filed, the court will examine the papers and examinations in preparatorio, and if, from the face of them there appears good ground of condemnation, they will condemn, otherwise not.

It is not like the case of a judgment by default in a court of common law, where the plaintiff takes judgment for his debt; because, at common law, the process has been personally served upon the defendant, he is actually in court, or has been proceeded against to outlawry. No surprise can be complained of by him. Not so in a court of admiralty, where the proceeding is in rem; and when the owner may never know that his property is in jeopardy. The court being possessed of it, are bound to give it up to nobody but him who has a good right to it. If, from the libel and the proofs before the court, it appears that the captors are entitled to the property, the court will decree it to them; otherwise not. And for this, among other reasons, it is an invariable rule that a claim must always be put in under oath, so that if the court order property to be restored to the claimant, they may at least have some evidence of his right to it.

For these reasons if there were no claims put in to this property at all, yet, as from the proofs in the case taken in preparatorio it is clearly not enemy's property, I contend that the court could not condemn it as prize of war.

This case, being that of a recapture, is a case in which the questions are, whether the property shall be restored to the original owners, and upon what terms. As there is no pretense that the property belongs to an enemy, there is no reason that the claim should negate a transfer in transitu; which transfer is void only when its effect would be to neutralize belligerent property.

If the libel in this case be such as the court can proceed upon to award salvage to the captors, I shall now briefly examine upon what terms the property in question must be restored to its former owners. This property consists,

1. Of the vessel, claimed as American property and proved to be so.

*2. Of property of American citizens, [265 stated to be resident in the United States.

3. Of property of American citizens whose place of residence is not stated.

4. Of property of alien friends, resident in the United States.

5. Of property of subjects of France, residing in France.

First, as to the vessel.

By the act of Congress of 26th June, 1812, entitled "an act concerning letters of marque, "prizes and prize goods" (section 5, vol. 11, p. "240)," it is enacted, that all vessels, goods and "effects, the property of any citizen of the "United States, or of persons resident within "and under the protection of the United States, "or of persons permanently resident within and "under the protection of any foreign prince, "government or state in amity with the United "States, which shall have been captured by "the enemy, and which shall be recaptured by "vessels commissioned as aforesaid, shall be "restored to the lawful owners, upon payment "by them respectively of a just and reasonable "salvage, to be determined by the mutual agree-"ment of the parties concerned, or by the de-"cree of any court having competent jurisdic-"tion, according to the nature of each case, "agreeably to the provisions heretofore estab-"lished by law."

Now, the provisions heretofore established by law are to be found in an act of Congress passed on the 3d March, 1800 (vol. 5, p. 38.)

This act, after providing for the restoration of vessels and goods, after recapture, upon the rates of salvage therein mentioned, proceeds in these words: "And if the vessel so retaken shall "appear to have been set forth and armed as a "vessel of war, before such capture or after-"wards and before the retaking thereof as "aforesaid, the former owner or owners, on the "restoration *thereof, shall be adjudged [266 "to pay, for and in lieu of salvage, one moiety "of the true value of such vessel of war or "privateer."

Under this act I presume the court cannot hesitate in affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court, with costs and expenses of prosecuting this appeal.

Second. As to the property of American citizens, resident in the United States.

The act of March, 1800 (vol. 5, p. 38), is positive in its provisions upon this subject; the property must be restored upon one-sixth salvage.

The decree of the Circuit Court upon this property, I contend, ought also to be affirmed with costs.

Third. As to the property of American citizens whose place of residence is not stated.

This, in my view of the subject, is the only point in the cause upon which the mind can at all hesitate, and when this is fully considered, I trust all doubt upon it will vanish.

It is contended on the part of the captors, that as no place of residence is mentioned, these American citizens must be considered as resident in France, and that the rule as to the restoration of the property of French subjects must therefore apply to them. To this I answer,

First. I do not think the presumption a fair one, that because no place of residence is mentioned they are therefore to be considered as residing in France. As they are citizens of the United States, it would seem to me that they ought fairly to be presumed as residing in the United States, until some evidence is produced to the contrary.

If, however, the court think it important that the claimants should prove their place of residence, they will, I presume, give us an opportunity of doing so.

267*] *Secondly, that the place of residence is wholly immaterial.

Because, being American citizens, and there being nothing unlawful in their residing in France, or any other country with which we are at peace, they have not forfeited any of their rights as citizens of the United States. And the doctrine that residence abroad gives a national character applies only to the case of the subjects of two nations which are at war with each other, or to neutrals residing in one of the two belligerent nations, but cannot be applied to such a case as this. I forbear, however, to enlarge upon this point as unnecessary. Because,

The question as to the terms upon which this class of claimants are to have their property restored, depends upon the construction of the act of Congress, which I shall now consider.

By the act of March, 1800, before referred to, it is declared, that when any goods which shall hereafter be taken as prize "by any vessel, act-"ing under authority from the government of "the United States, shall appear to have been "belonged to any person or persons resident "within or under the protection of the United "States, and to have been taken by an enemy "of the United States," &c. This question depends upon the construction of the above clause of the section.

In order that the property should be restored upon the payment of one-sixth salvage, it must belong "to some person or persons resident "within or under the protection of the United "States."

If it belongs to any person resident within the United States, it is to be so restored; or if it belongs to any person who is under the protection of the United States, whether he resides therein or not, it is to be restored upon the same terms.

All foreigners who are permitted to reside in the United States are under their protection, but no person who resides out of the United States is under the protection of the United States, but their own citizens.

268*] *In 2 Cranch, Rep., 120, this court held "that an American citizen residing abroad is entitled to the protection of his government."

Again, every foreigner who resides in the United States must necessarily be under their protection; the words, therefore, "or under the protection of the United States," would be nugatory if intended to be applied to such foreigners, and no effect can be given to those words, unless they are applied to citizens residing out of the United States, but who are still under their protection. But if the words of the act of March, 1800, are of doubtful import, their true construction is, I think, put out of all doubt by the act of 26th June, 1812, before referred to. These two acts of Congress being in pari materia, must be considered as one act, and construed accordingly.

The 5th section of the act of June, 1812, declares "that all vessels, goods and effects, the "property of any citizen of the United States, "or of persons resident within and under the "protection of the United States," shall be restored "agreeably to the provisions heretofore "established by law."

Now, there were no other provisions established by law than those contained in the act of March, 1800.

It is evident that Congress must have intended by the act of March, 1800, to provide for restitution of the property of any citizen of the United States, whether he resided within the United States or not. This is the only construction by which the provisions of these two acts can be reconciled.

That this was the construction intended by Congress when these laws were passed, will be still more evident when we examine with a little more care the different phraseology of them.

The act of March, 1800, says nothing about citizens of the United States, but speaks of property belonging to persons resident within or under the protection of the United States, thereby meaning, as I contend, all persons who reside within the United States, and all citizens *under the protection of the United [269 States, let them reside where they may.

The act of June, 1812, provides for the cases of property "of any citizens of the United "States," and of "persons resident within and "under the protection of the United States."

A foreigner residing in and under the protection of the United States is entitled to have his property restored under this act. This clause of the sentence does not apply to citizens at all, because their property is already provided for by the words "any citizen of the United States."

By the act of March, 1800, the property of all persons resident within or of persons under the protection of the United States is to be restored; without which latter words no provision was made for citizens out of the country these words were for that reason unquestionably inserted.

For these reasons I contend that it is immaterial where the American citizens reside; they are entitled to have their property restored upon paying one-sixth as salvage.

Fourth. As to property of alien friends, resident in the United States.

No observations are necessary to prove that under the acts of Congress referred to they are entitled to restoration upon paying one-sixth salvage.

As to them the decree, I presume, will be affirmed with costs and expenses.

Fifth. As to the property of subjects of France residing in that country.

By the 3d section of the act of March, 1800 (vol. 5, p. 40), this property is to be restored upon the same salvage on which, by the laws of France, the property of American citizens would have been restored to them under sim-270*] ilar *circumstances. And if no law or usage of France is known upon the subject, the same salvage is to be allowed as if it were the property of a person resident in the United States (viz., one-sixth).

Now, I confess I have not been able to find what was the rule in France upon that subject.

Whether the ordinance of 1779, made upon this subject, and which is referred to in the argument on the other side, was in force at the time of this recapture or not, or whether that ordinance, like almost everything else in that country, was destroyed during the dreadful revolution which she has just passed through, I know not. I confess my ignorance, and I have endeavored in vain to obtain information about it.

If no such French rule is known to the court, then I claim this property belonging to French subjects, residing in France, upon the same salvage which, by the act of Congress, it ought to be restored to them if they resided in the United States.

Emmet, for the recaptors, in reply.

Most of the cargo has been claimed; but no claim whatsoever has been put in for the property expressed in the bill of lading No. 23 (26 bundles of steel to be delivered to C. W. Huty, of Philadelphia), nor to that expressed in No. 35 (a harp and case of strings to be delivered to T. Delort, who has come in and claimed other property), nor to that expressed in No. 39 (1 case of pencils, on account and risk of Mr. Fongarolly, of New York). This circumstance would not have been noticed here, but that it is called for by part of Mr. Ogden's argument, who (partially admitting that a bad claim is tantamount to none at all) contends that the want of one is no ground for condemnation. In England, by the prize acts, regulations are made in case of non-claims for a limited time. In our courts, for want of any such regulations, defaults, as I understand, are usually taken, but the property not put out of the power of the court for a reasonable time. It is unnecessary to discuss the propriety of that arrangement in the present case; for certainly, after the lapse of a year, where the parties who 271*] ought to claim *are in the immediate vicinity of the court, and have come forward with no claim at all, or one not disclosing what is necessary to ascertain the innocent character of the property, or the foundation or terms upon which restoration should be had; where they have refused the sanction of an oath to verify documents that, without it may well be questionable; there can be no ground for awarding restitution to them. Their silence, or evasive mode of claiming, must be regarded as intentional; and indicating that they cannot make out a fair case for restoration.

Mr. Ogden contends for restitution without salvage, on another ground: that this libel being for condemnation as enemy's property and prize of war, salvage cannot be awarded under it; therefore, says he, it must be restored without salvage. That conclusion is clearly illogical, for if it were true that salvage could not be awarded under these proceedings, the only consequence would be that the property should be retained, and the recaptors turned round to libel for salvage. The position itself, from which the conclusion is drawn, is also erroneous; for in all cases of military salvage, the proceedings are as against a prize, and the payment of salvage is a condition necessarily imposed by the decree of restitution on the claimant. It is not properly the thing sought for by the libelant and contested by the claimant. I do not mean to say that it may not have been done from greater caution and perhaps want of practical experience, in the United States; or that if done, it ought not to be supported, but it is neither usual nor necessary. Mr. Ogden refers to a precedent of that kind in Hall's Admiralty Practice. I have not the book by me, and cannot refer to the authority, but if it be a libel for mere military salvage, the introduction of it in that book shows that the author's ideas were not very well arranged upon the subject which occupied him; for his book is only a translation of Clark's Praxis Curiæ Admiralitatis, which treats exclusively of the Instance Court, and has no relation to the Prize Court of Admiralty. It is sufficient, however, for me to say that no precedent of a libel for military salvage is to be found in Maryatt's Formulary, or any English book of authority, and that obviously all the cases in Robinson's Reports, where such salvage is decreed, are brought up under the prize jurisdiction, *and were [*272 proceeded against as prize of war. Let me ask by what right was the Adeline taken by the Expedition and held? Unquestionably jure belli. By what right, or by what course of proceedings were the recaptured crew examined in preparatorio, or the papers on board her opened and inspected by the prize commissioners? Because she was subject to be dealt with according to prize law. By a former prize act of England (33 G. 3 c. 66, § 42), it was enacted that recaptured ships set forth by the enemy as vessels of war, should wholly belong to the captors, and not be restored to the original owners. How was such a vessel to be proceeded against, but by libeling her as prize and condemning her as enemy's property? So in the present case, part of the recaptured property is French, which we contend (and for the present I shall take for granted) ought to be condemned to the captors and not restored at all. How are we to proceed for that condemnation, but by libeling as prize of war? Why, under the rule of reciprocity, is it not to be restored? Because by the French law belligerent property, of which an enemy has had 24 hours' possession, is considered to have changed owners, to be the absolute property of that enemy, and when recaptured it is treated as the absolute property of that enemy, and condemned as such by libel for prize of war. The rule of reciprocity (1 Rob. Ad. Rep. Am. Edit. p. 53, in the case of The Santa Cruz) induces us to consider French property (placed in such circumstances as would, under the laws of that country, be held to make a complete change of ownership of American belligerent property) as also acquired by the enemy; and to adjudicate upon it as actual enemy's property; of course, to libel and condemn it as prize of war. Non constat till the claims are put in and sworn to, but that property, apparently American, is actually French; and it is necessary to proceed for prize, in order to get those claims and ascertain that fact. A remarkable instance of that occurs even in the present case. The bill of lading (No. 15), of 280 cases of claret, state them to be shipped by order and for account and risk of David Dunham (presenting a prima facie case of American property), but when Mr. Dunham comes to claim on oath, he states them to be the property of Messrs. Johnson & Dowling, subjects of the French empire. How was the knowledge of that fact to be obtained, but by forcing a claim on oath? and if we 273] *had proceeded by libeling only for salvage of the property as American, how should we have learned that it was really subject to total condemnation as enemy's property, under the reciprocal application of the French law? The proceedings in this way are also the most simple. The libelant claims the benefit of his prima facie right arising from capture out of enemy hands jure belli. If there be any title to be opposed to this, it must be shown and sworn to, and the court will then decree, according to the extent of that title, either total restitution or restitution on terms of salvage. In ordinary civil salvage, which falls within the jurisdiction of the Instance Court (2 Rob. Ad. Rep. Am. Edit., p. 178, note on the case of The Hope), the salvors never acquire a right of seizing the property, and their first step (if they proceed against it) is a warrant of arrest; they then libel for salvage, because they have no superior or prima facie title to the thing itself; and the contestation is about the amount. But a careful examination of Robinson's Reports, (1 Rob., Am. Ed., 32, Aquail; 42 Santa Cruz, 228, The Two Friends; 3 Rob. Am. Ed., 249, The Apollo; 4 Rob. Am. Ed. 120, The Franklin; 5 Rob., Eng. Ed., 54, The Carlotta; 6 Rob., Eng. Ed., 410, The Sansom), will show that is not the course of proceeding, where the property has been recaptured in war; and the only reason why it is not more clear, is that the matter, being long established and of course, is not noticed in the very brief statements which that reporter prefixes to the arguments of counsel and judgment of the court. Enough, however, is given to establish my position. The Aquila (1 Rob., 32, 25) was a case of derelict, and, properly speaking, would have belonged to the Instance Court. It appears, however, from the judgment, that "some suspicions occurred that "it was in fact the property of an enemy; and "under these circumstances it became expedi- "ent to proceed against it as prize, for the pur- "pose of meeting the pretensions of the osten- "sible neutral owner, and of bringing the ex- "amination of his claim, where alone it could "be properly discussed, into the prize court. "These measures were highly necessary, and "therefore no objection can justly be made "against the mode of proceeding." In the case of The Two Friends (1 Rob., 228, 231, 238), a protest was made against the jurisdiction of the court over an American ship. The counsel on both sides allow that recapture is a matter of prize jurisdiction; and in the judgment 274] *Sir William Scott says: "But what- "ever may be the law as to wreck and derc- "lict, I conceive it does not apply to these "goods, which I consider to be goods of prize; "for I know no other definition of prize goods, "than that they are goods taken on the high "seas jure belli out of the hands of the enemy; "and there is no axiom more clear than that "such goods, when they come on shore, may "be followed by the process of this court." In the case of The Franklin (4 Rob., 140), the property was libeled as enemy's property and prize of war, and further proof was ordered of the property and destination. It was made and deemed satisfactory; but the captors insisted that restoration should only be made on terms of salvage. This was resisted by the claimants with arguments which perhaps have given rise to the present point by the claimants, although it was not a case of recapture or seizure jure belli from an enemy. Sir William Scott held it was a case in which no military salvage was due; but directed (as the price of restoration in this prize cause) a civil salvage of £500 to be paid. In the case of The Jonge Lambert (5 Rob., 54), reported in a note to The Carlotta, a Dutch ship and cargo captured by a French privateer and recaptured, was libeled as enemy's property and prize of war. She was condemned in the court below. The sentence was reversed on appeal, but as it was neutral property recaptured, the lords of appeal referred it to their surrogates to decide whether any and what salvage was due, with provisions for executing their decree. The surrogates decided that no salvage was due; but it is clear that if it had been a case for salvage, the restitution, on this reversal of the sentence of condemnation, would have only been on payment of it. It is unnecessary to discuss the arguments drawn from our different and totally inapplicable modes of proceeding under our municipal code. And I shall only add that if the objection taken to this mode of proceeding should be sustained, as the error, though fallen into after much consideration, arose from want of sufficient light and information in our books, it is hoped that the opportunity will be afforded to the salvors of instituting such proceedings as may be thought adapted to their case.

There is a matter about which the counsel for the claimants have fallen into a mistake. They state the libelants *to have ap- [275 pealed from that part of the decree which restores the ship on payment of a moiety of the value for the salvage. There is no such decree on the record. The restoration of the vessel on paying a moiety for salvage was agreed to by all parties, and therefore has in fact never been decreed at all and never has been disputed. If the vessel were understood to be included in the words of the decree, "American property," we should indeed have ample grounds of appeal; for the salvage ordered would be only one-sixth. That, however, is not the case, and nothing is brought before this court but the questions relating to the recaptured goods. The same answer applies to the mistake that we have appealed from the decree of the court refusing us salvage on the freight. There is no such decree, and we never asked it, as our libel shows, though the case of The Dorothy Foster (6 Rob., Eng. Ed., 88), shows we are entitled to it. No question of freight was ever presented in this case, but by the claim of Alexander Cranston (for the ship-owners) of freight for the goods not claimed by him for them; meaning to make our salvage on the goods pay a proportion of it, and so diminish its amount. That was not adjudged, and of course we have not appealed; though, if it had been decreed we certainly should; for it could be supported by no principle, and would be directly contrary to the act of Congress.

These questions being out of the way, nothing more remains but to consider what is to be the fate of the recaptured goods which have been claimed, with the incidental consideration of costs and expenses. Part of this property has been claimed, and sworn to, only as belonging to the alleged owners before and at the time of capture, without saying anything as to its ownership at the time of shipment. On this insufficient mode of claiming and its consequences I shall add nothing to Mr. Woodward's argument, except a reply to Mr. Ogden's observation, that there is no reason why such transfers in transitu between belligerent friends should be prevented. This very case shows otherwise; for if the property continued French, it would be subject to condemnation as enemy's property and prize of war; which belligerent right would be defeated by such a transfer.

I shall endeavor to simplify the discussion by 276] first *considering the great general division of French property, and of American property, recaptured; and will endeavor to class the doubtful cases under one or other of those heads.

As to the French property, it clearly must be judged upon according to the rule of reciprocity. In France, American belligerent property which had been 24 hours in the possession of the enemy captors would be treated and considered as their property, and not restored on salvage. The law of 24 hours' possession has in truth been always the rule adopted by France and Spain, and most if not all the powers on the continent; for, although they may desire a decree of condemnation, they desire it only as the most portable and compendious proof of the facts (including 24 hours' possession) from which the title has accrued. They do not regard the decree as creating a title to the property, which doctrine is in truth only confined to England and this country; and was not held even by this country during the revolutionary war. France has also made an ordinance on that subject, which is to be found in 2 Azuni, 276, and of which this court must well be held to have judicial knowledge; for the prize court, to which it has succeeded, has recognized it in the case of Miller et al., Appellants, v. Ship Resolution (2 Dallas, 2). That this was the law of France down to and long after the revolution, has not been doubted; and indeed cannot; for Azuni's work was published after 1803 (Vid., 2 Azuni, 218), but it is thought possible that it may have been subsequently altered; and from the pretended ignorance on that subject, a claim for restoration on American salvage is made. The claim is singular; for it is predicated not on the rights of the parties, but on the supposed ignorance of the court. It is not sanctioned by the words of the act of March 3d, 1800 (§ 3, vol. 5, p. 38), which provides that "where no such law or usage shall be known" the same salvage shall be allowed as is provided by the 1st section of that act. That means, where no such law or usage shall be made known or promulgated or acted upon. It refers to cases in which, on inquiry, a state shall not be found to have adopted any precise law or usage on the subject; but it founds no right to a suitor, on supposed judicial ignorance. The ordinance of 1779 is, however, a known law, and it must be considered as valid until those who insinuate *its [277 abrogation give some proof of their assertion. The onus is with them, and the means of proof, coming from their own country, are certainly within their power. (1 Rob., Am. Ed., p. 56, 57.) The presumption as well as the fact, therefore, is, that there has been no variation or abrogation of the ordinance of 1779.

The property of American citizens resident in France must, as I conceive, be considered as French, and subject to the same rule. This effect of domicile or national character is produced in every case where that character is judged of merely by the law of the nations. Birth, by the municipal laws of many countries, is considered as fixing an indelible national character; but that doctrine seems entirely dependent on municipal law, and is not to be found in the writers on the law of nations. Birth, with them, affords a prima facie presumption of residence, and serves to establish it where other facts are equivocal or silent; and in that sense Sir W. Scott must be understood, when he says, in the case of La Virginie (5, Rob., 98, 99), "that the native character easily "reverts, and that it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicile in the case of a native subject than to impress the national character on one who is originally of another country." But birth ceases to afford evidence of the national character under the law of nations, when opposed to a clear residence, animo manendi, in another country; for, says Sir William Scott, in The Indian Chief (3 Rob., Am. Ed., 23), "no position is more established "than this, that if a person goes into another "country, and engages in trade, and resides "there, he is by the law of nations to be considered as a merchant in that country." In some of these cases (the particulars of which I shall hereafter point out) it may perhaps be contended, that although the owner of the property appears to be resident in France, the permanency of his residence or the animus manendi does not appear; but to that I again answer in the words of Sir Wm. Scott, in the case of The Bernon (1 Rob., Am. Ed., 87, 88), "wherever it "appears that the purchaser was in France, he "must explain the circumstances of his residence there. The presumption arising from "his residence is, that he is there animo manendi, and it lies on him to explain it." For every purpose, therefore, either of commerce or of war, to be decided upon *solely [278 by the law of nations, these American citizens resident in France must be regarded as Frenchmen. But it is contended that with respect to salvage they are protected by the words used in the act of Congress of March 3d, 1800 (§ 1, vol. 5, p. 38), "any person or persons resident "within or under the protection of the United "States;" which last expression, it is said, necessarily includes American citizens everywhere. If this were the intention of the legislature, it is very singular that it did not simply say "any citizen of the United States, or any "person or persons resident therein." It seems to me, however, that the word resident which is expressed in the first, is understood in the second member of the sentence; and that it should be read, "any person or persons resi- "dent within, or resident under the protection of "the United States." An inhabitant of one of the territories comes within the last but not the first description; so does a consul or other public minister who has not by habitual commerce and residence acquired another national character. Other instances of residence under the protection of the United States might be produced; but an American who has changed his national character, and become, for every purpose of war and commerce, a member of another community, can no longer be regarded as under the protection of the United States. I am at a loss to see how America could afford protection to him. If she were neutral, and the country of his residence belligerent, would his commerce from that country be under her protection? The laws relating to recapture and salvage were made with a view to America's being belligerent, and must be construed in relation to that state of things. In that state, does she or can she afford any protection to a merchant residing abroad, whose protection and character must exclusively depend on the hostility or neutrality of the country to which he belongs as a permanent member? The interpretation put upon this phrase by Mr. Ogden would make the first and third sections of the act of March 3d, 1800, at variance with each other, and the same person subject to two inconsistent measures; for unquestionably such an American permanently resident in a foreign friendly country comes under the description of a "person permanently resi- "dent within the territory and under the pro- "tection of a foreign prince," &c.

279*] *The fifth section of the act of June, 1812, cannot explain the antecedent law of March, 1800; for it is obviously inadvertently worded, and not intended for any purpose of explaining, altering, or affecting that law. If the mistaken substitution of the word "and" for "or" could have any effect, it would be only to show that no person residing out of the United States in a consular or public capacity could be deemed under their protection. The truth, however, is, that the last act contemplates nothing more than to place recaptors by private armed ships, on the same footing with those made by public vessels of war; and it accomplishes that by a very loose phraseology.

If I am well founded in the foregoing arguments, it will follow that the decrees of the courts below respecting French property and that of all the residents in France, whether native Americans or not, should be affirmed; and (if costs and expenses are to be at all given in this case) with both.

I shall now consider the question as to clear American goods recaptured. The Adeline was a private vessel of war, having a letter of marque; and, when in the possession of the English, she fought with and made resistance to the privateer Expedition. There can, therefore, be no question but that the salvage of the vessel itself must be one-half. The claimants, however, contend that such a rate of salvage only extends to the vessel; but that goods recaptured on board of even an armed and commissioned vessel must be restored on paying one-sixth, that being the rate specified in the act of March 3d, 1800; and in support of this opinion several rules for the construction of statutes have been cited. It is my duty, and I trust I shall do it successfully, to maintain the opposite doctrine. In order to do so, I shall observe that salvage has, in every country and in every code of laws, been considered as a matter of general average; the service is an act done for the common benefit, and to be recompensed by common and proportionate contributions. Vessel and cargo always contribute expressly; freight, in some cases, expressly; in others, really but less obviously, where the salvors receive their proportion of the cargo or its value without paying freight. If the act of 3d March, 1800 meant to *break in upon this established [280 principle of proportionate contribution for a common benefit, it is without precedent in any other code; and an unreasonable departure from an universal usage founded on justice and common utility. Such a supposition should not be indulged in; and it is indeed fully contradicted by the second section of the same law; for there, regulating the salvage on the recapture of a public armed vessel, it enacts that for the recapture of a public armed vessel or any goods therein, one moiety of the true value thereof shall be paid. No satisfactory reason has been or can be assigned why the United States should be obliged to pay differently and in a greater proportion for the benefit of recapture than private individuals deriving equal advantage from the act. This second section of the act naturally presents the question, how it happened that the legislature omitted to mention expressly in the first section, goods on board such armed vessel. I think I can answer it. The first section is copied from the English statutes on the same subject, varying the proportion of salvage, and with one addition the operation and force of which perhaps was not sufficiently adverted to at the time. (Statutes of 13, G. 2, c. 4; 17, G. 2. c. 3; 29, G. 2, c. 34; 16, G. 3, c. 5 and 33, G. 3, c. 66.) They give one-eighth for salvage of vessel and goods, but enact, that if the recaptured vessel shall have been set forth as a vessel of war during its possession by the enemy, the salvage for the vessel shall be one-half. Here the principle of proportionate contribution for a common benefit was not departed from; for to set the vessel out for war, it must have been conducted into port, and, of course, the cargo which it carried at the time of capture discharged, and the connection between them broken; the goods which such a vessel might have on board when recaptured would be enemy's property, and condemned as prize of war. The British acts, therefore, made no mention of such goods, they not being a fit subject for restoration on salvage. Congress, in preparing their system, although they adhered to the phraseology of the English code, thought that the same service was rendered by capturing an armed vessel, whether it was originally fitted for war by Americans or their enemies, and therefore awarded an equal compensation in both cases; but perhaps they did not advert to the fact that, in the new case which they were introducing, recaptured *goods [281 would have to be restored, and they therefore adopted the language of the British laws without inserting a provision to meet a situation of things that could not exist under them. Or else, considering the character of average contribution as necessarily fixed on salvage by universal usage, and equal justice, they thought it unnecessary to do more than settle the rate of contribution; and the state of the vessel being the circumstance that was to affect that rate, they spoke of it alone; but conceived and intended that a proportionate contribution from everything connected with it in danger and benefit conferred, would follow as an incident. If the first supposition be true, the awarding of salvage for the recaptured goods on board an armed vessel is a casus omissus; and the least we can be warranted in saying is, that it is in the discretion of the court to settle that rate. If it be, I trust it will be settled by analogy to the rule made in the act itself, and so as to preserve the harmony of the whole system. If the second supposition be correct, then the word vessel must be considered with a liberal interpretation, as also including all on board of it. And in support of such an interpretation, calculated to preserve received and established usage against a literal meaning, I may refer to the opinion of the court as delivered in the case of Talbot v. Seaman (1 Cranch, 1). There the court had occasion to consider the meaning of the expression "any nation in amity with the United States" used in the act of March 2d, 1799, relating also to recaptures from the enemy. The counsel for the captors contended that the words of this law gave salvage on the recapture of neutral property; founding themselves, like our adversaries, on the literal extent of the expression. On which the court observes (1 Cranch, 43): "The words of the "act would certainly admit of this construction. "Against it, it has been urged, and we think "with great force, that the laws of the United "States ought not, if it be avoidable, so to be "construed as to infract the common principles "and usages of nations, or the general doctrines "of national law." The impossibility of having access to authorities prevents my citing many instances of statutes similarly construed, which I have no doubt could be easily furnished. The following, however, happen to be within my power: Plowd., 366, Zouch v. Stowell, "a thing which is within the intention of 282] "the makers *of the statute, is as much "within the statute as if it were within the "letter." In Eyston v. Studd (Plow., 467), that equitable construction which enlarges the letter of a statute is thus defined: "Æquitas est verborum legis directio effectius cum una res sollummodo legis caretur verbis ut omnis alia in æquali genere eisdem careatur verbis." And there the remedy given by the 9 E. 3, c. 3, against executors, it is said, has been always extended by an equitable construction to administrators; because they are within the equity of the statute. Platt v. The Sheriff of London (Plowd., 36), the words of the 13 E. 1, are, "circumspecte agatis de negotiis tangentibus Episcopum Norwicensem;" yet this statute, although only the bishop of Norwich be named, has been always extended, by an equitable construction, to other bishops.

Some of the claims in this cause are for property owned by aliens resident in the United States. Where that residence is not clearly made out to be permanent, the claimants must take the consequence of the insufficiency of their claims and proofs. They are all Frenchmen, and if they have not shown a sufficient domicile to obtain for them the American national character, they must be considered as Frenchmen and abide the reciprocity resulting from their law. Where they are clearly permanent residents within the United States, they will be entitled to the benefit of that character, if my reasoning as to Americans domiciled in France be correct; if it be not, they must suffer under the rule the court will then lay down, and be regarded as Frenchmen.

It only remains for me now to say a few words of costs and expenses which are asked for by the claimants. This case is brought before this court by their voluntary act and a clear consent, without which it could not have been presented on appeal. The District Judge declared the principles he would adopt for his decision; but, strictly speaking, he made no decree on the case of any individual claimants. Those principles were considered in some respects erroneous by the counsel for the captors, and in others, by those for the claimants. It was therefore considered better to bring all the principles in review before the Supreme Court, as the expense would be little if at all increased by so doing; and if any claimant had been unwilling to become a party *to this ar- [283 rangement, he might have withheld his consent; and his case could not have been brought up on appeal till a decree had been made on his individual claim. I submit that it is therefore now too late for him to talk of costs and expenses; and in truth impossible to ascertain what proportion of costs or expenses he can sustain.

March 10th. Absent—TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The American letter of marque schooner Adeline, with a valuable cargo on board, was captured on her voyage from Bourdeaux to New York, on or about the 14th of March, 1814, by a British squadron; and, on or about the 19th of the same month was recaptured by the American privateer Expedition, James Clayton, commander, and brought into New York for adjudication. Prize proceedings were immediately instituted against the vessel and cargo as enemy property; and various claims were interposed in behalf of the American and French merchants. Upon the hearing of the cause, the District Court decreed a restoration of all the property of American citizens and other persons resident in the United States, upon the payment of one-sixth of the value as salvage, and condemned all the property of French subjects and of American citizens domiciled in France, and of all others whose residence remained unexplained, as good and lawful prize to the captors. From the former part of the decree the captors appealed, and from the latter part the claimants appealed to the Circuit Court; and from an affirmance pro forma of the decree in that court, the parties have appealed to this court. It does not appear in the record that any decree was pronounced in respect to the vessel; and it is therefore probable, as intimated by counsel, that she has been restored on a compromise between the parties interested.

Before we proceed to the consideration of the principal questions which have been argued, it will be proper to notice several objections to the regularity of the allegations, proceedings and proofs in the cause.

It is, in the first place, asserted on behalf of 284] the claimants, *that if this should turn out not to be a case of enemy property, but of salvage merely (as most certainly as to some of the claims it must be held to be), the recaptors can take nothing by the present libel, because it proceeds upon the mere footing of the property being prize of war. And it is likened to the case of a declaration at common law, where the party can only recover secundum allegata et probata; and if no count hit the precise case the party must be non-suited.

If, indeed, there were anything in this objection, it cannot, in any beneficial manner, avail the claimants. The most that could result would be that the cause would be remanded to the Circuit Court with directions to allow an amendment of the libel. Where merits clearly appear on the record, it is the settled practice, in admiralty proceedings, not to dismiss the libel, but to allow the party to assert his rights in a new allegation. This practice, so consonant with equity and sound principle, has been deliberately adopted by this court on former occasions. After all, therefore, the claimants would, in the language of an eminent civilian, but change postures on an uneasy bed.

But we are all of opinion that there is nothing in this objection. No proceedings can be more unlike than those in the courts of common law and in the admiralty. In prize causes, in an especial manner, the allegations, the proofs and the proceedings are in general, modeled upon the civil law, with such additions and alterations as the practice of nations and the rights of belligerents and neutrals unavoidably impose. The court of prize is emphatically a court of the law of nations; and it takes neither its character nor its rules from the mere municipal regulations of any country.

In cases of mere civil salvage, it may be fit and proper that the libel should distinctly allege and claim salvage, though we do not mean to assert that, even in such cases, it is indispensable. In cases of military salvage, also, the party may, if he please, adopt a similar proceeding. But it is by no means necessary, and, in most cases, would be highly inexpedient. Recaptures are emphatically cases of prize; for the definition of prize goods is, that they are 285] goods taken on the high seas, jure belli*, out of the hands of the enemy. When so taken, the captors have an undoubted right to proceed against them as belligerent property in a court of prize; for in no other way, and in no other court can the questions presented on a capture jure belli be properly or effectually examined. The very circumstance that it is found in the possesssion of the enemy affords prima facie evidence that it is his property. It may have previously possessed a neutral or friendly character; but if the property has been changed by a sentence of condemnation, or by such possession as nations recognize as firm and effectual, the neutral or friendly owner is forever ousted of his right.

It depends altogether upon future proceedings; upon the examinations taken in preparatory and the documents on board; upon the verity of the claims, and the diligence and good faith of the claimants; and upon the principles of international law, comity and reciprocity, whether a restoration can be decreed or not. How can these questions be decided, unless the customary proceedings of prize are instituted and enforced? How can it be known whether all the documents on board be not colorable and false, or whether the conduct of the claimant be not unneutral or fraudulent, unless the truth is drawn from the parties intrusted with the property for the voyage by the trying force of the standing interrogatories and the test affidavits? The very case before us presents a strong illustration of the propriety of these proceedings. There is a large shipment on board, which, on the bill of lading, purports to be the property of an American claimant; yet the claimant himself expressly swears that it is the sole property of the French shipper. What the consequences are of that fact will be presently seen.

The court, then, has a legitimate jurisdiction over the property as prize; and, having it, will exert its authority over all the incidents. It will decree a restoration of the whole or of a part; it will decree it absolutely, or burdened with salvage, as the circumstances of the case may require; and whether the salvage be held a portion of the thing itself or a mere lien upon it, or a condition annexed to its restitution, it is an incident to the principal question of prize, and within *the scope of the regular prize [286 allegation. If, therefore, the case stood upon principle alone, we should not doubt as to the sufficiency of the libel for this purpose; but it has, also, the clear support of the practice of the admiralty. (The Aquila, 1 Rob., 37; The Franklin, 4 Rob., 147; The Jonge Lambert, 5 Rob., 54, note.)

Another objection urged on behalf of the captors is to the sufficiency of the claims and test affidavits. It is asserted, and truly, that the goods are not alleged, in the claim or affidavits, to have belonged to the claimants at the time of shipment; it is only alleged that they so belonged at the time of capture. Regularly, the test affidavit should state that the property, at the time of shipment and also at the time of capture, did belong and will, if restored, belong to the claimant; but an irregularity of this nature has never been supposed to be fatal. It might, in a case of doubt or suspicion, or in a case calling for the application of the doctrine as to the legal effect of changes of property in transitu, have justified an order for further proof; or, in cases of gross negligence or pregnant fraud, have drawn upon the party more severe consequences. But in ordinary cases it is not deemed to work any serious consequences. In this instance it probably passed unnoticed in the courts below, where, if the blot had been hit, it might have been instantaneously removed by an amendment. Another irregularity undoubtedly was, that the test affidavits were put in, on behalf of many of the claimants, by their agents, although the principals were resident in the United States, and within the reasonable reach of the court. Where the principal is without the country, or resides at a great distance from the court, the admission of a claim and test affidavit by his agent is the common course of the admiralty. But where the principal is within a reasonable distance, something more than a formal affidavit by his agent is expected. At least the suppletory oath of the principal as to the facts should be tendered; for otherwise its absence might produce unfavorable suspicions. If, indeed, the principal might always withdraw himself from the view of the court, and shelter his pretensions behind the affidavit of an innocent or ignorant agent, there would be no end to the impositions practised upon the court. The court expects, in proper cases, something more than the mere formal 287]test *affidavit of an agent, who may swear truly, and yet, from his want of knowledge, be the dupe of cunning and fraud. It is not meant to assert that any such imputations belong to the present case. This irregularity, like the former, probably passed in silence; and it would be highly injurious if an objection of this sort should now prevail, when all parties have hitherto acquiesced in its immateriality.

We are now led to the principal question in this cause, viz., what rate of salvage is to be allowed to the recaptors? This depends upon the true construction of the salvage act of Congress of 3d of March, 1800, ch. 14. That act provides, that, upon the recapture of any vessel (other than a vessel of war or privateer), or of any goods belonging to any persons resident within or under the protection of the United States, the same, if recaptured by a private vessel of the United States, shall be restored on payment of one-sixth part of the value of the vessel or goods; and if the vessel so recaptured shall appear to have been set forth and armed as a vessel of war, before such capture, or afterwards, then upon a salvage of one-half of the true value of such vessel of war.

It is argued, in behalf of the recaptors, that the Adeline being an armed vessel, they are entitled to a moiety of the value of the cargo as well as of the vessel, either upon an equitable construction of the statute, or upon general principles, as a case not within the purview of the statute.

We are all, however, of a different opinion. The statute is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. It does not give the salvage of one-sixth part of the value upon goods, the cargo of an unarmed vessel; but it gives it upon any goods recaptured, without any reference to the vehicle or vessel in which they are found. We cannot interpose a limitation or qualification upon the terms which the legislature has not itself imposed; and if there be ground for higher salvage in cases of armed vessels, either upon public policy or principle, such considerations must be addressed with effect to another tribunal. This decision affirms the decree of the Circuit Court as to the claims of all the parties domiciled in the United States.

288*] *As to the claims of the parties domiciled in France, whether natives or Americans, or other foreigners, their rights depend altogether upon the law of France as to recaptures; for by the act of Congress, as well as by the general law, in cases of recapture, the rule of reciprocicy is to be applied. If France would restore in a like case, then are we bound to restore; if otherwise, then the whole property must be condemned to the recaptors. It appears that by the law of France in cases of recapture, after the property has been 24 hours in possession of the enemy, the whole property is adjudged good prize to the recaptors, whether it belonged to her subjects, to her allies, or to neutrals. We are bound, therefore, in this case, to apply the same rule; and as the property in this case was recaptured after it had been in possession of the enemy more than 24 hours, it must, so far as it belonged to persons domiciled in France, be condemned to the captors; and the decree of the Circuit Court as to them must be affirmed.

As to the claims of the other persons whose national character and proprietary interest do not distinctly appear, considering all the circumstances, we shall direct further proof to be made on both points. As, indeed, the master has not been able to swear directly to the proprietary interest of the cargo, but simply says that the goods were, as he presumes and believes, the property of the shippers or the consignees, perhaps, in strictness, further proof might have been required in the courts below as to the whole cargo. It was not, however, moved for there by the captors; and as we are satisfied in relation to the claims which we shall restore, it would be useless now to make such a general order.

Upon these principles, the property embraced in the claims by and in behalf of Alexis Gardere, of William Weaver and Isaac Levis, jointly, and of William Weaver alone, of Andrew Byerly, of George I. Brown and William Hollins, of Peter A. Karthous, of William Bayard, Harman Leroy, James M'Evers and Isaac Iselm, of William Hood, of Theophilus DeCost, of John Dubany, of Messrs. John B. Fonssatt & Co., of Edward Smith, James Wood and Samuel W. Jones, of Victor Ardaillon, of Lewis Chastant, of Lewis Labat, of Benjamin Rich, of Nath'l Richards, Nayah Taylor and Gustavus Upson, of *Ferdi-[289 nand Hurxthal, must be restored on payment of the salvage of one-sixth part of the value. The property embraced in the claims on behalf of Peter Boue, Jun., of R. Henry, of P. Doussault, of William Johnston and James Dowling, of G. Broussc, must be condemned to the captors.

The remaining claims must stand for further proof. And as to the property unclaimed, it must be condemned as good and lawful prize to the captors.

The decree of the Circuit Court is to be reformed so as to be in conformity with this decision.

THE BRIG ANN, M'CLAIN, MASTER.

Absent—TODD, J.

If a seizure, by a collector, for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States be voluntarily abandoned, and the property restored before the libel or information be filed and allowed, the District Court has not jurisdiction of the cause.

APPEAL from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Connecticut.

which reversed that of the District Court, and restored the property to the claimant.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an information against twelve casks of merchandise, part of the cargo of the brig Ann, alleged to have been imported or put on board with an intent to be imported contrary to the non-importation act of 1st of March, 1809 (ch. 91, § 5.)

It appears from the evidence that the Ann sailed from Liverpool for New York in July, 1812, having on board a cargo of British merchandise. She was seized by a revenue cutter of the United States, on her passage towards New York, while in Long Island Sound, about midway between Long Island and Falkland Island, and carried into the port of New Haven about the 7th of October, 1812, and im-290] mediately taken possession of by *the collector of that port, as forfeited to the United States. On the morning of the 12th of October the collector gave written orders for the release of the brig and cargo from the seizure, in pursuance of directions from the Secretary of the Treasury, returned the ship's papers to the master, and gave permission for the brig to proceed without delay to New York. Late in the afternoon of the same day, the present information was allowed by the District Judge, and on the ensuing day the brig and cargo were duly taken into possession by the marshal, under the usual monition from the court. On the trial in the District Court, the property now in controversy was condemned; and, upon an appeal, that decree was reversed in the Circuit Court.

It has been argued that the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be affirmed, because, on the whole facts, the District Court had no jurisdiction over the cause; and this argument is maintained on two grounds; first, That the original seizure was made within the Judicial District of New York; and, second, That if the seizure was originally made within the Judicial District of Connecticut, the jurisdiction thereby acquired by the District Court was, by the subsequent abandonment of the seizure and want of possession, completely ousted.

It is unnecessary to consider the first ground, because we are all of opinion that sufficient matter is not disclosed in the evidence to enable the court to decide whether the seizure was within the District of New York or of Connecticut, or upon waters common to both.

The second ground deserves great consideration. By the judicial act of the 24th September, 1789 (ch. 20, § 9,) the district courts are "vested with "exclusive original cognizance "of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime "jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws "of impost, navigation or trade of the United "States, where the seizures are made on waters "navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or "more tons burthen within their respective "districts, as well as upon the high seas." Whatever might have been the construction of the jurisdiction of the district courts, if the legislature had stopped at the words "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," it seems manifest, 291] by the subsequent clause, that *the jurisdiction as to revenue forfeitures was intended to be given to the court of the district, not where the offense was committed, but where the seizure was made. And this with good reason. In order to institute and perfect proceedings in rem, it is necessary that the thing should be actually or constructively within the reach of the court. It is actually within its possession when it is submitted to the process of the court; it is constructively so, when, by a seizure, it is held to ascertain and enforce a right or forfeiture which can alone be decided by a judicial decree in rem. If the place of committing the offense had fixed the judicial forum where it was to be tried, the law would have been, in numerous cases, evaded; for, by a removal of the thing from such place the court could have had no power to enforce its decree. The legislature, therefore, wisely determined that the place of seizure should decide as to the proper and competent tribunal. It follows, from this consideration, that before judicial cognizance can attach upon a forfeiture in rem, under the statute, there must be a seizure; for until seizure it is impossible to ascertain what is the competent forum. And, if so, it must be a good subsisting seizure at the time when the libel or information is filed and allowed. If a seizure be completely and explicitly abandoned, and the property restored by the voluntary act of the party who has made the seizure, all rights under it are gone. Although judicial jurisdiction once attached, it is devested by the subsequent proceedings; and it can be revived only by a new seizure. It is, in this respect, like a case of capture, which, although well made, gives no authority to the prize court to proceed to adjudication, if it be voluntarily abandoned before judicial proceedings are instituted. It is not meant to assert that a tortious ouster of possession, or fraudulent rescue, or relinquishment after seizure, will devest the jurisdiction. The case put (and it is precisely the present case) is a voluntary abandonment and release of the property seized, the legal effect of which must, as we think, be to purge away all the prior rights acquired by the seizure.

On the whole, it is the opinion of the majority of the court that the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be affirmed.

*THE TOWN OF PAWLET [*292

v.

DANIEL CLARK AND OTHERS.

Absent—TODD, J.

This court has jurisdiction, where one party claims land under a grant from the state of New Hampshire, and the other under a grant from the state of Vermont, although at the time of the first grant Vermont was part of New Hampshire. A grant of a tract of land in equal shares to 63 persons, to be divided amongst them in 68 equal shares, with a specific appropriation of 5 shares, conveys only a sixty-eighth part to each person. If one of the shares be declared to be "for a glebe for the church of England as by law established," that share is not holden in trust by the grantees, nor is it a condition annexed to their rights or shares.

The Church of England is not a body corporate, and cannot receive a dônation eo nomine.

A grant to the church of such a place is good at common law and vests the fee in the parson and his successors. If such a grant be made by the crown it cannot be resumed by the crown at its pleasure.

Land at common law may be granted to pious uses before there is a grantee in existence competent to take it, and in the meantime the fee will be in abeyance. Such a grant cannot be resumed at the pleasure of the crown.

The common law, so far as it related to the erection of churches of the Episcopal persuasion of England, the right to present or collate to such churches, and the corporate capacity of the parsons thereof to take in succession, was recognized and adopted in New Hampshire. It belonged exclusively to the crown to erect the church, in each town that should be entitled to take the glebe, and upon such erection to collate through the governor, a parson to the benefice. A voluntary society of Episcopalians within a town, unauthorized by the crown, could not entitle themselves to the glebe. Where no such church was duly erected by the crown, the glebe remained as an hæreditas jacens, and the state which succeeded to the rights of the crown, might, with the assent of the town, alien or incumber it; or might erect an Episcopalian church therein, and collate, either directly or through the vote of the town indirectly, its parson, who would thereby become seized of the glebe jure ecclesiæ, and be a corporation capable of transmitting the inheritance.

By the revolution, the state of Vermont succeeded to all the rights of the crown to the unappropriated, as well as appropriated glebes. By the statute of Vermont of 30th October, 1794, the respective towns became entitled to the property of the glebes therein situated.

A legislative grant cannot be repealed. No Episcopal Church in Vermont can be entitled to the glebe, unless it was duly erected by the crown before the revolution, or by the state since.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Vermont, in which, upon an action of ejectment brought by the town of Pawlet to recover possession of the glebe lot, as it was called, in that town, the opinions of the judges of that court were opposed upon the question whether judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff or for the defendants, upon a verdict found, subject to the opinion of the court, upon the following case stated:

"In this cause it is agreed on the part of the "plaintiffs, that the lands demanded in the "plaintiffs' declaration are a part of the right "of land granted, in the charter of the town of "Pawlet, by the former governor of the prov-"ince of New Hampshire, as a glebe for the "Church of England as by law established; "and that in the year 1802 there was, in the "town of Pawlet, a society of Episcopalians "duly organized agreeably to the rules and "regulations of that denomination of Chris-"tians heretofore commonly known and called "by the name of the Church of England. That "in the same year the said society contracted "with the Reverend Bethuel Chittenden, a "regular ordained minister of the Episcopal "Church, who then resided in Shelburn, in the "county of Chittenden (but had not any settle-"ment as a clerk or pastor therein), to preach "to the said society in the town of Pawlet at "certain stated times, and to receive the avails "of the lands in question, and that the said "Chittenden thereupon gave a lease of the said "land to Daniel Clark and others, who went into "possession of the premises, and still holds the "same under the said lease, and that the said "Chittenden regularly preached and adminis-"tered the ordinances to the people of the said "society, according to his said contract, and "received the rents and profits of the said "land until the year of our Lord Christ "*1809, when the said Chittenden de- [*293
"ceased; and that in 1809 the said society con-"tracted with the Rev. Abraham Brownson, a "regular ordained minister of the Episcopal "Church, residing in Manchester, and officiating "there a part of the time, to preach to the said "society a certain share of the time, and to re-"ceive the rents and profits of the said land; "and that the said Brownson has regularly at-"tended to his duty in the said church, and "administered ordinances in the same until "September, 1811, about which time the said "society regularly settled the Rev. Stephen "Jewett, who now resides in the said town of "Pawlet, and who from the time of his settle-"ment is to receive all the temporalities of the "said church. And it is further agreed by the "said parties, that the general assembly of the "state of Vermont on the 5th of November, "1805, did grant to the several towns in this "state, in which they respectively lie (reference "being had to the act of the general assembly "aforesaid), all the lands granted by the King "of Great Britain to the Episcopalian church "by law established (reference being had to "the charter of the town of Pawlet afore-"said for the said grant of the King of "Great Britain), and that the lands, in the "plaintiffs' declaration mentioned and described "are part of the lands so granted by the King "of Great Britain to the Episcopalian Church."

The charter of Pawlet is dated the 26th of August, 1761, and purports to be a grant from the King, issued by Benning Wentworth, governor of New Hampshire, and has these words: "Know ye, that we, of our special grace," &c. "have, upon the conditions and reservations "herein after made, given and granted, and by "these presents for us, our heirs and succes "sors, do give and grant, in equal shares, unto "our loving subjects, inhabitants of our said "province of New Hampshire, and our other "governments, and to their heirs and assigns "forever, whose names are entered on this "grant, to be divided amongst them into sixty-"eight equal shares, all that tract or parcel of "land situate, lying, and being within our said "province of New Hampshire, containing by "admeasurement 23,040 acres, which tract is "to contain six miles square and no more," &c., "and that the same be and hereby is incorpo-"rated into a township by the name of Pawlet," &c. "To have and to hold the tract [*294
"of land as above expressed, together with all," &c., "to them and their respective heirs and "assigns forever," &c.

On the back of which grant were indorsed, "The names of the grantees of Pawlet, viz.: "Jonathan Willard," and others, being in all 62, then follow these words: "His Excellency "Benning Wentworth, Esquire, a tract of land "to contain five hundred acres as marked in "the plan B. W., which is to be accounted two "of the within shares—one whole share for the "incorporated society for the propagation of "the gospel in foreign parts; one share for a "glebe for the Church of England as by law "established; one share for the first settled min-"ister of the gospel; one share for the benefit "of a school in said town."

The act of the 5th of November, 1805, is entitled, "An act directing the appropriation of "the lands in this state, heretofore granted by "the government of Great Britain to the Church "of England, as by law established."

"Whereas, the several glebe rights granted "by the British government to the Church of "England, as by their law established, are in "the nature of public reservations, and as such "became vested by the revolution in the sov-"creignty of this state; therefore,

"Sect. 1. Be it enacted by the general as-"sembly of the state of Vermont, that the sev-"eral rights of land in this state granted under "the authority of the British government to "the Church of England as by law established, "be and the same are hereby granted severally "to the respective towns in which such lands "lie, and to their respective use and uses for-"ever, in manner following, to wit:

"It shall be the duty of the selectmen in the "respective towns in the name and behalf, and "at the expense of such towns, if necessary, to "sue for and recover the possession of such "lands, and the same to lease out according to "their best judgment and discretion, reserving "an annual rent therefor, which shall be paid "into the treasury of such town, and appro-295*] "priated to *the use of schools therein, "and shall be applied in the same manner as "moneys arising from school lands are, by law, "directed to be applied."

This cause was argued at last term by Pitkin and Webster for the plaintiffs, and by Shepherd for the defendants.

Pitkin, for the plaintiffs.

On the part of the plaintiffs it is contended, that the share in question, or the sixty-eighth part of the town of Pawlet, which in the charter was granted or reserved "for a glebe for the Church of England, as by law established," did not at the time of the grant pass from the king, for want of proper persons to take; that it remained in the grantor until the revolution, when it passed over and vested in the state of Vermont, who had, therefore, full right to dispose of it. By the words of the charter, the tract of land therein described is to be divided among those whose names are entered on the charter into 68 equal shares. The names of 63 persons are mentioned, including Benning Wentworth, who has two shares, making for those 63 persons 64 shares, leaving four shares, one of which is for the incorporated society for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts; one for a glebe for the Church of England, as by law established; one for the first settled minister of the gospel; and one for schools; making in the whole 68 shares.

It is clear, from the terms of the grant, that no person named on the back of the charter, or intended as grantee, except B. Wentworth, can take but one share, as the town is to be divided into 68 shares, and those shares are to be equal. B. Wentworth is to have 500 acres, which are particularly designated and marked in the plan annexed to the charter, and are to be accounted two shares. This exception also proves that the other grantees are to have one share only. In no event, therefore, could the share in question, or the two other public shares, as they have been called, be divided among the individual persons named. Nor has this ever been the case. In the division of the town of Pawlet the share intended for a glebe was located by itself, and called the glebe lot. It was intended, in the grant, as a name; and if it could not pass as designated, for want of proper grantees, it remained in the [ 296 king, the grantor (as if one half of the names inserted had been fictitious), and at the revolution vested in the state of Vermont.

The nature of the estate intended to be conveyed is expressed in the word "glebe," well known in the English law as a provision for the parson of a parish. The law says that the freehold only vests in the regular parson; not the fee; consequently the grant or disposition of land, in such case for a glebe, does not make or imply a disposition of the fee; the fee, therefore, remains in the grantor.

The words "for a glebe for the Church of England as by law established," express clearly the intention of the grant, viz., for the support and extension of the national church, considered in its political connection. It is not a grant to the national church as a body. No such grant ever was made, or if made, would be valid. Every provision for its support is to some organ of the church, as to the bishop of such a see, or the parson of such a parish, and his successors. A parish church, in the English law, is the building consecrated and endowed. There must be a glebe, which may be the church yard only. The parson has, in the glebe, no more than a freehold estate. He is considered in law as a sole corporation, and the freehold passes by succession. Parishes are a civil and ecclesiastical division; the inhabitants of a parish, the parishioners, the members of the national church, are never said to be members of the parish church; neither the parishioners nor the vestry have any right in, or power over the glebe, not even during a vacancy. (See 1 Black., p. 417.) The Church of England never was established by law, either in New Hampshire or Vermont, before or since the revolution. Neither the civil nor ecclesiastical law, as applicable to glebes, was known or recognized at the date of the charter; nor has it been adopted or recognized since in either of those states. The intention of the grant, therefore, even before the revolution, could never have been carried into effect. It is also well known that, at the date of the charter, the land therein granted was a wilderness, and so continued for a long time afterwards.

At the time of the grant, therefore, [
297 there was not only no Church of England established by law, but in the town of Pawlet there was no organ of that or any other church, capable of taking the share in question.

The grant, of course, could not take effect, and the revolution has rendered it utterly impossible that it ever can take effect agreeably to the intention of the donor. By the revolution we have become completely severed from the Church of England as by law established. Individuals and societies may profess the same creed, have the same mode of worship, and the same ordinances administered in the same manner, and submit to the same discipline, as far as may be effected without the assistance of the civil arm. But this constitutes, in the view we are now taking of the subject, similarity, not identity. It furnishes no ground for legal derivation of civil or legal connection. In every political, civil and legal view, and in all the civil and legal consequences, the dissolution of the Church of England, as by law established, was in the United States as total and complete on the revolution as that of the civil power of the British government. Nor has there ever been in the state of Vermont a substitute adopted. Every idea of a national or state religion has been exploded. The court will consider how many things are requisite to the legal possession and enjoyment of a glebe; how much of the common law of England, and how much of the canon law must be adopted or considered as in force; although, in every civil and political view, the institution or establishment to which they applied is abolished. There must be a parish, a church with cure, a parson, legally and canonically introduced. Four things are requisite to constitute a parson: 1, Holy orders; 2, Presentation or collation; 3, Institution; 4, Induction; he must be a sole corporation. No part of the common law on this subject has been adopted in the state of Vermont; either by the constitution, by statute, or by legal adjudications.

It would be absurd to consider any number of Episcopalians, formed into a society in Vermont, as standing in the place of a parish, and capable, contrary to the doctrine of the common law under which they must derive title, of succeeding to the freehold of a glebe, or of taking 298] and *holding by succession or otherwise, by or under a grant of lands for a glebe, made by the King of Great Britain before the revolution. There is a statute in Vermont (see an act for the support of the gospel. passed in 1797, Revised Laws, vol. 2, page 474), under which religious societies may be formed; but it does not appear, in the case, that the society in the town of Pawlet is formed under that act. But, if so formed, the members of such society are not confined to any particular limits, and if associated from 4 or 5 different towns, they may have a claim equally good to the glebe lands, in each town. This statute, which extends equally to all denominations of Christians, constitutes societies or associations formed under it, corporations or quasi corporations; and enacts, "That they shall have power to "hold to themselves and successors, all such "estates and interests as they may hereafter "acquire, by purchase or otherwise, and the "same to sell and transfer, for the benefit of "such association." A society so formed has the precise power given by the act and no other. The power is limited to future acquisitions; the power to sell is co-extensive with the power of acquisition. Nothing is to be holden which shall be perpetually appropriated, as a glebe is. Such society is not empowered to succeed to estates, rights or interests, granted previous to their existence, although limited to objects similar to its own. Indeed, the expression in the act seems to have intended an exclusion of such claim.

If the share in question should be considered as a reservation for a future particular use, it then remains in the king, the donor, until a state of things should arise when it could be applied to such use. This use is specified in the charter, viz., for a glebe, &c. We have before proved that, prior to the revolution, it had not been, and could not, consistently with the institutions of the country, be so applied. It, of course, remained in the king at the revolution, and at that time vested in the state of Vermont.

At the date of this charter a separation of the provinces or colonies from the mother country was not contemplated. It was undoubtedly intended at that time, by the donor, that the Church of England should be established by law in the province of New Hampshire, as *it had been in some of the other prov- [299 inces, and particularly in Virginia. In this charter, therefore, as well as in all other charters granted by the Governor of New Hampshire, provision was made, by a reservation of a certain share of every township, for such an establishment.

If the share in question be considered in the nature of a grant, then, as we have before stated, the grant of "a glebe," if it took effect at all, is of the freehold only, and not of the fee; of the freehold to be taken and held by the incumbents in succession.

The fee, of course, not being granted, remained in the grantor. By the English law, as well as our own, on the dissolution or political death of a corporation, all estates granted to such corporation revert to the grantor or donor. And if a grant was made by the king to any person, or number of persons, incapable of taking or holding, or if the object ceased to exist, or never came into existence, the estate was considered as never having passed, or as reverting to the king, according to the nature of the case.

On the revolution the state of Vermont, as a sovereign state, succeeded, in full and sovereign right, to all the property and rights of property within the same, which, at the time, were vested in or appertained to the King of Great Britain, whether in possession or reversion. The case, then, stands thus: A tract of land in the town of Pawlet was, by the King of Great Britain, before the revolution, granted "for a glebe for the Church of England, as by law established;" that is, the freehold to vest to a particular use, when that use should arise, the remainder or reversion in the crown. There is no securing, in the constitution of Vermont, to any man or body of men, of any rights or benefits which under the crown were intended for the Church of England as by law established. At the time of the revolution there had never been, within the territory, now state, of Vermont, a regular parson, who could make any possible legal claim or pretense to the use of any of the glebe lands within the same. The sole corporation, as the parson was denominated, was not dissolved or extinguished by a political death, because in Vermont it *never [300 came into existence, but the possibility of such existence ceased. A provision might have been made by the constitution, or by statute, in favor of Episcopalians; but it must have operated as a new grant, or new organization. No such provision has been made; the right, therefore, vested in the state of Vermont, and the grant is well made to the town of Pawlet.

Shepherd, contra.

It is contended by the counsel for the plaintiff that nothing passed by the grant contained in the charter of Pawlet, so as to devest the King of Great Britain of the title to the premises in question. If this position is correct, it must be admitted that the plaintiff is entitled to recover; because it cannot be denied that the title of the crown to any lands antecedent to the revolution, within the jurisdiction of the now state of Vermont, would, of course, become the property of the state. If, however, the ground taken by the plaintiff's counsel shall be found untenable, and that the title of the king was devested by the grant; then, whether the defendants have a title or not, will be a matter of indifference; so long as the plaintiffs must recover on the strength of their own title, and not on the weakness of ours.

If, by the grant, the title passed from the then king, the state of Vermont could acquire no right by the revolution; but the title must remain, unless forfeited, as at the time of the grant.

The reason given by the counsel for the plaintiff to show that, notwithstanding the charter the title remained in the grantor is, that when made there was no grantee in esse capable of taking the fee, or other estate, so as to devest the king of his. If this be true, on a fair construction of the letters patent, it must also be admitted that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

It is believed that, on examination of the charter, the court will be of opinion that there was a sufficient grantee in esse, and that the title did pass by that instrument. And if there 301] was then, no matter what has *happened since, unless there has been a forfeiture and office found, which are not pretended.

1. The words of the granting clause are: "Do give and grant in equal shares, unto our "loving subjects, inhabitants of New Hamp- "shire, and our other governments, and to "their heirs and assigns forever: whose names "are entered on this grant, to be divided to "and amongst them into sixty-eight equal "shares, all that tract or parcel of land," &c., describing and bounding the whole township of Pawlet.

It is contended here that the whole of the land contained within the boundary lines of the township was designed to be granted without any saving or reservation to the crown of any part of the same. The whole of the six miles square was granted; to whom? To the loving subjects of His Majesty in New Hampshire and elsewhere. How was it granted? In fee-simple; and in sixty-eight equal shares, to be equally divided to and amongst the king's loving subjects named on the grant.

He granted to them (be they more or less in number) the whole township of Pawlet as tenants in common, and not in severalty. Hence, each man named on the grant became entitled to his proportionable part of the whole township, whether he was one of sixty-eight or one of three.

It is presumed the court in this case will be much inclined to do as courts have generally done, if possible by their construction to satisfy the object of the grant, and give it a meaning which was intended by the grantor. It is a rule of construction to search out the intention, and make that a landmark.

Possessing liberal views of this instrument, it will no doubt be found that the grantor designed to pass the title to the whole town of Pawlet, to his loving subjects named thereon, and not to confine the grant to a sixty-eighth part of the township to each, but in proportion to the whole number, more or less.

Now, supposing that a part of the names written on *the grant should have been [302 fictitious, the grant of a proportion would not have been to them, but directly to the others, who answer the description given, "Loving subjects of the grantor."

Fictitious persons could not be loving subjects; therefore the whole land would pass to the real persons. Most unquestionably the whole tract was granted to those capable of taking a title.

It will be seen by the grant that the lands were not allotted; of course no partition was made amongst the patentees until after the charter was made. The grant was in common and not in severalty; therefore no inference of an intention to give each proprietor but a single share can be drawn from the circumstance of the whole town being required to be divided into sixty-eight equal shares. As well might the counsel contend that it was inferable from a law incorporating a bank with three thousand shares that the stockholders could have but one share each.

If the foregoing is a correct construction of the instrument before the court, then it results as a certain inference that the crown had not a rood of land remaining in Pawlet; and, consequently, the state of Vermont could have none; as the state pretends to no greater right or title than that of the king.

2. It will be attempted to be shown that on the 26th day of August, 1761, there was in esse a Church of England, as by law established, which could be a grantee of the crown. If so, the title passed directly to the church in fee-simple; and would need no auxiliary to sustain her right.

It is said by the counsel that lands granted for the benefit of the church are granted to the bishop, or some other ecclesiastical person; but it would be strange doctrine to say that the king had not power to grant directly to the church established by law, and therefore distinctly identified as a Christian society. The position will here be ventured, that such a grant to the Church of England as by law established was, and still is, valid.

*To maintain the point that, the [303 church existed at the date of the grant, we need only appeal to historical facts in the English books, and the still more authentic testimony of the body of the English law, the statutes and adjudged cases of the realm, within the recollection and familiar to the mind of the court.

It is said "that when the grant was made there was no church in Pawlet; it was all new. There was no established church in New Hampshire or New York." Whether true or not, as it respects this part of the argument, is not worth inquiry; for it will be remembered that the words of the grant do not confine the bounty of the sovereign to Pawlet, New Hampshire, or the American continent; it is co-extensive with his dominions, and may be claimed by the church wherever found within them.

That there was a church established by law in Great Britain no one will deny; if so, what should prevent that church from being the grantee? It can hardly be denied that the king could grant lands lying in one of his American colonies to his subjects beyond the Atlantic as effectually as those who resided in that colony. It was all within his territorial jurisdiction; and place of residence could have no influence. It may be said that the grant is to the king's subjects in New Hampshire. True; but the words "and our other governments" are added. These words may embrace the whole governments and dominions of His Majesty.

If, however, this ground should fail us, there can be no difficulty, it is presumed, to ascertain the existence of a church in the colonies capable of taking a title to the property in question.

In Virginia, if information is correct, the Episcopalian Church was established by a law of that colony before the date of the grant; but whether so or not we feel indifferent, because by a future construction of the grant we have the utmost confidence that the true meaning is not a church established by any law in the American colonies, but that the words "as by law established" are used as descriptive of the denomination of Christians intended as the sub-304*] jects of royal munificence. *As much as to say that sect of Protestants who are known in England as the established Episcopalian church. That you, churchmen of America, must embrace the same creed; the same church government must be the rule of your discipline; and your ordinances must be administered in every respect as by the established church in England. You must be neither Catholics nor Dissenters, but be identified in every part of your religious establishment in faith and practice with the mother church.

That this is a natural construction is manifest from the fact that the government could not have been ignorant of the state of the church in the colonies, and it would be the height of absurdity to suppose a grant to be made to a body of Christians which the grantor well knew did not exist. The court surely will never impute to the officers of any government such trifling and mockery. If, therefore, the colonial Episcopal Church was intended as the subject of this bounty, and if she was not established by law, it must follow, as an irresistible inference, that the words "as by law established" are words of description and not of identity.

Having established this point, we will show by historical proof a church in the state of New Hampshire, long anteecdent to the date of the grant.

In Belknap's Hist. of New Hampshire (2 vol. 118), it is stated that in the year 1732 a building for an Episcopal Church was erected at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire. In 1734 the church was consecrated, and in 1736 they obtained a clergyman of that order by the name of Arthur Browne.

If this church was capable of taking a title to land, as I shall hereafter show, all the difficulty suggested on the part of the plaintiff will be removed.

Some reasons will now be given to show that such a church as was established in New Hampshire was capable of taking a title to real property.

1. The king, by the act of granting, creates sufficient corporate powers to carry into effect his designs. That *he can create cor- [305 porations cannot be doubted. He did, by the very instrument before the court, create in the town of Pawlet all the corporate powers and prerogatives which they now possess; a body sufficiently known in law to be invested with the supposed legal estate in the premises in question; and by an act of the very legislature who have authorized them to bring this action. If the king had the authority to incorporate, it can be easily and legally inferred from the grant that this body was sufficiently incorporated thereby.

Should Congress, by law, give to the Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington a portion of the public lands, would the court endure to be told that there was no proof of the incorporation of the church, ergo the law was void—the title never passed either by the law or grant made in pursuance thereof?

In a case thus situated, the court may, indeed they ought to, infer, for it is a just legal deduction, and bottomed upon the soundest judgment of law, that a sovereign granting power (always supposed, prima facie at least, to be right), had not indulged in the foolish blunders of granting real property for most desirable ends to shadows and nonentities. And it is confidently believed that the court will determine as a reasonable and legal intendment, that the church of New Hampshire was made capable of holding this property.

There is a further reason to suppose the church capable of taking a title. The grant being a governmental act, and of such high and incontrovertible authority, every statement and fact contained in it is so far proved that it cannot be denied. If this be correct, the grant itself proves the whole that need be proved to make this part of the grant valid, and to vest the title in the church. The court, therefore, will not receive any statements, history, conjectures, or Vermont preambles, to contradict the acts of the British government made in solemn and official form. It is true that a prior grant from the same authority may be shown to defeat a subsequent. But that is permitted for very different reasons; because the first act of a government granting away its lands vests a title in the grantee, and there is nothing left to give.

*In support of this position it is sub- [306
mitted, whether the words "one share as a glebe for the Church of England," &c., are not tantamount to a positive averment of an existing church in this country which could be the legal subject of donation by letters patent. There is this strong reason to support such an opinion, that we never can impute ignorance or error to a sovereign while exercising the high prerogatives of his station. We never can say that he, as the organ of the government, has been granting land without a grantee; that he has mistaken the facts or the law, and consequently nullify his acts. It is enough that the instrument points to the grantee and gives the object; its legal attributes are to be presumed.

The plaintiff comes, claiming under the very title granted to us; in which grant we are acknowledged to have a prior right. Had this grant been from other than the government on whom the doctrine of estoppel cannot fasten, it would be enough for us to hold up the charter between the claim and our possession and shut the plaintiff at once from even a view of the court. Even now, whether the doctrine of estoppel will apply or not, one thing is true: that what the king, under whom the plaintiff claims, has solemnly recognized as correct, must be binding upon the government of Vermont, and, consequently upon the plaintiff in this cause.

The act of the British government is not the only governmental act which the church has to secure their possession.

The legislature of Vermont, on the 26th day of October, 1787, passed an act "to authorize the selectmen in the several towns of the state to improve the glebe lands," &c. And, after enacting that the selectmen should have power to lease out the glebe lands, receive the rents, bring actions of ejectment, recover the possession thereof, when possessed by persons without right, they make a proviso in the words following: "Provided, nevertheless, that nothing contained in this act shall extend so far as "to prevent any Episcopal minister, during the "time of their ministry, that now are or hereafter may be in possession of any glebe lot or 307*] "right, or actually officiating *in said "town where the land lies, and who is an ordained minister of the Episcopalian Church, "from having the management of said lots, and "the avails arising therefrom."

By this proviso it is perfectly obvious that the legislature intended to manifest a legal recognition of the right of the church to the property.

It is also equally obvious that by the act authorizing the selectmen to take care of the glebe lots, and obtain possession by action of ejectment of those which were possessed by squatters, the legislature designed not to filch away the land from the church, and in the plenitude of their power to forget right, but to secure the title and promote the interests of the church. If not, why in the proviso are the Episcopal clergy preferred to other clergy in the management of the lands; and why are they preferred even to the selectmen as the guardians of the property. The proviso is high and indisputable proof that the object of the statute was solely to preserve the property from waste for the benefit of the church, to preserve for it the income which might result from its prudent management, and to save the title from loss by long adverse possession.

After all this one would suppose that the state would never indulge itself in attempting to devest the church of their property; yet, strange as it may appear, on the 30th of October, 1794, the legislature of Vermont make another act concerning the glebe lots, and the following is its preamble:

"Whereas, by the first principles of our government it is contemplated that all religious "sects and denominations of Christians, whose "religious tenets are consistent with allegiance "to the constitution and government of this "state, should receive equal protection and "patronage from the civil power. And, whereas, it is contemplated in the grants heretofore "made by the British government, commonly "called glebe rights, that the uses of the said "rights should be to the sole and exclusive "purpose of building up the national religion of a "government diverse from and inconsistent "with the rights of our own; for which reason, "and on the *principles of the revolu- [308 "tion, the property of said lands is vested in "this state." They, therefore, go on to enact that the rents and profits of all the glebe lots shall be appropriated to the support of religious worship in their respective towns forever; without regard to the sect of Christians, and all should share alike, according to the number of taxable inhabitants, in the parishes respectively.

In this preamble they seem to admit that the title to the glebe lots was vested in the church. They do not deny such a construction of the grant, nor do they urge, as a reason for taking away the property from the Episcopalians, that the grant was void, or that the title was in the crown before the revolution, and that thereby they became entitled to the property; but they say these lots were granted "exclusively to build up a national religion of a government diverse from and inconsistent with the rights of their government;" and for these reasons they attempt to devest the church of their title in order to give the property, or the income of it, to other sects of Christians.

The reason given for enacting this law is strong evidence of the opinion of the legislature that the title had passed out of the crown and vested in the church. But as they disliked an established religion, supposed it anti-republican, and what was more to be dreaded, it was established in a government "diverse from the government of Vermont," and inconsistent with their rights, or rather their religious and political opinions; being disagreeable in the particulars they take away the income of the land from the Episcopalians to appropriate it to other, and, no doubt as they supposed, better purposes.

Notwithstanding the length and force of this preamble, and the cogent reasons given for making the law, on the fifth day of November, 1799, the legislature repeal this act, and in so doing most manifestly abandon all pretensions to the church property; for in the repealing law they take care to secure those who have trespassed upon those lands from actions which might be brought for so trespassing; admitting in the fullest sense that men who had intermeddled with the property *by the authority and [309 in pursuance of their law had so trespassed. Hence the court will see that the legislature, both in the making and in the repealing of the law of 1794, show that the act was an unjust attempt at usurpation.

By the record of the case of Pettibone v. Barber, tried before the late Justice Patterson at a Vermont circuit, it appears that the plaintiff failed in an action brought in pursuance of this law. It is said that the judge pronounced the law unconstitutional and void. This decision might have induced the repeal, as the trial was had in the intermediate time between the passage and repeal of the act.

The legislature in the year 1805 passed another act, and by that discover less solicitude for the Christian Church in any form. This, too, has a preamble, contradicting in its terms the old, in which they say: "Whereas, the several glebe rights, granted by the British government to the Church of England as by law "established," are in "the nature of public "reservations," they, therefore, give them to the select men of the towns where they lie respectively, for the use of schools, &c.

The first act contains by implication a decided confirmation of the title in the church. The second, although contradictory in its provisions and repugnant to that right, exhibits in a striking light in its preamble and in the repealing clause, a thorough conviction, in the mind of the legislature, of the fallacy of their pretensions, urging facts which, if true, would contribute nothing in support of those pretensions. In the last they urge a new reason for their law, and as we suppose, equally unsound. Here they become wiser, and not only act the legislators but judges, scout what had been done by their predecessors, and give a construction of the grant which is indeed a strange one, but which, if correct, is supposed, as will be hereafter shown, to defeat the right to recover in this case.

3. In the third place it is supposed the grant of the crown may be considered valid by adopting the opinion that this is one of the cases 310] where the fee may be in abeyance, *until the existence of the church in the town of Pawlet so organized as to be capable of receiving it.

To maintain this point the court are referred to 2 Blac. Com., 106; Co. Lit., 342, where it is laid down, that an estate may be granted to John for life, and then to the heirs of Richard, although Richard has no heirs at the time of the grant.

Here, although the life estate vests in John immediately, yet the fee must be in abeyance until the heirs of Richard are in esse. Indeed the happening of the event is perfectly contingent, for those in remainder may never exist. Should it be said that the fee remains in the grantor during the life estate, ready to vest in the heirs of Richard if they exist at the determination of the life estate, or to continue in him by reverter if Richard has no heirs; it is met by urging that if this doctrine be correct, then with equal propriety may it be contended on our part that the fee remained in the king ready to vest, whenever there should be a church.

But says the state of Vermont, "we have a right by forfeiture to the king's property." True, but no greater right than the king had; which was a naked legal title; the use belonged elsewhere. Of this hereafter.

In the 2 Black. Com., 318, it is said that ecclesiastical estates must sometimes necessarily be in abeyance, and that where there is no person in whom the fee can vest, it potentially exists in abeyance; as between the death of the incumbent and the next presentation.

The parson having but a life estate in the glebe, unless it could so exist on his death it must revert to the grantor.

Christian, in his Notes on Blackstone, supposes the fee to be all the while in the lord of the manor.

This is by no means the opinion of Blackstone, or of the still greater lawyer, Coke; both of whom, if they are correctly understood, lay down the law to be that the fee exists, between the death of the parson and his successor, not in the lord, but in abeyance.

311*] *4. If the construction of the patent contended for in the inception of this argument is correct, there will be no difficulty in finding a grantee to uphold the fee, and make it subservient to the benevolent intentions of the crown. It would not be a violent or unnatural construction to say that the town of Pawlet was granted to the persons named on the grant, in fee, upon condition that they should, in the location of the town, lay out and set apart "one share as a glebe for the Church of England, &c.," together with the other shares for Benning Wentworth, the first settled minister, and the school, according to the directions indorsed.

Under such a construction, whether the church were incorporated or not, they might reap the benefit of the use; for as soon as they become organized, and a clergyman settled, they would be capable of receiving the income of the land.

This construction was adopted by the proprietors of the town. In locating the same they did survey a share and mark it off as a glebe right. This appears from the several acts of the state and in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff.

The present inhabitants of the town must all hold their lands under the grant before us, and not only so, but from the original proprietors who so located and consecrated the glebe right which is now claimed by those persons.

By the laws of England, and probably of all civilized countries, the claimer or possessor of land is bound by the acts and confessions of those under whom he holds the claim or possession. By this rule, then, the present inhabitants of Pawlet are bound by the act of their predecessors. That act was a complete recognition of the right of the church to the property; an act which spoke louder than any language.

It may be said that the share was located by the proprietors of the town in their corporate capacity. If that was the case it is still the worse for them, because a corporation never dies, and the location was the act of the plaintiff upon the record in this cause; and they are now *claiming property which they [312 once voluntarily admitted to belong to the church.

Again, it appears that the plaintiff in this cause is now enjoying the benefits of this construction in the share given to a school and the first minister settled in the town. Without this, or the third position taken in this argument, the town would have but slender pretenses to the use of those two shares; but it seems they claim those two lots by the same, or a more uncertain title, hold them by the same tenure, derive the right from the same source, and yet claim the glebe also, and in order to support that claim are driven to the necessity of denying the legal and efficient properties of the instrument by which they as well as the church claim.

5. This is a trust estate. The patentees named upon the grant are the trustees for the use of the church whenever it should be organized in the town of Pawlet, so as to be enabled to receive the rents of the land.

If a use can result from a grant by implication, it is supposed this is a case of that kind.

In expectation that objections will be made to such an interpretation of the case those objections are endeavored to be answered.

1. It may be said that the grant is silent as to any use or trust, and therefore it is not to be implied.

The answer is, wherever from the nature of the grant a trust estate can be implied, with propriety, where it is necessary to carry into effect the object of letters patent, the court will adopt the implication.

The court are referred to 7 Bac. Ab., new ed., 89; Sand. on uses, 208, for the doctrine of the implication of uses. In 12 Mod., 162, Jones v. Morley, it is said that a use may be declared without the word use. Any words that show the meaning of the party are sufficient. If the court can suppose that the legal estate was granted in fee, to the patentees, there can be no difficulty in deciding the nature of their title.

313*] The instrument upon *which such legal estate depends, will indubitably show that their only right was for the use of the church.

2. It may be said that as there is no church in existence, the legal estate must fail for the want of a use.

It has already been shown that a church was in esse when the grant was made, and whether the church was or was not incorporated cannot be material; in either case the title in the trustee would be valid. To this point the court are desired to look at 1 Rep., 23, 24 and 25, and Gilb. Law Cases, 44, where it will be found that public institutions are capable of enjoying a trust, and it was decided that the poor of the parish of Dale, although not incorporated, were capable of a trust. Without adopting the principle that the church can take an equitable interest in these premises, there would in many cases be an end to the workings of benevolence. Science might often lose her patrons, the needy their benefactors, and religion her warmest supporters.

Before we part with this point we will once more look at the act of 1805, upon which the plaintiff founds his right to recover; and to its preamble, which declares the glebe lands in the nature of public reservations. If this means anything, it must mean that the legal estate was reserved to the crown. As a proof that the legislature so meant, observe the following language: "And as such by the revolution became "vested in the sovereignty of this state." Now, sovereign as the state may be, she can have no other or greater title than the crown of Great Britain had after the grant and before the revolution, and that right could be no more than a right reserved for the use of the church; because it never ought to be supposed that the crown made this grant with no other design than to reserve to itself what it before had. If the king had an inclination to retain for his own use a few shares of the land, he might have done it directly; in the same manner as the pine trees were reserved for his royal navy.

This, then, is the right of the state of Vermont, on their own construction, a right to do what, by the act of 1787, the legislature did, like honest men, and added security to the already existing title of the church.

314*] *If the right of the crown was of the nature described, and if the court can suppose the land reserved to the crown, and that the king could be a trustee, they will then say that the state of Vermont could take no estate to the exclusion of the equitable right of the cestui que trust, but any forfeiture of the king or any act of his could only prejudice his own rights, and not the rights of third innocent parties. This doctrine will be found in 1 Blk. Rep., 123, Burges v. Wheat; Sand. on uses, 152–3, also 252, 257.

If, therefore, the construction of the legislature of Vermont should be adopted, it would only help the plaintiff to be defeated in this action; for it cannot be believed that the use as well as the legal estate could be reserved by the grant before the court.

Webster, in reply.

1. It is said to be the obvious intention of the grantor to pass, by the grant, all the territory of Pawlet, without any saving or reservation. But this is against the express words of the grant. The grant is made "upon the conditions and reservations hereafter made;" nor is there anything in the grant to which the term "reservation" can be properly applied, except it be the public rights, as they are usually called, of which the part appropriated for a glebe, &c., is one.

The defendants' counsel further supposes, that although the territory was to be divided into sixty-eight equal parts, yet this was not to designate the proportion which each grantee was to receive; but that if any person named in the grant should not accept, or not be capable of taking, or not happen to be a person in esse, or in other such case, then the whole tract would be to be divided among the residue. This is believed not to be a sound construction of the words of the grant. Those words are, "do give and grant in equal shares unto our "loving subjects, &c.. whose names are entered "on this grant, to be divided amongst them into "sixty-eight equal shares, all that tract," &c. To what purpose was the tract to be divided into sixty-eight equal shares, if it were not to ascertain what portion each grantee should have?

*But what is conclusive on this point, [315 is the disposition made of B. Wentworth's right. He was to be entitled to two shares. These are actually severed from the common mass, by the grant itself, and marked out on the land. This shows that the share of each proprietor was not thought liable to be increased by any incapacity in others to take, or other such cause.

A great part of the states of New Hampshire and Vermont were granted by charters, issued in the name of the crown, by the provincial governors of New Hampshire, which charters were in all respects like this. These charters or grants have received a settled construction, which has been followed by long usage, in both states. No case is known to have existed in which any grantee has claimed a greater portion of the whole land than his name bore to the names on the charter, including the public right; nor has any severance or partition been made, in any case, upon any other rule or principle. To divide the land into sixty-eight equal parts, and then adopt the plan of appropriating the whole to a less number of owners, as in the example supposed by the defendant's counsel to three, giving each twenty sixty-eighth parts, and two-thirds of one sixty-eighth part more, would be to act without object or motive. Such, therefore, has never been supposed to have been the course contemplated in the grant. The division or partition of lands holden under these charters has been, as is believed, in every instance, by dividing the whole into as many parts, commonly called rights, as there were individuals named on the charter, together with the public rights, and allowing two parts to B. Wentworth. The shares allotted to the public rights are usually designated as the "school right," "minister right," "society right," and "glebe right," respectively. These have never been claimed by the original proprietors. In New Hampshire (where the plaintiffs' counsel is better acquainted with judicial proceedings and judicial history than in Vermont) no legislative provision is recollected to have been made. The first settled minister has usually possessed the right designated for him. The town corporations, bodies totally distinct from the original proprietors, and owing their corporate existence, in all cases, to their charters, or to acts of the legislature (for although this 316] charter *undertakes to erect a corporation, yet in fact no corporation ever existed or was erected by these grants) have had the management and disposition of the school right. The statutes of the state make it the duty of the towns, in their corporate character, to make provision for the support of free schools, within the town, and under the management of the town authority. These school rights having been originally intended to aid in the support of schools, it has been holden that the law throwing the duty of this support on the town has given them the disposition of this fund for that purpose. There being no manner of privity between the town corporations and the original grantees of the soil, the former can derive no title to these school rights, but from the law of the state. That they have right to them has been settled by many decisions, followed by uniform practice.

The grant to the society for propagating the gospel presented a different case. That was a corporation, then existing and still existing in England, capable by its charter of holding lands, and doubtless entitled, originally, to take the portion intended for it in this grant. Whether this society was not so far connected with the national church and the realm of England as that its rights were devested by the revolution, has never been decided. Actions are pending, both in the circuit and state courts, in which this society is party, in relation to these lands.

The glebe right has generally, in point of fact, been occupied or disposed of by the town. No individual has been able to maintain a right to one of these lots, or portions, upon his ecclesiastical character. It has been holden, on the contrary, that the grant, so far as it undertook to give one sixty-eighth part for a glebe, was void for want of a grantee. The plaintiff's counsel have been obligingly favored, by the present Chief Justice of New Hampshire, with notes of the case of Mead v. Kidder, in the Supreme Court of that state in 1806; in which court the same judge then presided. To which case this court is respectfully referred.

Whether the better construction is, that there is a reservation of these lands by charter, point- 317] ing out *merely the future use, or, that a grant was intended, which cannot take effect for want of a grantee, is immaterial in this case. The result is the same.

2. The defendant contends that there was a church of England, as by law established, capable of taking. On this point the plaintiffs' counsel will only remark:

1. That no grant to the Church of England, eo nomine, could avail, even in England, to pass the fee. Would such a grant enure to the see of Canterbury, or the diocese of London? The Church of England in the aggregate is not a corporation, but one of the estates of the realm.

2. But the grant is limited by the words of the charter itself, to the Church of England, as by law established in the town of Pawlet. Just as the school right is to be for the support of schools in that town, and the right of the minister first to be settled there. It is hardly necessary to draw into the argument even the obvious intent of the grantor. The words themselves are unequivocal; and does not the defendant himself rest his title upon his connection with the Episcopal society in Pawlet?

As to the laws of Vermont, before 1805, they all show that the legislature acted on the opinion that it might dispose of these lands, as public property, in any way it thought proper. It was a question of expediency and propriety; and provision is made, in some of the laws, allowing Episcopal clergyman, already in possession, to remain seven years.

With respect to the opinion ascribed to a late judge of this court, it need only be remarked, that if the cause turned on the point supposed (which does not appear at all from the record), it was but the opinion of an able judge; formed and pronounced instantly, in the course of a jury trial, without case reserved, or solemn argument; and it is no disrespect to say, possibly without a knowledge of all circumstances, or a full view of all consequences.

3. The defendants contend that the fee may have *passed out of the king, and yet [318 not vested anywhere, but remained in abeyance. But the text of Blackstone, which he cites, does not bear him out. The estate in abeyance, in the case put by Blackstone, is a fee, remaining after a freehold has been granted and vested. With respect to the freehold of a glebe, after the death of the parson and before the uaming of a successor, both Fearne and Christain maintain the contrary of Blackstone's opinion; but that is not at all this case. To meet this case, the defendants must show, that if a grant be made to a person not in esse, the land nevertheless passes out of the grantor, and remains in abeyance until, in the course of events, some person arises into being who answers the description in the grant.

4. The observations already made are deemed a sufficient reply to the remarks of the defendants' counsel under this head.

5. It is not supposed possible to give in to the opinion that this is a trust estate, granted to the individuals named in the charter. The idea is wholly novel. Not a syllable in the grant itself intimates any such thing. All is the other way. How can it be imagined that the intention was to convey an estate in trust to a large number of individuals, who were to be, at first, tenants in common; then, to divide and hold in severalty; and whose estates, by law, would descend, in gavel-kind, to their heirs? Was B. Wentworth to be a trustee, whose estate was severed by the charter itself? Was the corporation in England to be one of the trustees? It is hardly necessary to add that the court would not very willingly construc this grant so as to raise a trust, which from the nature of the case never could be executed.

This, then, is a case in which the highest courts of both states have concurred in giving to the grant in question a practicable and beneficial construction; under which very many estates are holden, and the court would not incline to disturb these titles, but for irresistable reasons. It must be remembered that there are two hundred townships granted by charters precisely like this. In the whole, there are not probably more than a dozen associations of Episcopalians. If the court should decide that the legislatures may not dispose of these 319] *lands, what shall be done with them in towns where there are no Episcopal societies to claim them? Are they to remain without owners or rightful occupants till such changes in religious opinions shall take place as that there shall be an Episcopal society in each town?

If this case is to be considered, not as a reservation, but a grant; and if this grant is not void for want of a grantee; then it must, of necessity, receive this construction: i. e., that it was in fact a grant for the use of such ministry, or such religious purposes, as the town should choose, or the state appoint; at least unless the Church of England should have been established by law. The general purpose was religious instruction. This duty the laws of the state throw on the towns, and it is a reasonable construction which gives this fund, even without any particular grant of the legislature to the towns for that purpose. This constructiou will answer the general object of the grant. In no other way can any of its objects be answered, in one case out of fifty. This puts it on the same ground as the grants for schools and for the use of the ministry (a common grant in the charters in the eastern part of New Hampshire). The main purposes of the grants were education and religious instruction; and, in the events which have happened, the most safe and only practicable construction is to give the funds intended for the promotion of these purposes to those on whom the law imposes the obligation of making adequate provision for these objects. I venture to say such is the law of New Hampshire.

There is still another question to which the plaintiff's counsel wishes to draw the attention of the court, and that is, has the court jurisdiction of the cause? Is this a case coming within that clause of the constitution which gives to this court jurisdiction over "controversies between citizens of the same state, "claiming lands by grants of different states?" It is submitted, with some confidence, that this is not such a case. These two grants are not to be considered as the acts of different states, in the sense of the constitution. At the time of the first grant both the present states of New Hampshire and Vermont formed but one state. They have become two by subsequent 320] sub-division. The first grant *was made by the state of Vermont as much as by the state of New Hampshire. The power from which it emanated was the sovereign power of what is now Vermont, precisely as much as it was the sovereign power of what is now New Hampshire. The question is, between an act of the sovereign power of what is now Vermont, passed in 1761, and another act of the sovereign power of Vermont, passed in 1805. If, on the division of territory, that part lying west of Connecticut River had been called New Hampshire, and the part lying east of that river, Vermont, instead of the reverse, it seems to the plaintiff's counsel that in that case the whole ground on which the jurisdiction of the court over this case rests would have been removed.

It is easy to perceive the class of cases for which this provision was made; for example, when disputes about boundaries between two states arise. It is easy, also, to imagine many other cases, apparently within the letter, and yet not within the meaning, and so excluded by a just construction of the clause. These cases arise from the sub-division of states. One may imagine, for example, that in the state of Kentucky ejectments must be often tried, in which grants of Virginia before the division, and grants of Kentucky since, might be respectively relied on by the parties; and yet it would hardly be contended that that circumstance should oust the courts of Kentucky of their jurisdiction, and give the cognizance of all such causes to the courts of the United States. It might be said, in such case, that the grants emanated from different states; and, nominally, they did so. Still they both originated from a power having undoubted authority to grant the territory. The first grant was not so much the act of a different state as of the parent of both states. Virginia now differs as much from Virginia before the severance as Kentucky now differs from Virginia before the severance. Kentucky has the same power over her territory now as Virginia had over the same territory formerly. She is therefore, as to this, to be considered the same sovereign power—in other words, the same state. If integrity of territory, or retention of jurisdiction over the whole of the same soil, is necessary to preserve the identity of political powers, then Virginia herself is not what she was; a grant of hers before the severance and a grant since would be grants from different states.

Shepherd*, in reply, as to jurisdiction. [321

The counsel for the defendants, in answer to the objection made to the jurisdiction of the court, will only say, that this case is certainly within the literal provision of the constitution, and it is presumed the court will not search with solicitude to find a far-fetched meaning in repugnance to the letter so long as it can produce no other object than to send the parties to a trial in the courts of Vermont, where, perhaps, there is not a judge to be found but is interested for or against the plaintiff in this cause.

This is a case where the lands in dispute have been granted by different states; that is, by New Hampshire and Vermont.

Now, although these states were all under one jurisdiction, yet when the land was granted by the state of Vermont they were two sovereign, independent states, and the same reason exists here that can exist in any case of state controversy, for depriving the states respectively of the power to determine the dispute.

If this cause is to be tried in Vermont, the judges are to decide under the very strong impressions of a legislative construction, unequivocally made, of the grant; and to give us what we claim as right, they must decide against a positive statute of their legislature. So far, therefore, is this case from being taken from the letter of the constitution, by any equitable construction with a view to set up the spirit against the letter, that it is within all the reasoning that governed the framers of the constitution, and, most perfectly within the meaning of that clause; and one of the evils which must have been intended to be guarded against exists, at full length, in the present case.

Why was the case of parties claiming land under the grants of different states made cognizable before the United States courts? Undoubtedly because where this state of things exists it is reasonable to suppose that the judges of the states respectively will feel strong prepossessions, and are therefore unfit to decide the strife in relation to the powers and rights [322*] of the conflicting states. *It is the same reason which induced the giving jurisdiction in several other cases, such as citizens of different states, and a state and citizens of another state. In these cases the state courts may be deprived of their jurisdiction; and why? Most indubitably because the judges of the courts of the United States have less interest and fewer prejudices to overcome, and the parties will be more sure of an impartial decision. And can this reason exist strouger in any case than in the one now before the court?

March 10th. Absent—TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The first question presented in this case is, whether the court has jurisdiction. The plaintiffs claim under a grant from the state of Vermont, and the defendants claim under a grant from the state of New Hampshire, made at the time when the latter state compreheuded the whole territory of the former state. The constitution of the United States, among other things, extends the judicial power of the United States to controversies "between citizens of "the same state claiming lands under grants of "different states." It is argued that the grant under which the defendants claim is not a graut of a different state within the meaning of the constitution, because Vermont, at the time of its emanation, was not a distinct government, but was included iu the same sovereignty as New Hampshirc.

But it seems to us that there is nothing in this objection. The constitution intended to secure an impartial tribunal for the decision of causes arising from the grants of different states; and it supposed that a state tribunal might not stand indifferent in a controversy where the claims of its own sovercign were in conflict with those of another sovereign. It had no reference whatsoever to the antecedent situation of the territory, whether included in one sovereignty or auother. It simply regarded the fact whether grants arose under the same or under diffcrent states. Now, it is very clear that although the territory of Vermont was once a part of New Hampshire, yet the state of Vermont, in its *sovercign capacity, is not, [*323 and never was, the same as the state of New Hampshire. The graut of the plaintiffs emanated purely and exclusively from the sovereiguty of Vermont; that of the defendants purely and exclusively from the sovereignty of New Hampshirc. The sovereign power of New Hampshire remains the same, although it has lost a part of its territory; that of Vermont never existed until its territory was separated from the jurisdiction of New Hampshire. The circumstance that a part of the territory or population was once under a common sovereign no more makes the states the same than the circumstance that a part of the members of one corporation constitutes a component part of another corporation makes the corporation the same. Nor can it be affirmed, in any correct sense, that the grants arc of the samc state; for the grant of the defendants could not have been made by the state of Vermont, since that state had not at that time any legal existence; and the grant of the plaintiffs could not have been made by New Hampshire, since, at that time, New Hampshire had no jurisdiction or sovereign existence by the name of Vermont. The case is, therefore, equally within the letter and spirit of the clause of the constitution. It would, indeed, have been a sufficient answer to the objection, that the constitution and laws of the United States, by the admission of Vermont into the union as a distinct government, had decided that it was a different state from that of New Hampshirc.

The other question which has been argued is not without difficulty. It is contended by the plaintiffs that the original grant, in the charter of Pawlet, of "one share for a glebe for "the Church of England as by law establish-"ed," is either void for want of a grantee, or if it could take effect at all, it was as a public reservatiou, which, upon the revolution, devolved upon the state of Vermont.

The material words of the royal charter of 1761 are, "do give and grant in equal shares "unto our loving subjects, &c., their heirs and "assigus forever, whose names are entered on "this grant, to be divided amongst them into "sixty-eight equal shares, all that tract or par-"cel of land, &c., aud that the samc be and "hereby is incorporated *into a town- [*324 "ship by the name of Pawlet; and the inhabit-"ants that do or shall hereafter inhabit the "said township, are hereby declared to be in-"franchised with and entitled to all and every "the privileges and immunities that other "towns within our province by law exercise "and enjoy. To have and to hold the tract of "land, &c., to them and their respective heirs "and assigns forever, upon the following con-"ditions," &c.

Upon the charter are indorsed the names of sixty-two persons, and then follows this additional clause: "His Excellency, Benning "Wentworth, a tract of land to contain 500 "acres as marked in the plan B. W., which is "to be accounted two sharcs; one share for the "incorporated society for the propagation of "the gospel in foreign parts; one share for a "glebe for the Church of England as by law "established; one share for the first settled "minister of the gospel; one share for the "benefit of a school in said town." Thus making up, with the preceding sixty-two shares, the whole number of sixty-eight shares stated in the charter.

Before we proceed to the principal points in controversy, it will be proper to dispose of those which more immediately respect the legal construction of the language of the charter. And in our judgment, upon the true construction of that instrument none of the grantees, saving Governor Wentworth, could legally take more than one single share, or a sixty-eighth part of the township. This construction is conformable to the letter and obvious intent of the grant, and, as far as we have any knowledge, has been uniformly adopted in New Hampshire. It is not for this court upon light grounds or ingenious and artificial reasoning to disturb a construction which has obtained so ancient a sanction, and has settled so many titles, even if it were at first somewhat doubtful. But it is not in itself doubtful; for it is the only construction which will give full effect to all the words of the charter. Upon any other, the words "in equal shares," and "to be divided amongst them in sixty-eight equal shares," would be nugatory or senseless. We are further of opinion that the share for a glebe is not vested in the other grantees having a capacity to take, and so in the nature of a con-
325*] dition, *use, or trust, attaching to the grant. It is nowhere stated to be a condition binding upon such proprietors, although other conditions are expressly specified. Nor is it a trust or use growing out of the sixty-eighth part granted to the respective proprietors, for it is exclusive of these shares by the very terms of the charter. The grant is in the same clause with that to the society for the propagation of the gospel, and in the same language, and ought, therefore, to receive the same construction, unless repugnant to the context or manifestly requiring a different one. It is very clear that the society for the propagation of the gospel take a legal, and not a merely equitable estate: and there would be no repugnancy to the context, in considering the glebe, in whomsoever it may be held to vest, as a legal estate.

We are further of opinion that the three shares in the charter "for a glebe," "for the first settled minister," and "for a school," are to be read in connection, so as to include in each the words "in the said town," i. e. of Pawlet; so that the whole clause is to be construed, one share for a glebe, &c., in the town of Pawlet, one share for the first settled minister in the town of Pawlet, and one share for a school in the town of Pawlet.

We will now consider what is the legal operation of such a grant at the common law, and how far it is affected by the laws of New Hampshire or Vermont.

At common law the Church of England, in its aggregate description, is not deemed a corporation. It is indeed one of the great estates of the realm; but is no more, on that account, a corporation than the nobility in their collective capacity. The phrase, "the Church of England," so familiar in our laws and judicial treatises, is nothing more than a compendious expression for the religious establishment of the realm, considered in the aggregate under the superintendence of its spiritual head. In this sense the Church of England is said to have peculiar rights and privileges, not as a corporation, but as an ecclesiastical institution under the patronage of the state. In this sense it is used in Magna Charta, ch. 1, where it is declared "*quod ecclesina anglicana libera sit, et "habeat omnia jura sua integra, et libertates "suas illæsas;" and Lord Coke, in his [326 commentary on the text, obviously so understands it (2 Inst., 2, 3). The argument, therefore, that supposes a donation to "the Church of England," in its collective capacity, to be good, cannot be supported, for no such corporate body exists even in legal contemplation.

But it has been supposed that the "Church "of England of a particular parish" must be a corporation for certain purposes, although incapable of asserting its rights and powers, except by its parson regularly inducted. And in this respect it might be likened to certain other aggregate corporations acknowledged in law, whose component members are civilly dead, and whose rights may be effectually vindicated through their established head, though during a vacancy of the headship they remain inert; such as the common law corporations of abbot and convent, and prior and monks of a priory. Nor is this supposition without the countenance of authority.

The expression, parish church, has various significations. It is applied sometimes to a select body of Christians forming a local spiritual association; and sometimes to the building in which the public worship of the inhabitants of a parish is celebrated; but the true legal notion of a parochial church is a consecrated place, having attached to it the rights of burial and the administration of the sacraments. (Com. Dig. Esglise, C. Seld. de Decim., 265; 2 Inst., 363; 1 Burn's Eccl. law, 217; 1 Woodes, 314.) Doctor Gibson, indeed, holds that the church, in consideration of law, is properly the cure of souls, and the right of tithes. (Gibs., 189; 1 Burn's Eccl. law, 232.)

Every such church, of common right, ought to have a manse and glebe as a suitable endowment; and without such endowment cannot be consecrated; and until consecration it has no legal existence as a church. (Com. Dig. Dismes, B. 2; 3 Inst., 203; Gibs., 190; 1 Burn's Eccl. law, 233; Com. Dig. Esglise, A; Dort. of Plural, 80.) When a church has thus acquired all the ecclesiastical rights, it becomes, in the language of law, a rectory or parsonage, which consists of a glebe, tithes and oblations established for the maintenance of a parson or rector *to have cure of souls within the [327 parish. (Com. Dig. Eccl. persons, C. 6.)

These capacities, attributes and rights, however, in order to possess a legal entity, and much more to be susceptible of a legal perpetuity, must be invested in some natural or corporate body; for in no other way can they be exercised or vindicated. And so is the opinion of Lord Coke in 3 Inst., 201, 202, where he says, "albeit they" (i. e. subjects) "might "build churches without the king's license, yet "they could not erect a spiritual politic body to "continue in succession and capable of endow-"ment without the king's license; but by the "common law before the statute of Mortmain "they might have endowed the spiritual body "once incorporated perpetuis futuris tempori-

"bus, without any license from the king or any "other."

This passage points clearly to the necessity of a spiritual corporation to uphold the rectorial rights. We shall presently see whether the parish church, after consecration, was deemed in legal intendment such a corporation. In his learned treatise on tenures, Lord Chief Baron Gilbert informs us that anciently, according to the superstition of the age, abbots and prelates "were supposed to be married to the church, "inasmuch as the right of property was vested "in the church, the estate being appropriated, "and the bishop and abbot as husbands and "representatives of the church had the right of "possession in them; and this the rather be- "cause they might maintain actions and re- "cover, and hold courts within their manors "and precincts as the entire owners; and "that crowns and temporal states might have "no reversions of interests in their feuds and "donations. Therefore, since they had the "possession in fee, they might alien in fee; but "they could not alien more than the right of "possession that was in them, for the right of "propriety was in the church." But as to a parochial parson, "because the cure of souls "was only committed to him during life, he "was not capable of a fee, and, therefore, the "fee was in abeyance." (Gilb. Tenures, 110, &c.)

Conformable herewith is the doctrine of Bracton, who observes that an assize juris utrum 328] would not lie *in cases of a gift of lands to cathedral and conventual churches, though given in liberam eleemosynam, because they were not given to the church solely, but also to a parson to be held as a barony, non solum dantur ecclesiis, sed et personis tenendæ in baronia; and, therefore, they might have all the legal remedies applicable to a fee. But he says it is otherwise to a person claiming land in right of his church, for in cases of parochial churches, gifts were not considered as made to the parson, but to the church, quia ecclesiis parochialibus non fit donatio personæ, sed ecclesiæ, secundum perpendi poterit per modum donationis. (Bracton, 286, b; 1 Reeves Hist. law, 369.) And in another place, Bracton, speaking of the modes of acquiring property, declares that a donation may well be made to cathedrals, convents, parish churches and religious personages, poterit etiam donatio fieri in liberam eleemosynam, sicut ecclesiis cathedralibus, conventualibus, parochialibus vivis religiosis, &c. (Bracton, 27, b; 1 Reeve Hist. law, 303.)

The language of these passages would seem to consider cathedral, conventual, and parochial churches as corporations of themselves, capable of holding lands. But upon an attentive examination it will be found to be no more than an abbreviated designation of the nature, quality and tenure of different ecclesiastical inheritances, and that the real spiritual corporations, which are tacitly referred to, are the spiritual heads of the particular church, viz., the bishop, the abbot, and, as more important to the present purpose, the parson, qui gerit personam ecclesiæ.

Upon this ground it has been held in the year books (11 H. 4, 84, b), and has been cited as good law by Fitzherbert and Brook (Fitz: Feoff't. pl. 42; Bro. Estate pl. 49, S. C. Viner, ab. L. pl. 4), that if a grant be made to the church of such a place, it shall be a fee in the parson and his successors. Si terre soit done per ceux parolz, dedit et concessit ecclesiæ del tiel lien, le parson et ses successeurs serra inheriter. And in like manner if the gift be of chattels to parishioners, who are no corporation, it is good, and the church wardens shall take them in succession, for the gift is to the use of the church. (37 H. 6, 30; 1 Kyd. Corp. 29.)

* In other cases the law looks to the [329 substance of the gift, and in favor of religion, vests it in the party capable of taking it. And notwithstanding the doubts of a learned, but singular mind, (Perk., § 55,) in our judgment the grant in the present charter, if there had been a church actually existing in Pawlet at the time of the grant, must, upon the common law, have received the same construction. In the intendment of law the parson and his successors would have been the representatives of the church entitled to take the donation of the glebe. It would in effect have been a grant to the parson of the Church of England, in the town of Pawlet, and to his successors, of one share in the township, as an endowment to be held jure ecclesiæ; for a glebe is emphatically the dowry of the church; Gleba est terra qua consistit dos ecclesiæ. (Lind., 254.)

Under such circumstances, by the common law, the existing parson would have immediately become seized of the freehold of the glebe, as a sole corporation capable of transmitting the inheritance to his successors.

Whether, during his life, the fee would be in abeyance according to the ancient doctrine (Litt., § 646, 647; Co. Lit., 342; 5 Edw., 4, 105; Dyer 71, pl., 43; Hob., 338; Com. Dig., Abeyance A; Id.; Ecclesiastical persons, C., 9; Perk., § 709), or whether, according to learned opinions in modern times the fee should be considered as quodam modo vested in the parson for the benefit of his church and his successors, (Co., Lit., 341 a.; Com. Dig., Eccl., persons, C., 9; Fearne, cont. rem., 513, &c.; Christian's note to 2 Black., Com., 107, note 3; Gilb., tenures 113; 1 Wooddeson 312), is not very material to be settled; for at all events the whole fee would have passed out of the crown. (Litt., § 648; Co. Lit., 341, a.; Christian's note ubi supra; Gilb. tenures, 113.) Nor would it be in the power of the crown, after such a grant executed in the parson, to resume it at its pleasure. It would become a perpetual inheritance of the church, not liable, even during a vacancy, to be devested; though by consent of all parties interested, viz, the patron, and ordinary, and also the parson if the church were full, it might be aliened or encumbered. (Litt., § 648; Co. Lit., 343; Perk., § 35; 1 Burn's Eccl. law, 585.)

* But inasmuch as there was not any [330 church duly consecrated and established in Pawlet at the time of the charter, it becomes necessary further to inquire whether, at common law, a grant so made is wholly void for want of a corporation having a capacity to take.

In general no grant can take effect unless there be a sufficient grantee then in existence. This, in the case of corporations, seems pressed yet further; for if there be an aggregate corporation, having a head, as a mayor and commonalty, a grant or devise made to the corporation during the vacancy of the headship is merely void; although for some purposes, as for the choice of a head, the corporation is still considered as having a legal entity. (13 Ed., 4, 8; 18 Ed., 4, 8; Bro. Corporation, 58, 59; Dalison, R., 31; 1 Kyd. Corp., 106, 107; Perk., § 33, 50.) Whether this doctrine has been applied to parochial churches duriug au avoidance has not appeared in any authorities that have fallen within our notice; and perhaps can be satisfactorily settled only by a recurrence to analogous principles, which have been applied to the original endowments of such churches.

We have already seen that no parish church, as such, could have a legal existence until consecration: and consecration was expressly iuhibited unless upon a suitable endowment of land. The canou law, followiug the civil law, required such endowment to be made, or at least ascertained, before the building of the church was begun. (Gibs., 189; 1 Burn's Eccl. law, 233.) This endowment was in ancient times commonly made by an allotment of mause and glebe, by the lord of the manor, who thereupon became the patron of the church. Other persons also at the time of consecration often contributed small portions of ground, which is the reason, we are told, why, in England, in many parishes, the glebe is not only distant from the manor, but lies in remote, divided parcels. (Keu. Par. Aut: 222, 223, cited in 1 Burn's, Eccl. law, 234.) The manner of foundiug the church and making the allotment was for the bishop or his commissioner to set up a cross and set forth the ground where the church was to be built, and it then became the endowment of the church. (Degge., p. 1, ch. 12, cited 1 Burn's, Eccl. law, 233).

331*] * From this brief history of the foundation of parsouages and churches, it is apparent that there could be uo spiritual or other corporation capable of receiving livery of seizin of the endowment of the church. There could be no parson, for he could be iuducted into office only as a parson of an existing church, and the endowment must precede the establishment thereof. Nor is it even hinted that the land was conveyed in trust, for at this early period trusts were an unknown refinement. The land, therefore, must have passed out of the donors, if at all, without a grantee, by way of public appropriation or dedication to pious uses. In this respect it would form an exception to the generality of the rule, that to make a grant valid there must be a person in esse capable of taking it. And under such circumstances until a parson should be legally inducted to such new church, the fee of its lands would remain in abeyance, or be like the hæreditas jacens of the Roman code in expectation of an heir. This would conform exactly to the doctrine of the civil law, which, as to pious donations, Bracton has not scrupled to affirm to be the law of England. Res vero sacræ, religiosæ, et sanctæ in nullius bonis sunt, quod enim divini juris est, id in nullius hominis bonis est, immo in bonis dei hominum censura, &c. Res quidam nullius dicuntur pluribus modis, &c. Item censura (ut dictum est,) sicut res sacræ religiosæ et sanctæ. Item casu, sicut est hæreditas jacens ante additionem, sed fallit in hoc, quia sustinet vicum personæ defuncti, vel quia speratur futura hæreditas ejus, qui adibit. (Bracton, 8, a; Justin. instit. lib. 2, tit. 1; Co. Lit. 342, on Litt., § 447).

Nor is this a novel doctrine in the common law. In the familiar case where a man lays out a public street or highway, there is, strictly speaking, no grantee of the easement, but it takes effect by way of grant or dedication to public uses. (Lade v. Shepherd, 2 Str. 1,004; Hale in Harg. 78.) So, if the parson or a stranger purchase a bell with his own money and put it up, the property passes from the purchaser, because, when put up, it is consecrated to the church, 11 H. 4, 12, 1 Kyd. Corp., 29, 30. These principles may seem to savor of the ancient law; but in a modern case in which, in argument, the doctrine was asserted, Lord Hardwicke did not deny it, but simply decided that the circumstances of that case did not amount to a donation of the land, on which *a chapel had been built, to public and [332 pious uses. (Attorney-General v. Foley, 1 Dick. R., 363.) And in an intermediate period, Lord Chief Justice Dyer held that if the Crown by a statute renounced an estate, the title was gone from the Crown, although not vested in any other person. but the fee remained iu abeyance.

It is true that Weston, J., was, in the same case, of a different opinion; but Lord Chief Baron Comyns has quoted Dyer's opinion without any mark of disapprobation. (Com. Dig. Abeyance, A., 1).

For the reasons, then, that have been stated, a donation by the Crown for the usc of a nonexisting parish church may well take effect by the common law as a dedication to pious uses, and the Crown would thereupon be deemed the patron of the future benefice when brought into life. And after such a donation it would not be competent for the Crown to resume it at its own will, or alien the property without the same consent which is uecessary for the alienation of other church property, viz., the consent of the ordinary, and parson, if the church be full, or in a vacancy, of the ordinary alone.

And the same principles would govern the case before the court if it were to be decided upon the mere footing of the common law. If the charter had been of a township in England, the grant of the glebe would have taken effect as a dedication to the parochial church of England to be established therein.

Before such church were duly erected and consecrated the fee of the glebe would remain in abeyance, or at least be beyond the power of the Crown to alien without the ordinary's consent. Upon the erection and consecration of such a church and the regular induction of a parson, such parson and his successors would, by operation of law and without further act, have taken the inheritance jure ecclesiæ.

Let us now see how far these principles were applicable to New Hampshire at the time of the issuing of the charter of Pawlet.

New Hampshire was originally erected into a royal *province in the 31st year of [333 Charles II., and from thence until the revolution continued a royal province, under the immediate control and direction of the crown. By the first royal commission granted in 31 Charles II., among other things, judicial powers, in all actions, were granted to the provincial governor and council, "so always that "the form of proceedings in such cases, and "the judgment thereupon to be given, be as "consonant and agreeable to the laws and stat- "utes of this, our realm of England, as the "present state and condition of our subjects in- "habiting within the limits aforesaid (i. e. of "the province) and the circumstances of the "place will admit." Independent, however, of such a provision, we take it to be a clear principle that the common law in force at the emigration of our ancestors is deemed the birthright of the colonies, unless so far as it is inapplicable to their situation, or repugnant to their other rights and privileges. A fortiori the principle applies to a royal province.

By the same commission or charter the crown granted to the subjects of the province, "that "liberty of conscience shall be allowed to all "Protestants, and that such especially as shall "be conformable to the rites of the Church of "England shall be particularly countenanced "and encouraged." By a subsequent commission of 15 Geo. 2, the governor of the province, among other things, is authorized "to col- "late any person or persons to any churches, "chapels, or other ecclesiastical benefices, "within our said province, as often as any "shall happen to be void," and this authority was continued and confirmed in the same terms by royal commissions, in 1 Geo. 3, and 6 Geo. 3. By the provincial statute of 13 Ann, ch. 43, the respective towns in the province were authorized to choose, settle and maintain their ministers, and to levy taxes for this purpose, so always that no person who constantly and conscientiously attended public worship according to another persuasion should be excused from taxes. And the respective towns were further authorized to build and repair meeting houses, ministers' houses and school houses, and to provide and pay school-masters. This is the whole of the provincial and royal legislation upon the subject of religion.

Inasmuch as liberty of conscience was al- 334] lowed and *the Church of England was not exclusively established, the ecclesiastical rights to tithes, oblations and other dues had no legal existence in the province. Neither, upon the establishment of churches, was a consecration by the bishop, or a presentation of a parson to the ordinary, indispensable; for no bishopric existed within the province.

But the common law, so far as it respected the erection of churches of the Episcopal persuasion of England, the right to present, or collate to such churches, and the corporate capacity of the parsons thereof to take in succession, seems to have been fully recognized and adopted. It was applicable to the situation of the province, was avowed in the royal grants and commissions, and explicitly referred to in the appropriation of glebes, in almost all the charters of townships in the province. And it seems to be also clear that it belonged to the crown exclusively, at its own pleasure, to erect the church in each town that should be entitled to take the glebe, and upon such erection to collate, through the governor, a parson to the benefice. The respective towns in their corporate capacity had no control over the glebe; but inasmuch as they were bound, by the provincial statute, to maintain public worship, and had therefore an interest to be eased of the public burthen, by analogy to the common law in relation to the personal property of the parish church, the glebe could not, before the erection of a church, be aliened by the crown without their consent; nor after the erection of a church and induction of a parson, could the glebe be aliened without the joint consent of the crown as patron, the parson as persona ecclesiæ, and the parishioners of the church as having a temporal as well as spiritual interest, and thereby in effect representing the ordinary.

But a mere voluntary society of Episcopalians within a town, unauthorized by the crown, could no more entitle themselves, on account of their religious tenets, to the glebe, than any other society worshipping therein.

The church entitled must be a church recognized in law for this particular purpose. Whenever, therefore, within the province, previous to the revolution, an Episcopal church was duly erected by the crown in any town, *the [335 parsons thereof regularly inducted had a right to the glebe in perpetual succession. Where no such church was duly erected by the crown, the glebe remained as an hæreditas jacens, and the state which succeeded to the rights of the crown might, with the assent of the town, alien or encumber it; or might erect an Episcopal church therein, and collate, either directly or through the vote of the town, indirectly, its parson, who would thereby become seized of the glebe jure ecclesiæ, and be a corporation capable of transmitting the inheritance.

Such, in our judgment, are the rights and privileges of the Episcopal churches of New Hampshire, and the legal principles applicable to the glebes reserved in the various townships of that state previous to the revolution. And without an adoption of some of the common law in the manner which I have suggested, it seems very difficult to give full effect to the royal grants and commissions, or to uphold that ecclesiastical policy which the crown had a right to patronize and to which it so explicitly avowed its attachment.

It seems to be tacitly, if not openly, conceded, that before the revolution no regular Episcopal church was established in Pawlet. By the revolution the state of Vermont succeeded to all the rights of the crown as to the unappropriated as well as appropriated glebes.

It now, therefore, becomes material to survey the statutes which the state of Vermont has, from time to time, passed on this subject.

By the statute of the 26th of October, 1787, the selectmen of the respective towns were authorized during the then septennary (which expired in 1792), to take the care and inspection of the glebes and to lease the same for, and during the same term; and further, to recover possession of the same, where they had been taken possession of by persons without title; but an exception is made in favor of ordained Episcopal ministers, who, during their ministry within the same term, were allowed to take the profits of the glebes within their respective towns. The statute of 30th October, 1794, granted to their respective towns the entire property of the glebes therein situate, for the sole use and support of religious worship; and *authorized the selectmen of the towns [336 to lease and recover possession of such glebes. This act was repealed by the statute of the 5th of November, 1779. But by the statute of the 5th of November, 1805, the glebes were again granted to the respective towns, for the use of the schools of such towns; and power was given to the selectmen to sue for possession of, and to lease the same.

By the operation of these statutes, and especially of that of 1794, which, so far as it granted the glebes to the towns could not afterwards be repealed by the legislature so as to devest the right of the towns under the grant, the towns became respectively entitled to all the glebes situate therein which had not been previously appropriated by the regular and legal erection of an Episcopal church within the particular town; for in such case the towns would legally represent all the parties in interest, viz., the state which might be deemed the patron, and the parish.

Without the authority of the state, however, they could not apply the lands to other uses than public worship; and in this respect the statute of 1805 conferred a new right which the towns might or might not exercise at their own pleasure.

Upon these principles the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, unless the defendants show, not merely that before the year 1794 there was a society of Episcopalians in Pawlet, regularly established according to the rules of that sect, but that such society was erected by the crown, or the state, as an Episcopal church (i. e., the Church of England), established in the town of Pawlet. For unless it have such a legal existence, its parson cannot be entitled to the glebe reserved in the present charter.

The statement of facts is not, in this particular, very exact; but it may be inferred from it that the Episcopal society or church was not established in Pawlet previous to the year 1802. In what manner and by what authority it was then established does not distinctly appear. As the title of the plaintiffs is, however, prima facie good, and the title of the defendants is not shown to be sufficient, upon the principles which have been stated the plaintiffs would seem entitled to judgment.

337*] *There is another view of the subject which if any doubt hung over that which has been already suggested would decide the cause in favor of the plaintiffs. And it is entitled to the more weight because it seems in analogous cases to have received the approbation and sanction of the state courts of New Hampshire. In the various royal charters of townships in which shares have been reserved for public purposes (and they are numerous) it has been held that the shares for the first settled minister and for the benefit of a school, were vested in the town in its corporate capacity; in the latter case as a fee-simple absolute, in the former case as a base fee, determinable upon the settlement of the first minister by the town.

The foundation of this construction is supposed to be that the town is by law obliged to maintain public worship and public schools; and that therefore the legal title ought to pass to the town, which is considered as the real cestui que use. By analogy to this reasoning the share for a glebe might be deemed to be vested in the town for the use of an Episcopal church; and then, before any such church should be established, and the use executed in its parson, by the joint assent of the legislature and the town, the land might at any time be appropriated to other purposes.

We do not profess to lay any particular stress on this last consideration, because we are entirely satisfied to vest the decision upon the principles which have been before asserted.

On the whole, the opinion of the majority of the court is, that upon the special statement of facts by the parties, judgment ought to pass for the plaintiffs.

JOHNSON, J. The difficulties in this case appear to me to arise from refining too much upon the legal principles relative to ecclesiastical property under the laws of England.

I find no difficulty in getting a sufficient trustee to sustain the fee until the uses shall arise.

It is not material whether the corporation of Pawlet *consist of the proprietors or in- [338 habitants. The grant certainly vests the legal interest in the proprietor; and it is in nothing inconsistent with this idea to admit that the corporate powers of the town of Pawlet are vested in the inhabitants. The proprietors may still well be held trustees, but the application of the trust may be subject to the will of the whole combined population.

I therefore construe this grant thus: We vest in you so much territory, by metes and bounds, in trust to divide the same into sixty-eight shares; to assign one share in fee to each of you, the grantees, two to the governor, one to the Church of England as by law established, &c. This certainly would be a sufficient conveyance to support the fee for the purposes prescribed.

But the difficulty arises on the meaning of the words "Church of England as by law established." This was unquestionably meant to set apart a share of the land granted for the use of that class of Christians known by the description of Episcopalians. But was it competent for any man, or any number of men, to enter upon this land without any legal designation or organization identifying them to come within the description of persons for whose use this reservation was made? I think not. Some act of the town of Pawlet, or of the legislature of the state, or at least of Episcopal jurisdiction, became necessary to give form and consistency to the cestui que use, until such person or body became constituted and recognized I see nothing to prevent the legislature itself from making an appropriation of this property.

Their controlling power over the corporate body denominated the town of Pawlet certainly sanctioned such an act; and before the act passed in this case there does not appear to have been in existence a person, or body of men, in which the use could have vested.

I therefore concur in the decision of the court.

If the facts stated in a special plea do not amount in law to a justification, yet if issue be joined thereon, and if the facts be proved as stated, it is error in the judge to instruct the jury that the facts so proved do not in law maintain the issue on the part of the defendant.

If a collector justify the detention of a vessel, under the 11th section of the embargo law of the 25th of April, 1808, vol. 9, p. 150, he need not show that his opinion was correct, nor that he used reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining the facts upon which his opinion was formed. It is sufficient that he honestly entertained the opinion upon which he acted.

Quære. Whether, under that act, the collector was bound to transmit to the President a statement of the facts upon which he formed his opinion that the vessel intended to violate the embargo laws; and whether he was bound in law to use reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining the facts thus to be laid before the President. Whether the collector had a right, under that act, to remove a vessel from one harbor to another, as well as to detain her.

ERROR to the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, under the 25th section of the judiciary law of the United States (vol. 1, p. 63), in an action of trespass by Watkins against Otis, a deputy-collector of the district of Barnstable, for taking, carrying away and destroying the plaintiff's schooner Friendship, and her cargo of cod-fish.

The defendant pleaded that he was a deputy-collector for the district of Barnstable; that by the 11th section of the act of Congress of the 25th of April, 1808 (vol. 9, p. 150), it is enacted, "that the collectors of the customs be, and they "are hereby respectively authorized to detain any "vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some "other port of the United States, whenever, in "their opinions, the intention is to violate or "evade any of the provisions of the acts laying "an embargo, until the decision of the Presi- "dent of the United States be had thereupon." That the schooner Friendship with her cargo was lying in the harbor of Provincetown, in the district of Barnstable, ostensibly bound to some other port in the United States, in the opinion of the collector with an intent to violate or evade the provisions of the acts aforesaid; whereupon the collector, by the defendant, his deputy, caused the said vessel and her cargo to be detained and removed from the port and harbor of Provincetown to the port and harbor of Barnstable, that she might be securely kept; and there also caused her to be detained, as it was lawful for him to do, so that the decision of the President of the United States might be had thereupon; and that the President, afterwards, on the 3d of January, 1809, upon the report and representation of the said collector, approved and confirmed the detention; all which is the same taking, &c. To this plea there was a general replication and issue, upon the trial of which a bill of exceptions was taken, which stated that the defendant, in order to show that the collector had reasonable ground to believe that this vessel intended to violate or evade the embargo laws, 340*] *offered in evidence the deposition of an inspector of the customs, who testified that he went on board the schooner, at Provincetown, which was wholly laden with fish in bulk, and a barrel of beef and a number of packages of small stores and three or four barrels of water. That he supposed she was bound to sea and gave information thereof, and of his suspicions, to the collector. That she had also a number of kegs of pickled oysters on board; and that he judged that the groceries were sufficient for the crew of such a vessel for thirty days, and that he had no doubt of her being bound to sea; which was the reason of his giving the information. Upon cross-examination he said he had never lived in the county of Barnstable, and did not know the course and manner of their trade and navigation. It further appeared in evidence, that on the 19th of December, 1808, written orders were given by the collector to one Andrew Garrett to detain the schooner, then lying in Provincetown harbor, and bring her to the port of Barnstable, and there secure her in the best manner possible. That the distance from Provincetown to Barnstable is about 30 miles by water. That on the voyage she accidentally ran on a point of land, and could not be got off until she was frozen up in the ice, and there remained until March following, when she was got off, and brought up to the wharf and her cargo unladen and safely stored. That about 70 quintals of cod-fish were damaged, but the residue was in good order. That when she was so detained she had nine barrels of water on board, but no bread. That her sails were on shore. That on the 24th of December, 1808, the collector wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury that he had detained the schooner Friendship, loaded with dry cod-fish and evidently intended for a foreign port, as she had an unusual quantity of small stores on board sufficient for such a voyage. and fully watered; that their plea was that she was intended for a store ship, and a neighboring market, both of which it was sufficiently evident were without foundation. That on the 3d of January the secretary answered that the detention of the schooner was approved and confirmed by the President. That the collector had used due care and diligence in the preservation of the vessel and cargo. That on the 30th of January, 1809, the Secretary of the Treasury wrote to the collector, authorizing him to release all vessels detained by him under the *said 11th section of the act afore- [341 said, on bond being given, in the manner and to the amount provided by the 2d section of the act of January 9th, 1809. That on the 15th of February, 1809, the collector sent the following written notice to the plaintiff, Watkins, dated at the custom-house: "Sir, I hereby re- "quest of you as the owner of the schooner "Friendship, of Provincetown, detained by or- "der under the 11th section of the embargo "law of the 25th of April, 1808, at Barnstable, "to give bond here, within three days after "giving this notification, agreeable to the sec- "ond section of the act to enforce the embargo "passed on the 9th ultimo.

"I am, sir, your humble servant,

"JOSEPH OTIS, Collector."

But that Watkins wholly refused to give such bond. That on the 21st of March, 1808, the collector wrote to the comptroller of the treasury, stating that on the 24th of December he had detained the schooner Friendship under the embargo law for loading with cod-fish without a permit, which detention was approved and confirmed by the President. That on the passage of the act of the 9th of January, 1809, he notified the owner that if he would give bond agreeably to the second section of the same, he would give her up to him, which he utterly refused to do, or to unload his vessel, for more than a fortnight. That he wished to know whether she ought not to be libeled.

To this letter the comptroller replied, referring the collector to the attorney of the district. That the vessel was afterwards libeled in the District Court, for having taken her cargo on board in the night, without a license, and without the inspection of the proper inspecting officers of the port. Upon trial she was acquitted.

The plaintiff also produced a laborer who stowed the fish on board the schooner, who testified that the vessel "was destined to Boston for a market," and that the vessel and cargo were much injured in consequence of the detention. He also produced testimony that it was usual for vessels going from Provincetown to take water enough on board to last them to 342 Boston and for two *or three weeks, because the people did not like the Boston water. That it was usual to take eight or ten barrels on such a voyage. Whereupon the judge who tried the cause (Chief Justice Parsons) charged the jury "that the several matters and things "so given in evidence by the defendant, Otis, "did not in law maintain the issue on his part; "and also that it was the duty of the collector, "as collector, to have used reasonable care in "ascertaining the facts on which to form an "opinion; and to transmit to the President a "statement of those facts for his decision."

The verdict and judgment being against the defendant, he brought his writ of error.

The case was submitted to this court, by J. Law for the plaintiff in error, and by J. Reid, of Massachusetts, for the defendant, upon written notes of argument.

J. Law, for the plaintiff in error.

The question for consideration by this court on this appeal arises on the bill of exceptions taken to the opinion and instruction of the judge before whom the trial was held in the state court. It divides itself into two branches.

1. Whether the several matters, given in evidence by Otis and spread on the record, maintain the issue on his part.

2. Whether it was his duty to have used his reasonable care in ascertaining the facts on which to form an opinion; and to transmit a statement of those facts to the President for his decision.

1. On the first point it will be observed that the issue joined is, that at the time of the detention the vessel was ostensibly bound to some other port of the United States, in the opinion of the collector, with an intent to violate or evade the provisions of the act of April 25, 1808; that the vessel was removed from Provincetown to Barnstable that she might be securely kept until the decision of the President thereon; and that the President approved and confirmed the said detention.

343* *Is there any evidence to show that the collector did not entertain an opinion that the said vessel was ostensibly bound to some other port in violation of the embargo? The information he received came from an agent of the government, Isaac Cooper, who was inspector of customs. He stated to the collector, not merely his suspicions, but his belief. He also stated, as the grounds of his belief, that the vessel was fully watered, and contained a sufficient quantity of groceries, stores and provisions for a foreign voyage; information which is satisfactorily proved to have been correct, and which was sufficient to excite a just suspicion of the intention of the owners of the vessel. At any rate, these circumstances of suspicion were sufficiently strong to repel any implication of mala fides in the collector in forming his opinion.

It is, however, contended on the part of Watkins, that information, coming from such a source, is not to be respected, because Cooper was unacquainted with the course of trade from Provincetown to Boston; and the quantity of water on board the schooner was only such as is generally taken in such voyages. The fact whether Cooper was acquainted or not with the course of trade is immaterial. The only question is, did Otis believe that he was competent to give correct information on the point? He certainly did think so; at any rate there is no evidence to the contrary; and the circumstance of Cooper's being an inspector of the customs would be alone sufficient to accredit his information.

But even admitting the fact that the quantity of water on board the schooner is accounted for, no explanation is given of the quantity of groceries, small stores and provisions, on board. Although it may be contended that the water at Provincetown is better than that of Boston, it will not, I presume, be contended that the groceries and small stores would be better and cheaper at the former place than at the latter.

The circumstance of the sails belonging to the vessel not being on board at the time of the detention can have no weight against the collector, because it was not to be supposed he was to wait until the vessel was on the very point of sailing before he acted on his opinion.

*That the collector was justified in [344 removing the vessel to Provincetown that she might be safely kept; and afterwards in unloading her when the owner refused to give bond, is settled by the decision of this court in the case of Crowell & Hawes v. M'Fuddon. "The "landing and storing the cargo, whether to "preserve it from injury or to secure it from "rescue was a necessary consequence of the "detention." The removal, therefore, of the vessel from Provincetown, which is at the very extremity of Cape Cod, to Barnstable, where the collector resided and had his office and his agents, was a necessary consequence of the detention, to guard against a rescue, and to save the expense of engaging an adequate guard to take care of the vessel. There is, in fact, no evidence to prove that such was not the real motive for causing the removal and for unloading the vessel.

2. The second branch of the judge's instruction and opinion is exceptionable in many respects. It implies that reasonable care had not been used by the collector in ascertaining the facts on which to form an opinion. He had sufficient evidence on which to form an honest opinion, and he was not bound to go beyond that evidence, if it was satisfactory to him.

This instruction of the judge also implies that the collector is answerable for the correctness or incorrectness of his opinion. Such a position cannot be admitted. If public officers were to be answerable for error of judgment, few would be venturous enough to engage in so perilous a service; and it would be in vain to submit the performance of any duty to the exercise of a sound discretion. Such a doctrine would establish a new criterion of innocence and guilt; and judges would be engaged in measuring the mental capacities of men. Yet such would be the consequenee of punishiug an officer who had discretionary powers, if the examination was not into the purity of his intention, but into the correctness of the judgment which influenced his conduct.

But the principles of law and the obvious import of the embargo act refute such a doctrine. It is not the injury done to an individual, or error of judgment, but malice alone that is the gist of prosecutions against a public 345] *officer at common law for malfeasance in office. Gross and flagrant misconduct may justify a presumption of malice; but even such misconduct, if it is proved to be the result of meutal imbecility or good intentioned ignorance, is pardonable. In the present case a collector, exercising the odious and unpopular duty imposed upon him by the act, ought surely to receive similar indulgence; and the words of the act, in authorizing him to detain vessels according to his opinion of their destination, give him this indulgence. In acting over an extensive district, he is not to be questioned whether he could have got better information, or ought to have acted on the information he received, if he acted honestly and conscientiously.

But this point is put at rest by the opinion of the court in the case of Crowell & Hawes v. M'Faddon, February term, 1814. It was there decided that the law placed a confidence in the opinion of the officer, and he is bound to act according to his opinion; and when he honestly acts, as he must do in the execution of his duty, he cannot be punished for it. The instruction, therefore, of the judge was erroneous; as it was calculated to mislead the jury, and to establish another test of his conduct than the honesty of his opinion.

The last branch of the instruction excepted to is, that it was the duty of the collector to transmit to the Presideut, for his decision, a statement of the facts whieh had been thus ascertained with care. In this case it is contended by Otis that a sufficient statement was made to the President for his decision; although the iustruction implies that the judge was of a contrary opinion. In his letter to Mr. Gallatin of the 24th December, 1808, he states, as the ground of his opinion, that the schooner had an unusual quantity of small stores on board, sufficient for a foreign voyage, and was fully watered. This statement the President thought a sufficient foundatiou for his decision, and accordingly approved of the detention.

It has already been shown that the facts stated by the collector, as the foundation of his opinion, were true. Admitting, however, that the statement was incorrect, or the facts capable of explanation, was it uot the duty of Wat-346] kins *to address the President concerning the detention of his vessel, to correct auy misstatements, and explain any dubious facts? Did he do so, and can he now, after such supine or sullen negligence on his part, complain of the conduct of the collector, who stated fairly what he heard, or of the conduct of the President who decided upon it? It is his fault only if he made no defense, aud took no steps to recover his vessel. The small sullenness of conduct induced him to refuse to give boud for the release of his vessel, when such a proposition was made to him.

The case of Bacon v. Otis has nothing to do with this case.

J. Read, of Massachusetts, for the defendant in error.

It is understood that the Supreme Court of the United States has no authority under the law which authorizes this appeal, to notice any errors except such as appear on the face of the record, and immediately respect the questions of validity of construction of the constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions or authorities in dispute. This being the case, it is presumed the principal question for the decision of the court in the cause now under consideration is, was the charge given by Chief Justice Parsons, in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts on the final trial of the cause now under eonsideration, in conformity with a correct and valid construction of the laws of the United States?

He charged the jury "that it was the duty of "the collector, as collector, to have used rea-"sonable care in ascertaining the facts on which "to form an opinion, and to transmit to the "President a statement of those facts for his "decision."

Collectors of customs were authorized by the 11th section of the statute of April, 1808, to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States, whenever, in their opinion, the intention is to violate or evade any of the provisions of the acts laying an embargo, until the decision of the President of the Uuited States be had thereupon.

*The collector of customs was bound [347 to have some rational ground for his opinion. otherwise he might seize all vessels under any circumstances, and it would always be a complete justification, on his part, merely to say that, in his opinion, the vessels seized were ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States, and were about to violate or evade some of the provisions of the embargo laws. Such a defense, it is apprehended, would not amount, in all cases, to a justification. The power and authority of a collector is confined to a vessel ostensibly bound, &c. The collector should have had rational ground to induce him to believe that the vessel was osteusibly bound, &c.; that there was an intention of violating the embargo laws. In the case of Otis v. Bacon (7 Cranch, 589), this court determined that Otis detained the vessel of Bacon unlawfully, because, in their opinion, there was no rational ground of suspicion of an intended violation of the embargo laws; and the court in that case went into an examination of the facts in order to determine whether Otis had rational ground of suspicion. The result of their investigation was, in their own words, "all rational grounds of suspicion of an intended violation of the embargo laws is then done away," &c.

If it then be admitted that a collector was bound, wheu acting under the authority of the embargo laws, and especially of the 11th section of the law of 25th April, 1808, to have rational ground for his opinions and suspicions, it is confidently believed it was the duty of such collector to have used those means to ascertain facts without which there can be no rational ground of belief. "It was the duty of "the collector, as collector, to have used rea- "sonable care in ascertaining the facts on which "to form an opinion," as directed by the judge in the court of Massachusetts. It was his duty as an honest man; as an officer in whom the government had placed the highest confidence; on whose suspicions depended the property of hundreds.

It is also believed that it was the duty of the collector not only to have used reasonable care in ascertaining the facts on which to form an opinion, but to transmit to the President a statement of those facts for his decision.

348*] *Collectors were entrusted with great and unprecedented power under the embargo laws. They were under the highest obligations to execute the trust reposed in them honestly and faithfully. The power of collectors consisted principally in the influence their statement or representation must necessarily have on the mind of the President. Collectors were authorized in certain events to seize and detain; but could detain only until the will of the President could be known. His approbation was requisite to a continuation of the detention. The President was by law constituted the sole judge whether a vessel seized and detained by a collector should be restored or not. On what evidence was the opinion of the President in such cases to be founded? The opinion of the President must, from the necessity of the case, be founded almost universally on the statement or representation of the collector. The collector, under the embargo law, after he had seized a vessel, became a witness—and sole witness in the case; and a witness not in a situation to be cross-examined. On the statement or representation of the collector, the President founded his opinion, Then it follows irresistibly that it was the bounden duty of a collector so situated, to have transmitted to the President a statement of facts in the case on which the opinion of the President was asked. If the collector was bound to represent the facts in the case to the President, he must have been bound to have used reasonable care in ascertaining those facts, not only as the foundation of his own opinions or suspicions, but also as the foundation upon which the ultimate decision of the President must rest.

If the opinions of the judge, in the court below, were considered unsound and were not established, it is apprehended the greatest injustice might be practiced; and as no case can readily be imagined where the conduct of a collector could have been more reprehensible, than in the case now under consideration, we beg the court again to advert to some facts in the case now under consideration. From the decision of the District Court, when the schooner Friendship, &c., was libeled and tried before that court (here, perhaps, I ought again to note, that after Otis seized Watkins's vessel, &c., and was directed on certain conditions to deliver her up, and Watkins refused to accept her; Otis libeled her and pretended that *he had seized her for loading without [349 a permit) the judge of that court certified that at the time Otis first seized the vessel (December 24th, 1808), Watkins was loading his vessel in bulk in the day-time with dried cod-fish avowedly for the Boston market. It also appears that some water and small stores were carried on board, not, however, so much as was usually put on board to go to Boston. Otis, it seems, obtained the information he possessed, from a stranger to the place and to their course of business. If he knew not what quantity of water and small stores were usual he could not know what was unusual. He immediately sent a number of men to seize and detain the vessel, and had he done no more, the injury would probably have been trifling. But he ordered them not only to seize and detain, but to bring away and remove the schooner from Provincetown, one of the safest and best harbors in the world, to Barnstable, a distance of more than thirty miles. In attempting to obey his commands, the vessel was run aground and much injured and the cargo nearly ruined. He afterwards got the vessel to the wharf and unloaded it. What statement did he make to the President? What information did he give? Did he say he had removed the vessel thirty miles? Did he say he had run the vessel aground and ruined the cargo? No! He studiously avoided saying one word on the subject. He stated to the President that the vessel was evidently intended for a foreign port, for, said he, she had an unusual quantity of small stores on board; sufficient for such a voyage; and was fully watered. He also stated that the plea of Watkins, that his vessel was intended for a store ship and a neighboring market, was without foundation. Did he represent things truly?

Afterwards, on the 30th day of January, 1809, Otis was directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to give up the vessel and cargo to Watkins. Here the affair would have ended, but the vessel and cargo had been ruined by running aground, and Watkins refused under all the circumstances to accept her. Otis then wrote to the comptroller of the treasury, on the 21st of March, a few days after he had unladen the vessel, and stated that he had detained the vessel on the 24th day of December (being the same day on which he originally seized and removed the said vessel), because she was loading without a *permit. He wrote to the [350 President that he had seized and detained her because, in his opinion, she was intended for a foreign port. Thus it is evident that Otis made one statement to the President and a very different statement to the comptroller. Both statements could not be true; and he carefully avoided stating to either the removal of the vessel and the consequent ruin of the property.

Our attention is called to a case decided at the last term of this court—Crowell et al. v. M'Faddon (8 Cranch, 94). The court observed, "the law places a confidence in the opinion of "the officer, and he is bound to act according "to his opinion, and when he honestly exer- "cises it, as he must do in the execution of his "duty, he cannot be punished for it." It is believed the above opinion does not change the principle laid down in the case of Bacon v. Otis, nor is it believed to be against the charge of the judge in the court below in the present cause.

It is not contended that an officer is bound to be right and correct in his opinions and suspicions; but is not an officer bound to examine? Is he not bound to inquire? Is he not bound to have rational ground for his opinions? Was not a collector, in the execution of the embargo laws, bound to use reasonable care in ascertaining the facts on which his own opinion and that of the President must depend? If in the discharge of so important a trust he does not use reasonable care in ascertaining facts, can he be said honestly to exercise his opinion? We think not.

The original action against the collector is for taking, carrying away and destroying the vessel and cargo, &c., of Watkins. If the collector should be able to justify himself under the 11th section of the embargo act of April 25th, in seizing and detaining, still he has no justification in removing her, with her cargo, from a safe and secure port to a distant one, running her on shore and destroying the cargo and unlading her. It is not believed that the President himself had, under that act, any authority to remove the vessel and cargo as it was removed, much less had the collector any such authority. But the President gave no or-351*] der for such removal, nor *did he approve or confirm such removal, for he was kept ignorant of it. The question then rests on the power of the collector, and is too plain to justify the detention of the court in attempting to elucidate it. An authority to detain is not an authority to remove or unload, especially if there be no necessity so to do for security and preservation. Congress thought proper in this section to vest collectors with power to detain vessels under certain circumstances, until the decision of the President could be had, but they gave them no power to remove or unload; and the court will not, by construction, give them power which Congress have withheld.

While acting fairly and with good faith within the limits of the power thus delegated to them, the collectors are to be protected, but when they transcend those limits they must be answerable for the consequences. The collector in the present case must of course be answerable for all the damages sustained by Watkins in consequence of the removal and unlading and destroying his vessel and cargo, by which he has been deprived of the earnings of many years devoted to industry and economy, and it is believed he has been so deprived wantonly and unjustly by the gross misconduct of Otis under color of authority vested in him as deputy-collector of customs. The charge and direction of the judge, therefore, to the jury in the court below, on the facts disclosed, was correct.

It is urged on the part of Otis, that admitting that Otis's statement to the President was incorrect, it was the duty of Watkins to have addressed the President on the subject, to correct any misstatement of facts, &c.; and because he neglected it he is accused of sullen silence.

1. It is probable the patient acquiescence (not sullen silence) of Watkins was owing to his ignorance of the provisions and details of the embargo laws.

2. If he had knowledge of the subject, ought he to presume that Otis would neglect to state all the facts to the President? And besides he had no opportunity. Otis wrote to the President on the 24th of December, and the President approved the detention on the 3d of January; ten days after. It is urged Otis lived in Barnstable, and it was *therefore prop- [352 er to remove the vessel to save expense; that he might have her under his own eye, &c. If it were necessary to rebut the statement, it is a fact that the town of Barnstable is twelve miles long, and Otis did not live or keep his office within four miles of the harbor.

It is also contended that the case of Crowell & Hawes v. M'Faddon does not support the point contended for in favor of Otis in the present case.

In the case of M'Faddon, the agent of M'Faddon consented to the landing and storing the cargo; but on the supposition that no such consent had been given, "the court in that case observe that the landing and storing the cargo, whether to preserve it from injury or secure it from rescue, was a necessary consequence of the detention. Has Otis, in the present case, produced any evidence to show that it was necessary to remove the vessel of Watkins to preserve or secure the property? In the case above mentioned of Crowell & Hawes v. M'Faddon, the vessel of M'Faddon was not removed from the harbor of Hyannis, where she was first detained; but was merely brought to a landing place or wharf about one-half mile from the place where first detained.

In the case now before the court, the vessel of Watkins was removed from Provincetown to Barnstable, a distance of more than thirty miles. The harbor of Provincetown is one of the safest in the world; that of Barnstable less secure. By the removal and running aground, the vessel and cargo of Watkins were principally lost. If necessary to unlade and store the cargo, it might have been better and easier done at Provincetown than at Barnstable.

It is confidently believed that this court will not, by construction, extend the authority of collectors under the embargo laws to distant removals. No removal will be permitted unless absolutely necessary to preserve or secure the property. Otis has not produced a tittle of evidence to show that any such necessity existed. On the other hand, it has been abundantly proved to have been unnecessary and ruinous.

*March 10th. Absent—TODD, J. [353

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an action of trespass, brought in the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, for taking, carrying away and destroying a certain schooner called the Friendship, with her cargo, belonging to the plaintiff below.

The declaration is in common form. The defendant pleaded that, as deputy-collector for the district of Barnstable, he detained and removed from the port and harbor of Provincetown, to the port and harbor of Barnstable, the said vessel and cargo, that they might be securely kept; the said schooner and cargo, at the time of such detention, lying in the said harbor of Provincetown, within the district aforesaid, ostensibly bound to some other port of the United States, with an intent, in the opinion of the defendant, to violate or evade the provisions of the embargo laws.

He further pleaded that he caused the said vessel to be detained so that the decision of the President of the United States might be had thereon, who, afterwards, upon his report and representation, did approve and confirm the said detention.

The plaintiff replies that the defendant committed the trespass of his own wrong, and without any such cause, &c. Issue being joined thereon.

On a bill of exceptions taken to the charge of the court, the following facts appear to have been given in evidence: That the schooner in question, in the month of December, 1808, was lying at Provincetown, wholly loaded with cod-fish. She had also a barrel of beef, a number of small stores and groceries, with three or four barrels of water, and a number of kegs of pickled lobsters. That an inspector of the customs, seeing the Friendship in this situation, and judging that the groceries were sufficient for the crew of such a vessel for thirty days, and having no doubt of her being bound to sea, gave information of such, his suspicions, to the collector, who gave a written order to [*354] one Ganett to detain *and to bring her into the port of Barnstable, and there secure her in the best manner possible. That Ganett proceeded to Provincetown with about thirty men, and removed the said vessel to Barnstable, about ten leagues, by water; but when attempting to come up to a wharf she accidentally ran onto a point of land which projected into the water, and there stuck fast. That she could not be got off during that tide, which soon left her; and the weather was very cold, and the harbor was frozen up for a long time, so that the schooner could not be removed. That the defendant gave notice, by letter, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, of the detention of said vessel, stating, at the same time, his reasons for believing that "she was evidently intended for a foreign port;" which detention was approved of and confirmed by the President. That, as soon as the weather would permit, which was in the month of March following, the defendant caused the said schooner to be brought to a wharf, and unloaded and secured the cargo. That about 60 or 70 quintals of fish were damaged, and the rest in good order. There was, also, evidence on the part of the plaintiff to prove that the Friendship was actually bound to Boston, and the extent of the injury which his property had sustained.

The court charged the jury that the several matters and things so given in evidence by the defendant "did not, in law, maintain the issue "aforesaid on his part; and also that it was the "duty of the collector, as collector, to have "used reasonable care in ascertaining the "facts on which to form an opinion, and to "transmit to the President a statement of those "facts for his decision." On an exception to the charge, the cause now comes before us, it having been removed into this court under the 25th section of the judiciary act; and whether it were correct or not is the question which is now to be decided.

This seizure was made under the 11th section of the act of the 25th of April, 1808 (vol. 9, p. 150), which provides "That the collectors of "the customs be and they are hereby respectively authorized to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of "the United States, whenever, in their opinions, the *intention is to violate or [*355] "evade any of the provisions of the acts laying "an embargo, until the decision of the Presi- "dent of the United States be had thereupon."

The issue tendered by the defendant, and on which the parties went to trial, was whether the vessel and cargo were detained, because, in the opinion of the defendant, she intended, although ostensibly bound to a port in the United States, to violate or evade the provisions of the embargo laws; and whether the vessel was removed to Barnstable that she might be securely kept until the decision of the President was known.

If there were any evidence to prove this issue, it should have been left to the jury to draw their own conclusions. If the defendant had taken upon himself to say that the vessel did intend to violate the embargo laws, and that such removal was absolutely necessary for her secure detention, such charge would have been less exceptionable; but that it was the opinion of the collector that such violation was in contemplation, and that such removal was for the purpose of securing the vessel, which were the facts in issue, might very well have been inferred by the jury from the evidence before them. Indeed, it would have been difficult for them to have come to a different conclusion; for the collector, from the information which he received, could scarcely fail to form the opinion he did; and there was no evidence whatever to induce them to believe that she could have been removed to Barnstable, considering the care which was taken of her during her removal and after her arrival there, for any other purpose but for that alleged in the plea. In this particular, then, it is the opinion of a majority of the court that the charge was erroneous.

The charge is deemed incorrect in another respect. The jury are told that it was the collector's duty to have used reasonable care in ascertaining the facts on which to form an opinion.

This instruction implies that the collector is liable if he form an incorrect opinion, or if, in the opinion of the jury, it shall have been made unadvisedly or without reasonable care and diligence. But the law exposes *his con- [*356] duct to no such scrutiny. If it did, no public officer would be hardy enough to act under it. If the jury believed that he honestly entertained the opinion under which he acted, although they might think it incorrect and formed hastily or without sufficient grounds, he would be entitled to their protection. Such was the opinion of this court in the case of Crowell & Hawes v. M'Fuddon, decided at the last term. This does not preclude proof on the part of the plaintiffs, showing malice or other circumstances which may impeach the integrity of the transaction. The jury, then, were misled when their attention was drawn from the fact whether the defendant really entertained such opinion, and were directed to inquire into the reasonable care with which it was formed, which left them at liberty to find a verdict against the defendant, however honestly and fairly he may have acted.

It is the opinion of the court that the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts must, for the reasons assigned, be reversed, and the cause be remanded for further proceedings.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered his separate opinion as follows:

As this court can notice no other error than such as may be founded on a misconstruction of the act of Congress under which the defendant justified the taking and carrying away charged in the declaration, the charge of the judge can be considered so far only as it respects that act.

The section to which the plea refers is in these words: "Be it enacted," &c.

In construing this law it has already been decided in this court that the collector is not liable for the detention of a vessel, "ostensibly "bound, with a cargo, to some other port of "the United States whenever, in his opinion, "the intention is to violate or evade any of the "provisions of the acts laying an embargo, un- "til the decision of the President of the United "States be had thereon." For the correctness of this opinion he is not responsible. If, in 357] truth, he has formed it, his duty *obliges him to act upon it; and when the law affords him no other guide than his own judgment, and declares that judgment to be conclusive in the case, it must constitute his protection, although it be erroneous. The legislature did not intend to expose the collector to the hazard of being obliged to show that he had probable cause for the opinion he had formed. If, in reality, he had formed it, the law justifies him for acting upon it. If it can be proved, either from the gross oppression of the case or from other proper testimony, that the collector did not in fact entertain the opinion under which he professed to act, some doubt may be entertained of his being justified by the law; but if the opinion avowed was real, though mistaken, a detention under that opinion is lawful.

But the act of Congress authorizes only a detention of the vessel, not its removal. The collector did remove the vessel from one harbor into another, a distance of about thirty miles by water, and in this removal the injury was sustained. As an independent act this proceeding is not justified by the law. It was the duty of the collector to detain the vessel; and all acts which were necessary, as means to the end, were lawful; but unless this removal was necessary for the purpose of detention, it is not protected by the law.

The charge of the judge will now be examined.

He instructed the jury "that the several mat- "ters and things so given in evidence by the "said William Otis did not in law maintain "the issue on his part."

If this instruction could be understood as conveying to the jury an opinion that Otis had not justified the detention of the vessel, the court would feel no hesitation in pronouncing it erroneous. But it was necessary for Otis to justify the removal as well as the detention and he could only justify the removal by showing that it was necessary to a secure detention. Had he offered any testimony whatever to this point, it might have been incumbent on the judge to submit that testimony to the jury. But he has offered no testimony whatever to it. This court, therefore, cannot say that the judge of the state court has erred in saying that the matters and things *given in evidence [358 by the said William Otis, did not in law support his plea. Certainly they did not make out a justification under the act of Congress.

The judge further instructed the jury "that "it was the duty of the collector, as collector, "to have used reasonable care in ascertaining "the facts on which to form an opinion, and "to transmit to the President a statement of "those facts for his decision."

The act authorizes the collector to detain a vessel on his own mere suspicion, "until the decision of the President of the United States be had thereupon."

On what is the decision of the President to be had? Clearly on the further detention of the vessel, and on the future proceedings of the collector respecting her. Whenever the President acts, he is expected to act upon information; and from whom, in this instance, is his information to be derived? Unquestionably from the collector. The law does not, indeed, say in terms that the collector "shall take reasonable care in ascertaining the facts," or that he shall afterwards communicate those facts correctly to the President; and if this be not a fair and necessary construction of the act, the judge has misconstrued the law, and his judgment ought to be reversed. But it seems to be an inference which must be drawn from the words of the law. It follows necessarily from the duties of forming an opinion and of communicating that opinion to the President for his decision in the case, that reasonable care ought to be used in collecting the facts to be stated to the President, and that the statement ought to be made.

I cannot say that the court of Massachusetts has erred in its construction of the act of Congress under which the defendant justifies the trespass alleged in the declaration.

*THE BRIG ALERTA AND CARGO, [*359

(BROSQUET, CLAIMANT,)

v.

BLAS MORAN, LIBELANT.

Absent—TODD, J.

The district courts of the United States (being neutral) have jurisdiction to restore to the original Spanish owner (in amity with the United States) his property captured by a French vessel whose force has been increased in the United States, if the prize be brought infra præsidia.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court for the District of New Orleans (which has the jurisdiction also of a circuit court).

The facts of the case were stated by WASHINGTON, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, as follows:

This is the case of a libel filed in the District Court of New Orleans, by Blas Moran, a subject of the King of Spain, and a native and resident of the island of Cuba, setting forth that he is the owuer of the brig Alerta and cargo, consisting of 170 slaves, which, on a voyage from the coast of Africa to the Havanna, was, some time in the month of Junc, 1810. when within a few leagues of Havanna, captured on the high seas by the L'Epine, bearing French colors; that a prize-master was put on board the Alerta, and 17 of the slaves taken out, after which the prize was ordered to steer for the Balize, and was finally bronght to the port of New Orleans, with the remainder of her cargo, consisting of 153 slaves. The libel alleges that the L'Epine was not duly commissioned to capture the property of Spanish subjects, or, if so commissioned, that she was armed and equipped for war in the port of New Orleans, and manned by sundry American citizens and inhabitants of the territory of New Orleans, contrary to the law of nations. The prayer of the libel is for restitution and damages.

The claim of the prize-master admits the capture of the Alerta as lawfnl prize of war; and asserts that the L'Epine, at the time of the capture, was and still is legally authorized to capture all vessels and their cargoes belonging to the snbjects of Spain, as enemies of France. He further states, that after the capture he was compelled to enter the port of New Orleans by 360] stress of weather, *want of provisions, and the inability of the Alerta to keep the sea, and prays to be dismissed.

The evidence in the canse establishes the following facts: That some time in April, 1810, this privateer, commanded by Captain Batigne, and bearing a commission from the French goverument to make prizes on the high seas, entered the port of New Orleans. The captain had with him a letter of instructious from his owner, directing him to deposit what money he might take as prize in the Bank of New Orleans; to put into one of the ports as being in distress, and, in case he should hear of the capture of Guadaloupe, he was to renew his crew for the purpose of conveying his prizes to France. Some time in the course of the snceeding month Batigne presented two petitions to the collector of the port of New Orleans, stating that the L'Epine had been compelled by stress of weather to put into that port, and that he had necessarily incnrred expenses for refitting and victualing the privateer, and for defending himself against a criminal prosecntion for piracy to an amount exceeding $5,000, and praying for permission to enter and sell snch part of his cargo as would enable him to discharge that sum. He also applied to the collector, about the same time, for permission to purchase provisions for his crew, amonnting to thirty persons, on his iutended voyage to France, and intimated that he should take with him about ten passeugers, if permitted to do so; bnt this permission being refused, he professed to relinquish his inteutiou of taking passengers on board.

Having obtained permission to pnrchase provisions, and to dispose of a part of his cargo, it appears that he paid off his crew, and sailed from New Orleans soon afterwards with a crew of from fifty to sixty men composed partly of persons obtained at New Orleans, and partly of those who had entered that port with him. With this force on board he went to sea, and soon afterwards fell in with the Alerta, bound from Africa to the Havanna, which, together with her cargo consisting of 170 slaves, he captured as prize of war, put a prize-master on board, and ordered her to steer towards the Balize. On her passage the Alerta suffered very considerably in a gale; and her crew, together with the slaves on board, were much distressed for want of provisions, when she was, *at the [361 request of Captain Batigne, visited and relieved by Captain Allen, and condncted safely to New Orleans, where he libeled the vessel and cargo for salvage.

The court below, upon the libel of the Spanish owner, decreed restitution to the libelant of the ship and the 154 slaves left on board of her by the privateer, subject to all expenses for the support of the negroes, and such salvage as shonld be decreed by the court, together with costs of snit, and snch damages as the court shonld thereafter decree.

J. Woodward, for the appellant, contended for the following points:

1. That the authority to capture is complete and the capture in all respects legal and operative.

2. That it does not appear that the equipment of the L'Epine was in violation of any law of the United States, or in such manner as to affect the prize in question.

3. That there is error in the decree of the conrt below in decreeing restoration to the libelant, Blas Moran.

4. That should it be the opiniou of this conrt that the Alerta and cargo are not prize of war, the restoration should be subject to a salvage to the captors;

And submitted the case to the conrt, npon the following written argument:

In this case the appellant will not controvert the jnrisdiction of the court to inquire as to the commission or authority under which the privateer acted, but will content himself with showing that for all the purposes of this case the commission is regular.

There are no appearances which justify a presumption of fraud on the face of the commission. The court will inspect it.

The District Court agrees that if the case stood on this point aloue it would be left to the foreign tribunal. The official signatures are proven. The commission being *thus [362 established, this conrt will not go iuto a question of regularity which may or may not be material according to the local usage in the French ports as to issuing or using those commissions.

It appears by the captain's petition to the collector, which is sworn to, that he, the captain of the L'Epine, was tried at New Orleans on this trausaction as a pirate, aud I think the presumption must be that he was acqnitted. The validity of his commissiou must have been passed upon, on this trial, for if he acted without commission he was a pirate. He cannot be looked npon as a pirate, because he has acted openly nnder the authority of at least a regularly-executed commission, and in full communion with the consul of his own nation at New Orleans. If not a pirate he was a legal captor as far as respects the commission. But it is said that the equipment of the L'Epine, by force of which she made the capture in question, was contrary to the laws of the United States, and that therefore our courts have a right to restore the prize. The inference of law may be true, but the fact is not established. Indeed, it might not be indecorous to suppose, from a comparison of the testimony with the result in the court below, that by possibility, clamor or prejudice, which too often insensibly intervene in such cases, had not been without their effect. The acting consul at New Orleans swears that the additional number of men went on board as passengers, that no money was paid to them, and that if they were to have formed an augmentation of the crew, he must have cooperated. The circumstances corroborate this fact; they were foreigners; they were emigrants. It does not appear in any instance that a person was taken on board as an addition to the crew. There might have been a difference between the number reported and the number on board, but it is also true that there were some secreted on board unknown to the captain until he got to sea. This is not an unusual case with respect to such vessels. But the testimony shows the conduct of the captain to have been honorable on this point. If after leaving the jurisdiction on the United States any of those Frenchmen had entered into the service as foreigners, this is a crime personal to themselves and which cannot affect the privateer or her prize, unless by the captain's original procurement, he knowing them to be American 363] citizens. Would the evidence, *which the court will of course read, be sufficient to establish the penalties under the act of Congress? If not, it will not be sufficient to establish the forfeiture of vessel and cargo as against the captors, whose possession I consider firm under the capture. The whole conduct of the captain has been in open day and under the express view of the collector. It must be presumed fair.

But it is said that the last entrance into the port of New Orleans was not in good faith. It is said that by the letter of instructions, &c., the L'Epine had an original intent to go into New Orleans to deposit cash in the banks there. This intent was contingent and remote, and it does not appear that the contingency of getting cash had happened. But this original intent is immaterial, provided the distress were the true and immediate cause. I need not refer the court to authorities under the navigation laws of England to decide this point, but if desired they can be produced. This intent might have been effected without the violation of our laws, as the money might have been sent in without the vessel. But this charge of original intent is contradicted by the fact, as the L'Epine passed frequently with a fair wind when she might have entered, and did not, but kept at broad capturing distance, 80 miles from the Balize, although there were no enemy ships to prevent her entering the port.

If the court should be of opinion, contrary to the crude reasoning now submitted, that the Alerta and cargo ought of right to be restored, then it appears to me that the captors are entitled to salvage, and not Mr. Allen, the pilot, as a condition precedent to the restoration. The deposition of Allen himself will show that when he, for the first time, boarded the Alerta, she was within a day of Barrataria, had weathered the storm of the 26th, was riding in a calm sea at anchor, 12 feet water, and the crew amusing themselves in catching sea birds, and supplying themselves by salting them, of which they had several barrels. She had plenty of provisions at that time to carry her to Barrataria, and Allen states that she could have gotten there, but had a storm happened he should not have liked to have risked himself in her. But as to the L'Epine she overtook the Alerta in actual distress after she had been recently cast on shore and greatly injured, with but half a barrel of bread, half a barrel of pork, *for 150 [364 slaves and 12 other persons, and indeed the L'Epine was visited by Mr. Martinez from the Alerta on account of this distress. The testimony shows that she could not have reached a harbor but for the aid from the L'Epine. Then unless the act of bringing in the Alerta were piratical, the L'Epine acted as humanely and as beneficially to the owners in bringing in the Alerta as in any other case of salvage.

There was no argument on the part of the appellee.

March 10. Absent—TODD, J.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The only question for the consideration of this court is, whether the court below had jurisdiction of this cause for the purpose of restoring the property of the libelant? The jurisdiction is asserted upon two grounds.

1. That the force of the privateer, by means whereof this capture was made, had been increased at New Orleans, contrary to the laws and in violation of the neutrality of the United States.

2. That the commission of this privateer had expired before the capture was made.

As this court is satisfied with the sentence of the court below upon the first ground of jurisdiction, the opinion will be confined to that point. The general rule is undeniable, that the trial of captures made on the high seas, jure belli, by a duly commissioned vessel of war, whether from an enemy or a neutral, belongs exclusively to the courts of that nation to which the captor belongs. To this rule there are exceptions which are as firmly established as the rule itself. If the capture be made within the territorial limits of a neutral country into which the prize is brought, or by a privateer which had been illegally equipped in such neutral country, the prize courts of such neutral country not only possess the power, but it is their duty to restore the property so illegally captured to the owner. This is necessary to the vindication of their own neutrality.

A neutral nation may, if so disposed, [365 without a breach of her neutral character, grant permission to both belligerents to equip their vessels of war within her territory. But without such permission the subjects of such belligerent powers have no right to equip vessels of war, or to increase or augment their force, either with arms or with men, within the territory of such neutral nation. Such unauthorized acts violate her sovereignty and her rights as a neutral. All captures made by means of such equipments are illegal in relation to such nation, and it is competent to her courts to punish the offenders, and, in case the prizes taken by her are brought infra præsidia, to order them to be restored.

These principles are believed to be fully warranted by the general law of nations, by the decisions of the courts of this country, and by the laws of the United States. By the act of June, 1794, the enlisting, within the territory of the United States, persons to serve as soldiers and marines on board of any vessel of war or privateer in the service of any foreign state, with the exception of the subjects of such foreign state transiently within the United States; the fitting out and arming any vessel in the service of a foreign prince or state at war with any other nation which is at peace with the United States; and the increasing or augmenting the force of any armed vessel of war in such foreign service, by adding to the number of her guns, and the like, are declared to be offenses against the United States, and are punishable by fine and imprisonment; and the 7th section of the law provides for the detention of all such vessels as have been so fitted out, or as have so increased or augmented their force, together with such prizes as they may have made, in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties prescribed by that act, and to the restoring of such prizes in cases where restoration shall have been adjudged.

Thus, if there were any doubt as to the rule of the law of nations upon this subject, the illegality of equipping a foreign vessel of war within the territory of the United States, is declared by the above law; and the power and duty of the proper courts of the United States, to restore the prizes made in violation of that law, is clearly recognized.

366* *But it is insisted for the claimant in this case, that the persons taken on board at New Orleans by the captain of the privateer, formed no part of the crew at the time the privateer left that port, but that they were received merely as passengers; that they were emigrants from other nations, and not citizens of the United States; and that their subsequent change of character from passengers to crew, cannot attach any crime to the captain of the privateer under the laws of the United States, or affect his right to the prizes which he might afterwards make on the high seas.

This argument is unsupported by the facts proved in the cause. It appears that Capt. Batigne proposed, in the first instance to the collector of the port of New Orleans, to take on board ten passengers for France, provided he should be permitted to do so, and that he afterwards stated to the collector that as there was some difficulty in obtaining such permission he should decline taking them. But what places this subject beyond all doubt is, that it appears from some of the ship's papers of the privateer that advances were made to these alleged passengers with a deduction of 3 per cent. for the marine invalids agreeably to the ordinances of France, and the role d' equipage contains the number of prize shares opposite to their names. These facts, being unexplained by any testimony in the cause, which deserves to be respected, leave no doubt that the persons taken on board at New Orleans were engaged originally as an addition to the crew of the privateer. Some of the persons so enlisted are proved to be native citizens; others were residents domiciled in New Orleans, some with and others without families; and others again were slaves belonging to the citizens of that place, who appear to have been seduced from the service of their masters. It is quite immaterial whether the persons so enlisted were native American citizens or foreigners domiciled within the United States; since neither the law of nations nor the act of Congress recognizes any distinction except in respect to subjects of the state in whose service they are so enlisted, transiently within the United States; and it may well be doubted whether this exception in the act of Congress was not virtually repealed by the non-intercourse law. But it appears that some of these persons *were [367 emigrants from Cuba, and were, at that time, residing and domiciled in New Orleans.

It is next contended on behalf of the claimant, that, in case the court should affirm the decree directing restitution, it ought to be done upon the condition of the libelant paying salvage, not to the captain of the gun-boat who furnished the Alerta with provisions and conducted her to New Orleans, but to the privateer.

This claim is entirely inadmissible. Salvage is allowed as a reward for the meritorious conduct of the salvor, and in consideration of a benefit conferred on the person whose property he has saved. What are the pretensions of Captain Batigne to the reward he claims? He fits out his vessel at New Orleans in contravention of the law of nations and of the United States; and finding on the high seas a vessel and cargo, belonging to the subjects of a nation at peace with the United States, within a short distance of the Havanna, her port of destination, he employs the force thus illegally taken on board to make prize of both vessel and cargo, and taking her out of her course, he conducts her towards the Balize, near to which she is found by Captain Allen in distress in consequence of a severe gale, to which she had been exposed, and of the want of provisions. Her wants being relieved by that officer, he conducted her in safety to New Orleans. Nothing could be more remote from the intentions of the captain of the privateer than to render a service to this ship and her cargo. So far from it, he committed an unwarrantable spoliation of the cargo by selling fourteen of the slaves, part thereof, to an American whom he met at sea; and he most certainly intended to have smuggled the residue of the slaves into Grand Terre or some other part of the coast, and there to have disposed of them. It would ill become any court of justice, and much less an American court, to bestow a reward on a person who had thus violated the laws of the United States in one instance, and meditated a violation of them in another; and it would be still worse to give such reward at the expense of the injured Spaniard.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of this court that the sentence appealed from ought to be affirmed with costs.

368*] *THE GROTIUS, SHEAFE, MASTER.

Absent—TODD, J.

In order to constitute a capture, some act should be done indicative of an intention to seize and to retain as prize; it is sufficient if such intention is fairly to be inferred from the conduct of the captor.

THIS case was continued from last term, for further proof (see ante, vol. 8, p. 456), and was now submitted, upon the further proof produced, without argument.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This case comes before the court upon an order for further proof, made at the last session, in relation to the validity of the alleged capture of this vessel. The master, the mate and two of the seamen of the Grotius, in answer to some of the standing interrogatories, swore that they did not consider the ship to have been seized as prize, and that the young man who was put on board by Odiorne, the captain of the privateer, was received and considered as a passenger during the residue of the voyage. The deposition of Very, the alleged prize-master, was taken and read in the court below, in which he swore that he was present at the capture; that Sheafe, the master of the Grotius, was ordered to go on board the privateer with his papers, and that he, Very, was directed by Captain Odiorne, in the presence of Sheafe, to go with the prize, as prize-master, and to permit the captain of the Grotius to keep possession of the ship's papers and to navigate her into port. That he accordingly went on board as prize-master, taking with him a copy of the privateer's commission and also written instructions from Captain Odiorne for his own conduct.

The deposition of Very, though irregularly taken in that stage of the cause, was nevertheless calculated to weaken the preparatory evidence in relation to this contested fact, and to point out the propriety of a further investigation. The evidence of this witness lost much of its weight from the circumstance that his letter of instructions was not annexed to his deposition, or made an exhibit in the cause. It was proper that this omission should be supplied by the captors, if it could be done, and that they should have an opportunity to fortify the 369] *evidence of Very, if in their power to do so. For these reasons the order for further proof was extended as well to the captors as to the claimants. Under this order the captors have exhibited an attested copy of the written instructions to Very, bearing date the 29th of July, 1813. They inform him that he is put on board the Grotius and direct him to proceed in the ship, and, on his arrival, to report himself to the agent of the privateer, who would take such measures as he might deem necessary; that he is not to take charge of the vessel, but is to allow the captain to take her into any port in the United States he might see fit. The authenticity of this paper is ascertained by the affidavit of the prize agent of the privateer, in which he swears that the original was delivered to him by Very, on his arrival, as containing his orders, and that it has remained ever since in his possession. The deposition of Very has not been taken under the order for further proof, but the omission is accounted for by the prize-agent, who, in his affidavit, swears that Very was captured on a subsequent voyage, and had not since returned to the United States. Under these circumstances the court feels no difficulty in receiving his deposition originally taken in the court below. In addition to the letter of instructions to Very, the collector of the port of Portsmouth has furnished an extract from the journal of the privateer, kept on that cruise, which states "that on the 30th of "July, 1813, the Grotius was boarded, and "after an examination of her papers, a prize-"master was put on board of her, and she was "ordered to the first port in the United States."

This documentary evidence is further supported by the deposition of Mr. Wardwell, the surgeon of the privateer, who swears that Captain Odiorne informed the master of the Grotius, after he had come on board, that he should make out a copy of his commission and should put a prize-master on board, to whom he should give orders to suffer Captain Sheafe to conduct his ship into any port of the United States he should think fit; that he would be further instructed to report to the custom-house on his arrival, and to inform the agent of the privateer of his arrival. That a prize-master, named Very, was accordingly placed on board, with instructions and a copy of the commission. This witness being examined *as touching his interest in this cause, [370 swears that he has none, having for a valuable consideration assigned all his interest in the prize to the owners of the privateer. The only evidence given by the claimants under the order for further proof is the deposition of John De Forest and the affidavit of Captain Sheafe, which corresponds with his answers to the standing interrogatories; and in addition thereto he contradicts the material parts of Wardwell's testimony. De Forest was a passenger on board of the Grotius, and he swears that Very exercised no authority whatsoever on board that ship, but was considered and treated as a passenger.

Upon this evidence and the answers to the standing interrogatories, the cause is now to be decided; and the only question is whether the Grotius was in fact seized as prize of war. When the facts are ascertained there can be very little doubt what constitutes in law a valid seizure as prize. It is clear that some act should be done indicative of an intention to seize and to retain as prize; and it is always sufficient if such intention is fairly to be inferred from the conduct of the captor. Now, in this case, the evidence of Very and of Wardwell, proving that Captain Sheafe was distinctly informed that his ship would be sent in as prize, is corroborated by the written instructions to the former, which he delivered, on his arrival, to the prize agent, and by the journal of the privateer, both of which documents correspond with the evidence of those witnesses. The former of these documents, written at the time when Very was appointed the prize-master as he states, imports a clear declaration of the intention of Captain Odiorne, and having been deposited with the prize agent immediately on the arrival of the Grotius, it cannot be presumed to have been fabricated to serve the purpose for which it is now used.

Although the instructions do not call Very prize-master by name, yet they contain other equivalent expressions; for if he was put on board merely as a passenger, what had he to do with reporting the vessel, on her arrival, to the collector, and particularly to the prize agent? 371] *The evidence, then, on the part of the captor would be quite sufficient to establish the fact of a valid capture if it stood uncontradicted. The only positive evidence against it is the deposition of Sheafe, which is in direct opposition to that of Wardwell and Very. He swears that Odiorne represented himself in the first instance as the commander of a British privateer, and as such threatened to put a prize-master on board and send him into Halifax. That he afterwards avowed his real character, after which he never spoke of putting a prize-master on board, but merely requested him to receive Very as a passenger. He says that the first conversation when Odiorne spoke of putting a prize-master on board took place in the cabin when Wardwell was present; that the latter conversation was on deck when he was not present.

Wardwell is equally positive. He swears that after Captain Odiorne had disclosed his real character, he told Sheafe that he should put a prize-master on board, and send him into any port in the United States he might choose, adding that he might as well be prize to the privateer as be seized by the government of the United States on his arrival; to which captain Sheafe assented. He further swears that Captain Odiorne informed the captain of the Grotius, that he should direct the prize-master to report himself to the custom-house, and to the prize-agent. In point of credit these witnesses appear to be equal, neither of them having any personal interest in the dispute. But Wardwell is fully supported by Very, and their united testimony receives considerable aid from the instructions, and from the journal of the privateer. They are also supported in some degree by the answer of Chambers, one of the crew of the Grotius, to one of the standing interrogatories, in which he states that Very, the day after his coming on board of that ship, declared that he was put on board as prize-master.

The evidence of the mate, of De Forest, and of Prince, is entitled to very little weight, because the two former did not go on board of the privateer, and the latter, although he did accompany Captain Sheafe to the privateer, does not pretend that he heard any conversation between him and Captain Odiorne; and being a common seaman it is unlikely that he should have been admitted into their company. 372] The evidence of these persons as *to the unassuming conduct of Very whilst on board the Grotius, from which they inferred that he was there merely as a passenger, is entirely consistent with the arrangement proved to have been made on board of the privateer that he was not to interfere in the navigation of the vessel.

Upon the whole it is the opinion of a majority of the court that the validity of the capture of the Grotius as prize of war is sufficiently established by the evidence, and the captain having acquiesced in the subsequent arrangement as to the mode of sending in the vessel, she ought to have been condemned to the use of the captors.

The decree of the Circuit Court condemning the ship Grotius, &c., to the United States, is reversed; and the court, proceeding to give such decree as the said Circuit Court ought to have given, it is further decreed and ordered that the said ship be condemned as lawful prize to the captors.

GETTINGS v. BURCH'S ADMINISTRATRIX.

Absent—TODD, J.

It is an error in the Orphan's Court for the county of Washington in the District of Columbia, to decide a cause against the answer of a defendant, if the answer had not been denied by a replication; and if there be no evidence in the record contradicting that answer.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, affirming that of the Orphan's Court for the county of Washington.

On the 13th of February, 1813, the appellee, Jane Burch, filed in the Orphan's Court a petition or libel setting forth that by an order of that court on the 11th of June, 1805, the property of the deceased in her hands was delivered to the appellant, who had become one of her sureties in the administration bond in the year 1803, and who obtained an order of that court to sell the same. That he had made no return of sales, nor rendered any account of his proceedings, but still has the property in his possession, consisting of a negro woman and her four children; and praying that the property may be redelivered to her, she having been appointed guardian of the infant children of the deceased, and being *ready to give good [373 security to indemnify the appellant against his responsibility on her administration bond, and to pay him any moneys he may have paid on her account as administratrix.

A citation having been issued, the appellant appeared and filed his answer, in which he says that in pursuance of the order of the court he duly sold the property, and is ready to account for the proceeds.

It does not appear by the record that any formal replication in writing was filed to this answer; and that circumstance seems to have passed unnoticed in the courts below, and the cause was tried without any objection having been made on that ground.

Upon the trial of the cause in the Orphan's Court the judge ordered and decreed that the appellant should deliver up the property to the appellee, upon her paying him certain sums of money which he had paid for her as administratrix. The record does not show what evidence was before the Orphan's Court respecting the sale of the property by Gettings.

Upon the appeal to the Circuit Court, the sentence of the Orphan's Court was affirmed.

The case was argued by Jones for the appellant, and by F. S. Key for the appellee, in the absence of the reporter.

February 23d. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., ordered the following decree to be enrolled:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the proceedings of the Orphan's Court for the county of Washington, and of the Circuit Court for the said county, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof it is the opinion of this court that the decree of the Orphan's Court for the county of Washington, ordering the said Kenzy Gettings to deliver to the said Jane Burch, as administratrix of Jesse Burch, deceased, the slaves in 374] the said decree mentioned, *when the petitioner had not by replication denied the answer of the defendant, in which he states a sale of the said slaves in pursuance of an order of the said Orphan's Court, and without receiving any evidence that the said slaves were not sold, or that they remain still in possession of the said defendant is erroneous; and that the decree of the Circuit Court, affirming the same, is also erroneous; and that the said decree of affirmance ought to be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the said Circuit Court with directions to reverse the said decree of the said Orphan's Court, and to remand the cause of the said court, that further proceedings may be had therein according to law. All which is ordered and decreed accordingly.

v.
BRYAN & WOODCOCK,
(Garnishees of Hendrickson.)

Absent—TODD, J.

The 5th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1797, giving a priority of payment to the United States out of the effects of their debtors, did not apply to a debt due before the passing of that act, although the balance was not adjusted at the treasury until after the act was passed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Delaware.

This was an attachment of the effects of Hendrickson, a bankrupt, in the hands of his assignees, Bryan & Woodcock.

Hendrickson was surety for George Bush, late collector of the customs at Wilmington, in an official bond dated in 1791. Bush died on the 2d of February, 1797. By an adjustment of his accounts at the treasury in 1801, it appeared that the balance against him was $3,453.06.

In the court below it was agreed that the case should depend on the question, "Whether, un- "der the 5th section of the act of Congress of "March the 3d, 1797, the United States are "entitled to satisfaction of their demand 375] *"out of the effects of the bankrupt "Hendrickson in the hands of the garnishees, "as assignees of the bankrupt, prior to the "claims, or any part of them, of other credit- "ors of the said bankrupt being satisfied?"

The judgment in the court below was against the United States, and they brought their writ of error.

Wells, for the defendants in error.

In respect to the priority supposed to be established by this act, if it be considered as applying to this case, it will be a priority set up, if not by an "ex post facto law," by a retrospective law.

Two questions here present themselves for consideration:

1. Was Congress competent to enact such a retrospective law?

2. Has such a law been enacted? Is the act of the 3d of March, 1797, retrospective?

First inquiry. Was Congress competent to enact such a retrospective law?

It has never yet been contended that these priorities rest, for support, upon any ancient and royal ground of prerogative. Our constitution is a government of definite, delegated authority; and the powers not given belong to the people, not only by clear and unavoidable inference, but by positive and express reservation. No attempt has yet been made in any of the courts of the United States to set up this claim, upon the ground of prerogative. Congress have considered it as not resting upon that ground; or they would have deemed it unnecessary to make statutory provisions upon the subject. It has been decided that they have the power to establish a fair priority in behalf of the government. They have the power to impose and collect taxes; and it is certainly their duty to provide for their faithful collection and payment into the public treasury. A fair priority has been considered, if not absolutely "necessary," at least "conducive" to this end; and the power *to establish it conse- [376 quently given expressly by the clause in the constitution emphatically termed the "sweeping clause."

Had the constitution omitted this clause, still it would seem, for the fair and legitimate execution of the powers expressly delegated, that there would be, from necessity, conferred the right to exercise any means for that purpose that were "proper and necessary." To give body and substance to this abstract right; to bring this latent power into light, and to demonstrate its existence, as well as its proper form and proportion; to show it, in the constitution, to the eye, what it is in perfect reason, it is declared that Congress shall have power "to make all laws," not that they, in their good pleasure, with a discretion that acknowledges neither guide nor restraint, not to make any and every sort of law they may choose, in furtherance of any special power, but only those "which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers vested, by this constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

An act which cannot be traced up to any original, nor yet to this secondary power, in the constitution, proceeds not from it and, of course, partakes not of the character of law. An act declaring itself to have proceeded from the secondary power, which shall be manifestly improper and unnecessary, or either, cannot have emanated from that power; and is both a stranger and an enemy to the constitution.

The limitation upon the secondary power was, originally, of a more striking and imposing character than it now appears, since the adoption of the amendments to the constitution. Most, if not all, of the high and important privileges, fenced about by those amendments, owed their security and protection, previous to the adoption of these amendments, to these two talismanic words, if I may use the term. Without some restraint imposed upon this secondary power, most probably the means to effect a lawful purpose would have been what Congress pleased to make them. An unlimited power over the means of accomplishing a proper end would have been as terribly pernicious in poli- 377] ties as in morals. *It would have been not even a new mode of despotism. Nothing in the constitution could have stayed its monstrous course. It might and probably would have crushed beneath it, in its destructive progress, every atom of civil and religious liberty.

And further, it cannot escape our observation that the people, in their provident care of themselves, have established certain criterions, by which the propriety and necessity of measures shall be tested. I refer to the preamble of the constitution, where the moving causes—the great motives of establishing this government—are set out, and placed, as it were, for guards and sentinels at its very threshold.

As there was, originally, no express provision in the constitution destined to protect the privileges which are now so sedulously guarded by the amendments, so is there still none to be found to forbid the enactment, by Congress, of laws impairing the obligation of contracts, or those that are retrospective. To pass the former would not be "proper," because it would be to travel a path of error, which the people have positively forbidden their own state governments to use. It would not be "proper," because it would overturn instead of "establish justice;" it would be to frustrate in place of promoting one of the first great objects of the people in forming this government.

As to retrospective laws we learn, in our reports, from an authority which has always been, and I trust will long continue to be, respected in this court and in this country, that an earnest but unsuccessful attempt was made in the convention to prohibit, expressly, to Congress the exercise of the power to pass retrospective laws, as well as ex post facto laws. We are not, however, to conclude, from the failure of the attempt to expressly inhibit the exercise of this power, that it was delegated to Congress by letter or implication. The convention evidently departed with reluctance from the great and noble theory of government which they kept so steadily before them. The whole stock of power they knew was in the hands of the people—it all belonged to them. Their business was not to specify what they kept for themselves, 378] but to particularize what *they surrender in trust, for their benefit, to the government. It is true they sometimes departed from this rule; as they did when they prohibited the enactment, by Congress of ex post facto laws. They stepped out of the course which, with such wisdom, they prescribed to themselves, not so much to guard against the exercise of a power which they then expressly (as they would without it, have almost as clearly) withheld, as to obviate, upon a point of the highest interest and feeling, the misconceptions of ignorance, and to quiet the apprehensions and suspicions of fear and jealousy. The power to pass retrospective laws, then, is neither expressly given nor expressly withheld. When such acts are, therefore, passed by Congress, they must derive their authority from being "proper and necessary" means to the exercise of some other power expressly given. Some such laws, in given cases, it is not denied, may be comprised by this definition, and be fairly regarded as entirely constitutional. It is, notwithstanding, contended that these must always be considered as cases of exception, proving the general rule, that retrospective acts are not "necessary and proper" means to give due effect to the powers vested "in the government, or in any department or officer thereof." If Congress, thus clothed with every power that ought to be desired, with abundant means for a wise and provident government, should fall into the mistakes of short-sighted man, they must, like him, pay the forfeit of error and the price of experience. It cannot be "necessary and proper," nor will it "establish justice," to transfer to others the consequences of their own improvidence. Such the defendants in this case contend would virtually be the effect of retrospective liens and priorities in favor of the government and at the expense of the citizen. The exercise of such a power would overturn all the rules by which men are governed in calculating the chances of safety, and in estimating the risks of danger, when they give credit to each other. To set up such liens and priorities would not be "proper," because it would impair the obligation of contracts between citizen and citizen, by rendering unavailing the means of ensuring their execution. It would not be "proper," because it would be lessening the security for private "property," if not taking it away by undue "process" of law. It is true that the creditor who does not obtain security for the *pay- [379 ment of his debt cannot escape the lawful consequence of a subsequent act of his debtor. His dependance for safety, in this respect, is placed upon his knowledge of the character of his debtor, and upon his own vigilance. But, most assuredly, he ought to have full reason to rely that the character of any concern in which his debtor has been already engaged, will not be changed by matter of subsequent enactment, so as to enhance his risk of danger beyond what it was when the debt was contracted. Such a mode of legislation, I repeat, would violate and not "establish justice;" by enfeebling confidence between man and man, it would retard instead of "promoting the general welfare;" it would "impair the obligation of contracts;" it would be virtually taking away private "property" without "due process of law." An act, then, producing any of these effects could not have been "necessary and proper;" and is not warranted by the constitution; and, of course, the plaintiffs in this case are not "entitled" (to use the expression in the stated case) to the satisfaction they claim under it.

2. The defendants are next to inquire whether such a law has been passed; whether the 5th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1797, is retrospective?

If there be any doubt whether it was the intention of Cougress to give to this act a retrospective effect, evcry objection which cau be fairly urged against its constitutionality will incline the court to such a construction as will rescue it from that imputation. The defendants iusist that it was uot intended to have this effect.

Until this law was passed there was no other in force securing to the United States priority of payment, except iu cases of custom-house bonds for duties.

The first act giving this priority was passed on the 31st of July, 1789 (1 vol., p. 47), and is confined to the case of custom-house bonds. The 21st section of that act provides that, "In all cases "of insolveucy, or where any estate in the "hands of executors or administrators shall be "insufficient to pay all the debts due from the "deceased, the debt due to the United States "on auy such bond (i. e. for the payment of "duties) shall be first satisfied."

380*] *The next law, giving priority to the United States, is that of the 4th of August, 1790 (1 vol., p. 221). The 45th section is in these words: "That where any bond for the "payment of duties shall not be satisfied on "the day it became due, the collector shall "forthwith cause a prosecution to be com-"menced for the recovery of the money thereon, "by action or suit at law, in the proper court "having cognizance thereof; and in all cases of "insolvency, or where any estate in the hands "of executors or administrators shall be insuf-"ficient to pay all the debts due from the de-"ceased, the debt due to the United States, on "any such bond" (i.e. for the payment of duties, "shall be first satisfied."

Nor does the act of the 2d of May, 1792 (2 vol., p. 78), create this priority. The 18th section refers to bonds given "for duties on goods, wares and merchandise imported." It transfers the priority of the United States to the surety, or his representatives, upon payment of the debt on such bond. The extension, by this section, of the cases of iusolvency mentioned in the 45th section of the act of 4th August, 1790, applies only to the subject-matter of that section, which were bonds for duties. The same was the subject-matter of this section.

If, upon any other bonds than custom-house bonds, a priority had been secured to the United States, why was not a transfer of that priority provided for in behalf of the surety, or his representatives, who paid the bond, as well as in the case of bonds for duties?

After the law of 3d of March, 1797, establishing a general priority in cases of subsequently contracted debts, the provisions on this head in subsequent acts assume a corresponding character. Thus in the act of the 2d of March, 1799 (§ 65, 4 vol., p. 316), the provisions are co-extensive with the then established priority. The first member of this sectiou continues the priority in respect to bonds for duties. It re-enacts in the same words the 45th section of the act of 1790 (1 vol., p. 221), giving that priority. The next member of this section is general, and declares the liability of the representatives of a debtor if they pay auy debt in preference "to the debt or debts due to 381] the United States." *Here are uo words like those used in the acts of 1789 and 1790, above referred to, to limit and restrain the meaning to any particular "bond" or debts. Their liability commences upon the payment of auy debt in preference "to the debt or debts due to the United States." The first proviso of this section respects bail. The second proviso makes a general regulation in behalf of sureties, or their represeutatives, who pay the debt due to the United States upon auy bond "for duties on goods, wares or merchandise imported, or other penalty;" and the cases of insolvency, in this act mentioned, are declared to extend to the cases of assignmeut, attachment and bankruptcy.

That there was not given to the United States the priority, except in cases of custom-house bonds, until the act of 1797 was passed, was conceded by their counsel in the case of Fisher & Blight (2 Cranch, 362).

The 5th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1797, referred to by the agreemeut of the parties in this suit, as before mentioned, is in the following words: "That where any "revenue officer, or other person hereafter be-"coming indebted to the United States by bond "or otherwise, shall become insolvent; or "where the estate of any deceased debtor, in "the hands of executors or administrators, "shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due "from the deceased, the debt due to the United "States shall be first satisfied; aud the priority "hereby established shall be deemed to extend "as well to cases in which a debtor, not "having sufficient property to pay all his "debts, shall make a voluntary assignment "thereof, or iu which the estate and effects of "au absconding, concealed, or absent debtor "shall be attached by process of law, as to "cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy "shall be committed."

The defendants insist that there is error in the punctuation of this sectiou; and that it ought to be read with a comma at the end of the second line (of the printed section) between the words "person" and "hereafter." It would theu read: "That when any revenue officer, or other person, hereafter becoming indebted," &c. The section thus pointed will establish for the United States a priority in case of subsequently created debts, where, 1. The debtor is insolvent. 2. Where he makes *a voluntary assignment of his effects, [382 not haviug sufficieut to pay all his debts. 3. Where au attachment shall issue against the effects of an absent, absconding, or concealed debtor. 4. Whcre the debtor shall comuit an act of legal bankruptcy. 5. Where his effects, in the hands of executors or administrators, shall not be sufficient for the payment of all his debts. Without this latter provision, it has always been apprehended that the declared priority in cases of insolvency would not bind executors and administrators; and it has uniformly been introduced to create in that case, not a greater, but only an equal priority. There can be no reason for supposing (notwithstauding the general words of this member of the section, respecting executors and administrators) that it was intended to extend the priority in this case to debts previously, as well as subsequently created. The subject-matter of the section, with the punctuation we contend for, must be considered a provision for debts subsequently contracted. To understand its subject-matter, other than is here insisted upon, is to suppose the establishment of different prioritics, without any reasonable motive or inducement for discrimination. In such case the general (retrospective, as well as prospective) priority would apply to the case of a revenue officer, to the case of a deceased debtor, and to the cases of voluntary assignment, attachment and bankruptcy. The limited (or prospective) priority would extend only to cases of persons (other than revenue officers) becoming insolvent. Why this distinction between the insolvent and the other debtors? And, in this view of the subject, what meaning is to be attached to these words, "and the priority hereby established, shall be deemed to extend," &c.? According to the construction, which we oppose, the priority established by the previous part of the section was general as it respects revenue officers, and executors and administrators; and limited as it respects other persons. If it had been the intention of the legislature to establish different priorities, they would have negatived, by their expressions, the individuality of the priority; most probably they would have said, in place of the words they have used, "and the priorities hereby respectively established." Then, if a "revenue officer" assigned, if his effects were attached as those of "an absent, concealed or absconding debtor," or if he committed "a legal act of 383] bankruptcy," *a general priority would attach. If any "other person" came within this description, a limited priority would attach.

But there is a still greater obstacle to remove before the construction of the plaintiffs can prevail. It would make a distinction, without reason, between "revenue officers" and custom-house officers; and, indeed, between "revenue officers" and all other nominal agents of the government, whether accountable by bond or otherwise. A general priority would attach in case of a "revenue officer" only; and a limited priority in case of other receivers of the public money.

It cannot be said that "revenue officers" comprise custom-house officers. It is very true that money arising from customs constitutes part of the public revenue. Nor is it intended to be denied that, in strict propriety, the collectors of those customs might be termed "revenue officers." But it is insisted that the terms used were not intended to have that meaning, but a limited, appropriated and technical meaning. It is believed that in no other sense have they ever been used in any act of Congress. Had it been the design of the legislature to use this definition in its enlarged, and not its accustomed sense, they would have taken care to have marked their departure from former observances in a manner that would have admitted of no doubt; in a way, too, that would have denoted, with precision, as occasion might require, the generic and specific signification of the terms. And, besides, the legislature, after passing this law have themselves clearly disaffirmed the construction to which we object, by resorting again to these expressions, and undeviatingly using them in their former limited and specific sense.

If the defendant's interpretation of the words "revenue officer" is correct, then the fifth section will not, whatever may be its proper punctuation, establish a retrospective priority in the case of custom-house officers. For if the court adheres to the existing punctuation of the statute, then custom-house officers will be embraced by that part of the section which refers to persons becoming indebted to the United States after the passing of this law; and the extension of the priority, in the *cases [384 mentioned in the latter part of the section, will adapt itself necessarily, and even in the absence of the usual technical words of discrimination, to that which, as occasion serves, will become its proper subject-matter. Thus, if the extension is to apply to a revenue officer, the priority will be general—retrospective, as well as prospective; but if the extension is to apply to "any other person" (and, of course, including custom-house officers), the priority will only be prospective.

If either of the general views here taken of this subject is correct, the United States, in this case, are not "entitled, under the 5th section "of the act of Congress, passed the 3d of "March, 1797, to satisfaction of their demands "out of the effects of Isaac Hendrickson, the "bankrupt, in the hands of the garnishees, as "assignees of the bankrupt, prior to the claims, "or any part of them, of the other creditors of "said bankrupt being satisfied;" because the debt due to the United States was created prior to the enactment of that law.

Rush, Attorney-General for the United States.

The reasons in support of the claim of the United States do not rest upon the rights of prerogative, but upon the terms of the legislative grant. It must be admitted that the legislature had power to grant the priority which is claimed in the case of public officers; and the judgment of this court, in opposition to all objections however well stated, has recognized and established the legitimacy of the grant in every case of a public debtor, whatever might be the origin or nature of the debt. The existence of the power is, therefore, no longer open to dispute, whatever speculative doubts may be cherished as to its propriety; or whatever controversy may arise upon the case proper for its application.

But the legislative power is limited in its exercise by the positive provisions of the constitution, and it is provided, among other things, that Congress shall not pass an ex post facto law. The act of the 3d of March, 1797, having been passed subsequent to the death of the collector; and, of course, subsequent to the period of the debt's being contracted, the question is made, whether the act would not assume the character of an *ex post facto law if it were to [385 be applied to the present case. The answer in the negative is maintained by the following general reasons:

1. In ascertaining the true import of the terms ex post facto, this court has decided that they only apply to criminal cases. The present is a case of debt.

2. Laws having a retrospective effect in civil cases, both as to rights and remedies, have never been, on that account alone, deemed unconstitutional. Theoretically, retrospective laws may sometimes be condemned; but, practically, they are common to every system of jurisprudence. A member of the convention who framed the constitution of the United States "had an ardent desire to have extended the provision respecting ex post facto laws to retrospective laws in general;" but, having failed in accomplishing that desire in the convention, when he became one of the ornaments of the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, he concurred in the judgment that Congress possessed the power to pass retrospective acts in relation to civil, though not ex post facto laws in relation to criminal cases. (See 3 Dall., 397.)

If, therefore, Congress has passed an act which must have a retrospective effect, the court will not, merely for that cause, declare it unconstitutional and inoperative. Before the act of the 3d of March, 1797, was passed, Congress had provided in favor of the United States, for a priority as to the payment of debts upon bonds for duties. But no similar priority was made applicable to the cases of revenue officers; of accountable agents; of debts on bonds other than bonds for duties, or on contracts. These presumed defects in the law produced the act of the 3d of March, 1797, and it must be expounded most liberally to remove the defects, and advance the remedy in contemplation. With respect to revenue officers, it was the policy, and must be taken to be the meaning of the law, that when they prove insolvent the priority shall attach in favor of the United States, with a full retrospective effect. But when a debtor, not a revenue officer, proves insolvent, he must have become indebted to the United States after the passing of the act in order to establish the claim of priority. Such, 386] *I have been informed,[1] has been the coustruction in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in a case of the commonwealth, for the use of the United States, against Lewis, the surety of the administrators of Delany, who was collector for the port of Philadelphia, and died indebted to the United States, before the act of the 3d of March, 1797, was passed. The provision of the 5th section of the act respecting the priority of payment, and of the estate of a deceased debtor in the hands of executors or administrators, was considered, in the same case, as a substantive provision, analogous to the provisions in most codes by which, upon the decease of a debtor, the law undertakes to class his debts and prescribe the order of payment; as, for instance, specialties before simple contract debts, and debts due to the state before those due to individuals.

It has been suggested, however, that a collector of the customs is not a revenue officer within the meaning of the act of the 3d of March, 1797. But, the fact is, that the collector has, peculiarly, been deemed such an officer, as well by practical experience as under the terms of the act itself. If the court should decide otherwise, it is to be feared that the security given would be far short of the intention and policy of the act of 1797. The government had, obviously, more at risk upon the fidelity of the collectors of the customs than upon any other class of revenue officers. That they are embraced under the designation of revenue officers in the act, it is believed has been taken for granted in the different district and circuit courts of the United States.

March 11th. Absent—TODD, J.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The United States claim a priority in payment out of the estate of Hendrickson in the hands of the defendants. Hendrickson, it appears, was one of the sureties of George Bush, late collector at Wilmington, who died on the 2d of February, 1797, in debt to the United *States, as appears by a subsequent ad- [387 justment of his accounts at the treasury, in the sum of $3,453.06. By the 5th sectiou of the act of the 3d of March, 1797, under which this priority is claimed, it is declared that where any revenue officer, or other person, hereafter becoming indebted to the United States by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent, &c., the debt due to the United States shall be first satisfied.

The court is of opinion that Hendrickson was indebted to the United States before this act passed; that is, at the time of the death of the collector, although the accounts of the latter were not settled until after its passage; and that, therefore, the law which secures a priority against the estates of persons who shall thereafter become indebted, does not apply to this case.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

If captured goods, claimed by a neutral owner, be by consent sold under an order of the court, and afterwards by the final sentence of the court, the proceeds are ordered to be restored to such owner, the amount of the duties due to the United States upon the importation of the goods must be paid.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court, affirming that of the District Court, which restored to the claimants, neutral Spanish merchants at Teneriffe, 20 pipes of wine, part of the cargo of the British brig Concord, captured by the American privateer Marengo, in August, 1812, without payment of duties; although the same had been, by consent of the proctors for the parties, sold under an order of the court.

The cause being submitted without argument,

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is the case of a shipment made by a neutral house on board of a British ship which was captured on a voyage from Teneriffe to London, by the private armed ship Marengo, and brought into the port of New *York [388 for adjudication. Pending the prize proceedings, the goods were sold by an interlocutory order of the District Court, and the proceeds brought into the registry. Upon the hearing, the property was decreed to be restored to the claimants without payment of duties; and this decree was afterwards affirmed in the Circuit Court. The cause has been brought, by appeal, to this court for a final decision.

1.—Mr. Dallas, who argued the case, has been kind enough to favor me with the information.

We are all of opinion that the proprietary interest of the claimants is completely proved, and therefore the decree of restoration must be affirmed.

With respect to the duties, we are all of opinion that the decree of the courts below was erroneous. Where goods are brought by superior force, or by inevitable necessity, into the United States, they are not deemed to be so imported, in the sense of the law, as necessarily to attach the right to duties. If, however, such goods are afterwards sold or consumed in the country, or incorporated into the general mass of its property, they become retroactively liable to the payment of duties. In the present case, if the goods had been specifically restored, and afterwards withdrawn from the United States by the claimants, they would have been exempt from duties. But having been sold, by order of the court, for the general benefit, the duties indissolubly attached, and ought to have been deducted from the proceeds by the court below.

The decree in this respect must be reversed.

The stipulation in a treaty, "that free ships shall "make free goods," does not imply the converse proposition that "enemy ships shall make enemy "goods."

The treaty with Spain does not contain, either expressly or by implication, a stipulation that enemy ships shall make enemy goods.

The principle of retaliation or reciprocity is no rule of decision in the judicial tribunals of the United States.

A neutral may lawfully employ an armed belligerent vessel to transport his goods, and such goods do not lose their neutral character by the armament, nor by the resistance made by such vessel, provided the neutral do not aid in such armament or resistance, although he charter the whole vessel, and be on board at the time of the resistance.

THIS was an appeal by Manuel Pinto from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of New York, affirming (pro forma) the sentence of the District Court, which condemned that part of the cargo which was claimed by him.

The facts of the case are thus stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court:

389*] *Manuel Pinto, a native of Buenos Ayres, being in London on the 26th of August, 1813, entered into a contract with John Drinkald, owner of the ship Nereide, whereof William Bennett was master, whereby the said Drinkald let to the said Pinto the said vessel to freight for a voyage to Buenos Ayres and back again to London, on the conditions mentioned in the charter-party. The owner covenanted that the said vessel, being in all respects seaworthy, well manned, victualed, equipped, provided, and furnished with all things needful for such a vessel, should take on board a cargo to be provided for her, that the master should sign the customary bills of lading, and that the said ship being laden and dispatched, should join and sail with the first convoy that should depart from Great Britain for Buenos Ayres; that on his arrival the master should give notice thereof to the agents or assigns of the said freighter, and make delivery of the cargo according to bills of lading; and that the said ship, being in all respects seaworthy, manned, &c., as before mentioned, should take and receive on board at Buenos Ayres all such lawful cargo as they should tender for that purpose, for which the master should sign the customary bills of lading; and the ship being laden and dispatched, should sail and make the best of her way back to London, and on her arrival deliver her cargo according to the bills of lading. For unloading the outward and taking in the homeward cargo, the owner agreed to allow 90 running days, and for unloading the return cargo 15 running days. The owner also agreed that the freighter and one other person whom he might appoint should have their passage without being chargeable therefor. In consideration of the premises the freighter agreed to send, or cause to be sent, alongside of the ship, such lawful goods as he might have to ship, or could procure from others, and dispatch her therewith in time to join and sail with the first convoy, and on her arrival at Buenos Ayres to receive the cargo according to bills of lading, and afterwards to send along-side of the ship a return cargo and dispatch her to London, and on her arrival receive the cargo according to bills of lading, and to pay freight as follows, viz., for the outward cargo £700 together with five per cent. primage, to be paid on signing the bills of lading, and for the homeward, or return cargo, at the rate mentioned in the charter-party. He was also to advance the master at *Buenos [390 Ayres, such money as might be necessary for disbursements on the ship. It was provided that all the freight of the outward cargo, except on the goods belonging to the freighter, which should not exceed £400 should be received by the owner on the bills of lading being signed; and in case of the loss of the ship such freight should be his property; but if she arrived safe back with a full cargo, then the freighter should be credited for the excess of the said freight over and above the sum of £700. A delay of 10 running days over and above the time stipulated is allowed the freighter, he paying for such demurrage at the rate of £10 10 per day.

Under this contract a cargo, belonging in part to the freighter, in part to other inhabitants of Buenos Ayres, and in part to British subjects, was taken on board the Nereide, and she sailed under convoy some time in November, 1813.

Her license, or passport, dated the 16th of November, states her to mount 10 guns and to be manned by 16 men.

The letter of instructions from the owner to the master is dated on the 24th of November, and contains this passage: "Mr. Pinto is to "advance you what money you require for "ship's use at River Platte, and you will con- "sider yourself as under his directions so far "as the charter-party requires."

On the voyage the Nereide was separated from her convoy, and on the 19th of December, 1813, when in sight of Maderia, fell in with, and after an action of about fifteen minutes, was captured by the American privateer

The Governor Tompkins. She was brought into the port of New York, where vessel and cargo were libeled; and the vessel and that part of cargo which belonged to British subjects were condemned without a claim. That part of the cargo which belonged to Spaniards was claimed by Manuel Pinto, partly for himself and partners, residing in Buenos Ayres, and partly for the other owners residing in the same place. On the hearing this part of the cargo was also condemned. An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, where the sentence 391] *of the District Court was affirmed, pro forma, and from that sentence an appeal has been prayed to this court.

Hoffman, of New York, for the appellant.

It is true this vessel was armed, but Pinto had no agency in arming her. She was an armed vessel as early at least as May, 1811, before the war between the United States and Great Britain. It is true she sailed with convoy, but this she was obliged by law to do. It is true also that she resisted the capturing vessel; but neither Pinto, who was a passenger on board, nor any other neutral passenger, gave any aid in the engagement.

The claim of Pinto in behalf of himself, his father and sister, who were jointly interested with him in the business which he carried on in his own name, was of three descriptions of goods:

1st. Of goods of which they were the sole owners.

2d. Of goods of which they owned one undivided moiety, the other being owned by British merchants.

3d. Of goods in which they claimed an interest of one-fourth, the residue being British property.

As to this last claim he is charged with mala fides, because in his examination in preparatorio he stated without qualification that he was the owner of one-fourth part of those goods, whereas in his claim and test affidavit he states the fact to be that he had agreed with certain British merchants, that if they would give him 10 per cent. upon the sales, he would select for them such goods as would sell at Buenos Ayres at an advance of 150 per cent. upon their cost and charges; that he selected these goods under that contract; that his commissions would have amounted to one-fourth of the original cost, and to that extent he believed himself interested therein.

There was no attempt to impose upon the court; he voluntarily explained the nature of his interest; if he was mistaken as to the legal effect of such a contract, yet no improper motive can be attributed to him.

392*] *Neither Pinto, nor any person connected with him, joined in the battle. If he had done so he might have been considered as taking part in the war, and thereby excluded himself from the protection to which he is now entitled by the law of nations. He remained in the cabin during the whole engagement, and had no concern whatever in the defense of the ship. It is true that he states upon his examination in preparatorio, "that he "belonged to the ship at the time of her capt- "ure, and had control of said ship and cargo." But his answers were written by the commissioner, and he being a foreigner, probably did not observe the force of the expression. The nature of his control is explained by all the other circumstances of the case to be a control within the limits of the charter-party. It is evident he could have no lawful control over the management of the ship from the time of her sailing from London until her arrival at Buenos Ayres. The letter of instructions from the owner of the ship to the master shows that the master was under the direction of Pinto so far only as the charter-party required.

It has been heretofore said that Pinto had acquired a hostile character arising from domicile. There is, however, no ground for such a pretense. It is true that in the charter-party he is said to be "of Buenos Ayres, but now residing in the city of London;" and in his examination in preparatorio, he states "that for seven years last "past he has lived and resided in England and "Buenos Ayres." But he at the same time states that he is a native of Buenos Ayres, that he now lives there, and has generally lived there for 35 years, and has been admitted a freeman under the new government of Buenos Ayres. Even if he had acquired a domicile in England, which is not true, yet he had turned his back on that country and was on his voyage home. (5 Ves., Jun., 787, Somerville v. Somerville.) Pinto's test affidavit shows particularly that his birth, residence and commercial establishment had always been at Buenos Ayres, except during his occasional temporary absences in hit commercial pursuits. The test affidavit is always good evidence in prize causes. The party is obliged to put in his claim upon oath, and it is to be taken as true until contradicted by better evidence.

*The court is now for the first time [393 called upon to decide the question whether neutral property forfeits its character of neutrality by being put on board an armed ship of the enemy.

The general rule is that the property of a friend in a hostile vessel is not liable to condemnation.

There are but two exceptions to the neutral right of trade:

1. He shall not carry contraband of war.
2. He shall not violate a blockade.

If the sailing in an armed vessel of the enemy had been also an exception, it would unquestionably have been noticed by some writer upon the law of nations. But no such exception is to be found in the books.

If such be the doctrine, what degree of force will be sufficient to forfeit the neutral character of the goods? If she carried a single musket, the principle must be the same as if she mounted fifty cannon. And sailing under convoy would be still more clearly within the rule.

Vattel (b. 3. c. 5, § 75) lays down the general principle thus: "Since it is not the place where "a thing is which determines the nature of "that thing, but the quality of the person to "whom it belongs; things belonging to neutral "persons which happen to be in an enemy's "country, or the enemy's ships, are to be dis- "tinguished from those belonging to the "enemy."

No hint is given that a distinction is to be taken between the armed and unarmed ships of the enemy. Again, in b. 3, c. 7, § 116, he says, "the effects of neutrals found in an enemy's

" ship are to be restored to the owners, against " whom there is no right of confiscation." (See also Duponceau's Bynkershoek, 102, 108; 2 Azuni, 194; Chitty, 111; Ward, 21; Mr. Jefferson's letter to M. Genet, 24th January, 1793, among our own state papers, in the department of state.)

This court will not, in contradiction to all 394] these authorities *make a new exception to the rights of neutral commerce. The policy of this country is to extend, not to impair them. A neutral aids the belligerent much more by carrying belligerant property than by employing a belligerent vessel to carry neutral goods; yet the neutral vessel carrying the belligerent goods is always restored, and with freight, unless she forfeit her neutral character by her hostile conduct. The neutral character may be forfeited by fraudulent conduct of the master; by violation of blockade; by carrying contraband goods; by false destination and by resisting search. These are the only exceptions to the general rule that the property of a friend must be restored. But there must be an actual or an implied connivance between the master of a vessel and the neutral owner of the goods in order to subject the neutral cargo to condemnation for the act of the master. (1 Rob., 67, Am. Ed., The Mercurius; Id., 130, The Columbia; Id., 277, The Jonge Tobias; 5 Rob., 234, The Shepherdess.) In the case of The Maria (the Swedish convoy) the merchant vessels had received orders from the convoy to resist search.

The unneutral character of a master shall not forfeit neutral property on board a neutral vessel. Can you then punish the innocent neutral for the legal exercise, by the hostile master of a belligerent vessel, of his rights of war?

If this property is to be condemned, it must be on the ground of resistance; for it is understood that it has been decided by this court that shipping neutral property on board an armed neutral vessel even, will not subject it to condemnation. If resistance be not the ground on which condemnation is claimed, then in a case where no resistance is made, if neutral property be found on board an enemy's ship armed merely for resisting the piratical boats of South America, it is liable to condemnation.

It is true that a neutral cannot lawfully rescue his ship captured by a belligerent, because he has redress by the law of nations if he has been improperly captured. (3 Rob., 227, Am. Ed., The Dispatch; 1 Rob., 287, The Maria.) But here the force was not used by a neutral. The ship-owner and the master were open and avowed enemies, and as such had a perfect 395] right to defend their *ship by force. It was a lawful force. (5 Rob., 206, Catharina Elizabeth.)

But it will be said that the right to search is impaired.

The right of search is applicable only to a neutral ship. In case of a belligerent ship, the right of search is superseded by the right of capture. The privateer had a right to capture the Nereide, but, strictly speaking, had no right to search her. Pinto, by placing his goods on board a hostile ship, made them certainly liable to capture, although not to condemnation. He gave us the right of capture in lieu of the right of search.

The putting of neutral goods on board an armed vessel of the enemy is analogous to the placing them in a fortified town. If they are placed there before investment, they are not liable to condemnation, if captured; but if placed there after investment they are liable.

But it will be contended that the fifteenth article of the treaty of 1795, between Spain and the United States (Laws of the United States, vol. 2, p. 526), has altered the rule of the law of nations on this subject, and that neutral Spanish goods found on board an enemy's ship are liable to condemnation as enemy's goods.

The words of the article are: " And it is here- " by stipulated that free ships shall also give " freedom to goods; and that everything shall " be deemed free and exempt which shall be " found on board the ships belonging to the " subjects of either of the contracting parties, " although the whole lading, or any part there- " of, should appertain to the enemies of either; " contraband goods being always excepted."

It will be contended, that if free ships make free goods, enemy's ships must make enemy's goods.

But we contend, that although by the treaty free ships make free goods, yet the rule of the law of nations still remains in full force, that free goods found in an enemy's ship are also free. Nothing but an express stipulation in a treaty can deprive the Spanish subject of his rights under the law of nations. The treaty contains no such express stipulation. The article stipulated does *not necessarily [396 imply its converse. The two rules are not inconsistent with each other. The neutral nation is entitled to the benefit of both. (Ward, 145.)

In some of our treaties will be found express stipulations as to both points; in others as to one of the points only; which fact shows that the two propositions are not considered as inseparable. The treaty of 1782, with Holland, adopts both rules—free ships are to make free goods, and hostile ships, hostile goods. So also does the convention of 1800 with France. (Vol. 6, appendix, p. 22.)

As to the Spanish ordinance of Spain, cited in 2 Azuni, 139, which declares even the goods of Spanish subjects to be good prize if found on board an enemy's ship, it is a mere municipal regulation and does not appear to have been adopted in practice against the citizens of the United States, even if it were in its terms applicable to them.

It is said that Spain would condemn our goods found on board her enemy's ships, and therefore, upon the principle of reciprocity, we ought to condemn her goods found on board the ships of our enemy. But the principle of reciprocity applies only to the case of salvage. It is not a rule of the law of nations as to prize of war.

The proprietary interest of Pinto, his father and sister, and of the other merchants of Buenos Ayres in whose behalf he has interposed a claim, cannot be disputed. Their national character is clearly made out. The goods are not liable to forfeiture, either on account of his residence in London or the character of the ship, or the opposition which she made, or by the treaty of Spain, or the principle of reciprocity. They ought therefore to be restored; and without payment of the duties, inasmuch as it was not a voluntary importation.

Dallas, contra, for the captors,

Contended, that there was evidence tending to show that Pinto had caused the ship to be armed, and had caused sundry British passengers to be taken on board, some of whom fought 397] in the battle. That he had *acquired a British character by domicile; and that he had not renounced that character by turning his back on England, inasmuch as he meant to return.

That Pinto must be considered as the owner of the vessel for the voyage, and as having a control over her in regard to her resistance.

He admitted that neutrals have a right to carry on their accustomed trade in the usual manner, and to employ the merchant vessels of the enemy for that purpose; but not to arm a hostile vessel, nor to hire a hostile vessel already armed.

He divided his argument into three points:

1. That the property cannot be restored without further proof, both on the subject of domicile and on that of proprietary interest. And that, under the circumstances of this case, Pinto is not entitled to time for further proof.

2. That by force of the treaty between Spain and the United States, taken in connection with the existing law of Spain, the property is liable to condemnation.

3. That a neutral cannot lawfully hire an armed vessel of our enemy, and in the course of that trade engage in battle with the United States.

1. As to further proof respecting his domicile.

In his examination in preparatorio he states, that for the last seven years he resided in England and Buenos Ayres. This fact stood unexplained upon the record for nearly a month. He then states in his test affidavit that he was then a resident of Buenos Ayres, where he had generally resided for 35 years; but says nothing in explanation of his former assertion, that he had resided the last seven years in England and Buenos Ayres. Why did he not state how long he had resided in each place? This leaves a doubt, which the court would permit him to explain, if he stood fair in court. The charter-party also states him to be then a resident in England.

398*] *Then as to his proprietary interest, he first swears that he is the sole owner; but afterwards contradicts himself, and says he made a mistake, and that his father and sister are jointly interested with him in the property. Again, he first states the printing apparatus to be his property, and afterwards admits that it belonged to British subjects.

With regard to the one-fourth which he claimed of sundry parcels of goods, he first swears that it belongs to him absolutely, and afterwards states that he was only entitled to a commission upon the sales of them. So also with regard to an invoice of buttons, he first claimed them as his own, and afterwards disclaimed them as British property.

Again his testimony is contradicted by Puzey, his confidential clerk, who testifies that part of the property claimed by Pinto belonged to the government of Buenos Ayres.

It is certain, then, that the evidence is not clear in his favor, as to his domicile, and as to his proprietary interest.

Is he entitled to further proof?

He has hired an armed vessel of the enemy which has fought an American vessel, and would have captured her if she had been able. There is no case in which restitution has been awarded under such circumstances. Suppose an American frigate had captured a British frigate laden with specie belonging to the Spanish government, would it have been restored? How was it in the case of The Peacock and The Epervier?

Pinto chartered the whole ship. He permitted everything to be put on board; the hostile property as well as the neutral. He was to receive freight for the hostile property, and a higher freight on account of the armament. He knew that if this armament was employed to protect the neutral property it would protect the hostile also. He impliedly undertook that the enemy's property should be protected. He was therefore interested in so doing, and identified his interest with that of the belligerent. The armament was clearly intended to be used against the Americans, as all the cruisers of France *had been driven from the [399 ocean, and never appeared in those southern latitudes.

He says in his examination that he was interested in the vessel and cargo and freight; and in a subsequent answer he states that he had the control of the ship and cargo. It is clear, therefore, that he participated in the belligerent character, and is not entitled to further proof. (See 6 Rob., 460, The Atlantic.)

2. As to the effect of the Spanish treaty in connection with the existing law of Spain.

The treaty says that "free ships shall make free goods." This implies the converse proposition that hostile ships shall make hostile goods.

This treaty followed the memorable discussion which took place between this government and Genet in 1793. At that time we had a treaty with Prussia (2 Vol. Laws U. S., 308, art. 12), which contains the same stipulation that free ships shall make free goods; but is silent as to the converse proposition. The two treaties are to be construed alike. Genet complained that we permitted the British to take French goods out of our vessels. Mr. Jefferson was one of the negotiators of that treaty, and it is clear that he understood it as implying that enemy ships should make enemy goods. (See his letters as Secretary of State to Mr. Genet, of 24th July, 1793, and to Mr. Morris of the 16th of August, 1793.) The administration of our government constituted, at that time, perhaps as wise a cabinet as ever existed. This treaty was their act. The proper construction must be that the converse rule is implied. (Ward, 144, 145.)

But when the treaty is taken in connection with the existing law of Spain at the time of making the treaty, there can be no doubt. By that law enemy ships make enemy goods. (2 Azuni, 139.) The Mr. Debron there mentioned was a Spaniard. There were two ordinances, one in 1704, the other in 1718. They are referred to in 2 Valin, 252, b. 3, tit. 9, art. 7. As to these ordinances, it is singular that they do not say that the goods of a friend in an enemy's ship shall be liable to confiscation; but that the goods of a Spanish subject in an enemy's ship *shall be so liable. This, however, im-[400

plies the other proposition; for if the goods of their own subjects were so liable, the goods of a friend would, a fortiori, be liable.

It is said that these ordinances have not been enforced against us. But we are not bound to show that fact. It is sufficient for us that the law exists.

Reciprocity is the permanent basis of the law of nations.

3. If a neutral hire an armed vessel of our enemy, and with armed force resist our belligerent rights, he forfeits his neutral character.

A neutral may pursue his accustomed trade in his usual manner; but the law of nations allows nothing further.

It has been said that the only test of neutrality is impartiality to the belligerents. This is true only in a national point of view. But when individuals are concerned, a very different test applies. (See the case of The Tulip.) A neutral cannot justify furnishing one belligerent with transports, by furnishing them to the other also. (See Vattel, b. 3, ch. 7, § 109, 110, where will be found the whole doctrine of the law of nations on this subject.)

The general rule is that nothing shall be done by a neutral to invigorate the belligerent.

A right of peaceful commerce is not a right to set forth a warlike expedition. On that principle a government might be neutral and all its subjects belligerent. The words of the elementary writers are to be construed according to the subject upon which they treat. They all speak of a peaceable merchant vessel, not an armed vessel.

Neutrals, says Sir W. Scott, may trade in the same manner as before the war, provided they take no direct part in the contest. It is not necessary to show that the party actually put a match to the guns. This vessel was forced into 401] action by Pinto; at all events she *was brought into action by means of Pinto. He had a direct part in the contest.

The authority cited from Bynkershoek is in our favor, if we interpret the words according to the subject-matter. He says a neutral may let as well as hire a vessel, but it must be a lawful letting and hiring. He did not mean to say that a neutral may carry on a peaceful trade in a hostile manner. In the next sentence he says you may employ the vessel and the labor of the belligerent.

It is clear that he means an unarmed vessel.

What are the rights of a belligerent in regard to the neutral?

He may search the vessel, the cargo and the papers. We have reason to complain of a neutral who puts a cargo like this (a great part being belligerent) on board a belligerent armed vessel, whereby our right of search is eluded without a battle. A neutral may, indeed, if he can, elude the right of search by superior sailing, but he can not lawfully prevent it by force.

In the case cited from 5 Rob., 206, there is not evidence that the vessel was armed. If the fact had been so it would undoubtedly have been mentioned by the reporter, or the judge. Their silence shows that it was not armed.

The slightest recourse to belligerent force in support of neutral rights is fatal. A neutral vessel may arm, but she cannot resist belligerent rights. A neutral must not, directly nor indirectly, contribute to the force of an enemy. In 1 Rob., 287, The Maria, it is decided that resistance of the convoy ship is the resistance of the whole convoy; and that the resistance of the ship affects the cargo. In the case of The Elsebe (5 Rob., 174, Eng. Ed.), one of the questions was whether the cargoes, belonging to subjects of the Hans Towns, laden on board Swedish vessels, and sailing under Swedish convoy, were liable to condemnation, the convoying ships having resisted search by the British fleet. It was contended on their behalf that they were not involved in the penalties of Swedish resistance, *which was an act of the Swedish [402 government, and did not bind the subjects of other powers; that the proprietors of these cargoes were not privy to this fact; and that the masters of the vessels were not the agents of the cargoes, so as to bind them. Sir William Scott, after stating that there was in the charter party an express stipulation that the ship should sail with convoy, says: "But I will take the "case on the supposition that there was no "such engagement. The master associates him- "self with a convoy, the instructions of which "he must be supposed to know; he puts the "goods under unlawful protection, and it must "be presumed that this is done with due au- "thority from the owners, and for their bene- "fit. It is not the case of an unforeseen emer- "gency happening to the ship at sea, where the "fact itself proves the owners to be ignorant "and innocent; and where the court has held "that, being proved innocent by the very cir- "cumstances of the case, they shall not be "bound by the mere principle of law which "imposes on the employer a responsibil- "ity for the acts of his agent. On the contrary, "it is a matter done antecedently to the voyage, "and must therefore be presumed to be done "on communication with the owners and with "their consent; and the effect of this presump- "tion is such that it cannot be permitted to be "averred against, inasmuch as all the evidence "must come from the suspected parties them- "selves, without affording a possibility of meet- "ing it, however prepared. The court has, "therefore, thought it not unreasonable to ap- "ply the strict principle of law, in a case not "entitled to any favor, and holds, as it does in "blockade cases of that description, that the "master must be taken to be the authorized "agent of the cargo, that he has acted under "powers from his employer, and that if he has "exceeded his authority it is barratry, for which "he is personally answerable, and for which "the owner must look to him for indemnifica- "tion. I pass over many considerations "which have been properly pressed in argu- "ment, but I cannot omit to observe that this "is not merely a question arising on a single "fact of limited consequence; it is a pretension "of infinite importance, and of great extent, be- "ing nothing less than an opposition to the gen- "eral law of search, by which, if it could in one "instance be admitted, the whole provisions of "the law of nations on that head might be "effectually defied; *for if this prin- [403 "ciple could be maintained, by an interchange "of convoys the whole unlawful business "might be carried on with security. To put "the goods of one country on board the ships "of another, would be a complete recipe for "the safety of the goods with a trifling alter"ation, easily understood, and easily practiced, "while the mischief itself would exist in full "force."

The same principle was afterwards advanced by the Danish government in relation to American ships sailing under British convoy, and acquiesced in by the American government. (See the letter from our minister, Mr. Irvin, to the Secretary of State, of 23d June, 1811, and the letter from the Swedish minister, Rosencrantz, to Mr. Irvin, of the 28th of June, 1811. State papers, p. 224, 235.)

A neutral cannot employ the force of his own government, nor that of another neutral, much less that of a belligerent, to protect himself from search. If you cannot make use of the convoy, you cannot take the guns of that convoy and protect yourself. It is not the modification of the force, but the force itself that is unlawful. If a neutral, insured as such, range himself under convoy, the policy is vacated.

This case is not like that of neutral goods put into a fortified town before investment: it is more like that of goods placed there after investment. They were put on board with a full knowledge that the vessel would be invested (if a land term may be permitted in speaking of a naval transaction); that is, that she would be liable to search.

Pinkney, on the same side,

Contended that this property ought to be condemned upon three grounds:

1. The treaty with Spain.
2. The principle of reciprocity; and,
3. The conduct of Pinto in hiring an armed vessel of the enemy, which made resistance.

404*] *1. As to the Spanish treaty. It contains the stipulation that "free ships shall make free goods," and it does not negative the converse proposition that enemy ships shall make enemy goods. Hence we are at liberty to give the stipulation its full extent and scope.

This principle was first attempted to be established by Holland immediately after the treaty of Munster. They sought to establish by treaty that the flag should communicate its character to the cargo. This was the original form of the proposition. It necessarily involved the principle that hostile ships should make hostile goods. How preposterous would it be to say that neutral ships should make neutral goods, but enemy's ships should not make enemy's goods.

It is the universal understanding among nations that the two propositions are mutually connected, and the one implies the other. It might have been necessary in the outset to express both, but when the principle was generally understood, that necessity ceased. The United States had no interest in extending the range of the principle; and in all her treaties, except those with Spain and Prussia, she has stipulated for both parts of the rule. There is no reason, either in the commercial or belligerent policy of the United States, which should induce her to stop short with the proposition that free ships should make free goods, and not go on to adopt the converse.

Spain had no motive to adopt the principle with the limitation under consideration. In her treaties with France, Holland and England, she adopts the principle in its whole extent. She took it with the qualification that neutrals should not put their goods on board a belligerent vessel. In her treaty with England she expresses only the converse, viz., that "enemy ships shall make enemy goods."

It has been said that she limited the principle by acceding to the armed neutrality; but that was a mere ephemeral act, and its validity depended upon an event which never happened—the accession of England.

2. As to the law of Spain and the principle of reciprocity. *In the ordinance of [405 1702 it appears to be her favorite principle that "enemy ships shall make enemy goods." In the ordinance of 1718 the same principle is adopted and ordered to be carried into execution. These ordinances were re-enacted in 1739, 1756, 1779, 1794 and 1796. The treaty now under consideration was wedged in between two of these ordinances—those of 1794 and 1796. Is it possible that Spain, the declared enemy of neutral rights, meant to recognize a principle like this, which had never before been taken under the protection of any nation? Are we to suppose that Spain, by this treaty, meant to abandon her own local law? Spain has had this principle in abhorrence. By her ordinance of 1718 she says that if any part of the cargo is hostile it shall communicate its character to the ship and all the residue of the cargo. This principle cannot be understood but in the manner for which we contend.

By the law of Spain, therefore, this property would be liable to condemnation.

By the rule of reciprocity it ought to be condemned here.

But it is objected that the Spanish law has never been enforced against us. It is sufficient for us to show that it exists. In the absence of contrary proof the presumption is that it has been executed.

It is said also that the rule of reciprocity applies only to the case of recapture and salvage. But Sir W. Scott, in The Santa Cruz (1 Rob., 53, Am. Ed.), says that "this principle of re-"ciprocity is by no means peculiar to cases of "recapture; it is found also to operate in other "cases of maritime law. At the breaking out of "a war it is the constant practice of this coun-"try to condemn property seized before the "war, if the enemy condemns, and to restore "if the enemy restores. It is a principle sanc-"tioned by the great foundation of the law of "England—Magna Charta itself; which pre-"scribes that at the commencement of a war "the enemy's merchants shall be kept and "treated as our own merchants are treated in "their country."

*The principle of reciprocity has been [406 distinctly recognized and adopted by the law of Spain. Holland remonstrated, but Spain answered that Holland had not resisted the maritime principles of England. The same answer was received from France when we complained of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The British orders in council also were founded upon the same principle. Great Britain attempted to justify them by the assertion that we acquiesced in the Berlin and Milan decrees. The assertion was not true; but it shows that Great Britain acknowledged the rule of reciprocity as a rule of the law of nations.

3. As to the armament and resistance.

The undisputed facts are that Pinto hired the whole vessel, and took in goods on freight for his own benefit. That the vessel was armed, sailed, resisted, and was captured.

It is contended that he could lawfully do all this. If he could he was "a chartered libertine." Can a neutral surround himself "with all the pomp and circumstance of war?" The idea of our opponents exhibits a discordia rerum—an incongruous mixture of discordant attributes; a centaur-like figure—half man, half ship; a fantastic form, bearing in one hand the spear of Achilles, in the other the olive branch of Minerva, the frown of defiance on her brow, and the smile of conciliation on her lip, entwining the olive branch of peace around the thunderbolt of Jupiter, and hurling it, thus disguised, indiscriminately at friends and foes.

From the authorities cited on the other side, an inference is attempted to be drawn that a neutral may lawfully employ an armed merchant vessel of the enemy to transport his goods. But none of those authorities speak of an armed vessel. Such a vessel unquestionably has power to make captures. If she has a commission the captures are for her own benefit; if she has no commission she captures for the crown. Her prizes are droits of admiralty. It is true that if she sails without a pass, or some document to show her national character, she would be considered as a pirate; but this vessel had a 407] British pass. If all neutrals may *lawfully hire such vessels the ocean may be covered with them, and they might more effectually aid the enemy than his own navy.

Bynkershoek says the neutral must do nothing to the prejudice of the belligerent. It is incumbent, therefore, upon Pinto to show that he did us no prejudice by chartering such an armed vessel. We say he thereby infringed our right of search. It is said that the right of search is a right to search the ship only. But why search the ship? To see what sort of a cargo she has. The cargo, therefore, must be searched as well as the ship. A neutral cannot carry contraband goods, nor violate blockade, nor carry his own property if it be the produce of his estate in the enemy's country. To prevent this the belligerent has a right to stop and search his cargo. In this case it is the hostile character of the vessel which constitutes the offense, inasmuch as it prevented our right of search.

In the case of The Elsebe the cargo was forfeited by sailing under convoy which resisted search. Pinto falls by the fate of war. He identified himself with a hostile armament; he knew the necessary consequence of his act; he knew it would be the duty of the ship to resist; and that resistance would be made if there should be any chance of escape thereby. He must be either at peace or war. He cannot claim the advantages of both conditions at the same time.

Emmett, in reply,

After removing the objections which had been raised as to the British domicile of Pinto, and as to some variations between his testimony in preparatorio and his test affidavit, &c., observed,

As to the treaty with Spain, that the maxim "free ships shall make free goods" does not imply the converse, that hostile ships shall make hostile goods. There is certainly no necessary connection between the two maxims, nor have they ever been supposed to be necessarily connected. The one is the claim of a neutral, the other of a belligerent. What is the rule of justice? That free ships should make free goods, and that free *goods, in belliger- [408 ent ships, should be free also. Whenever the two maxims have been connected in a treaty, it has been where one of the maxims was important to one of the parties as a neutral nation, and the other to the other party as a belligerent nation.

In the treaty of the armed neutrality in 1780, the interest of the Dutch was to have the benefit of both maxims. The Dutch idea, however, was discarded by the northern confederacy, and the two maxims completely separated. The Empress of Russia in her manifesto of the 26th of February, 1780, declaring the principles which she intended to follow, states this principle in the following words: "That the effects "belonging to the subjects of the said warring "powers shall be free in all neutral vessels, "except contraband merchandise." But she says nothing respecting neutral goods found on board belligerent vessels. It cannot be supposed that she meant to surrender her neutral rights by mere implication. The principle is expressed in nearly the same words in the treaty of armed neutrality of 1780; nothing is there said respecting neutral goods in belligerent vessels. The King of Prussia, however, in his answer to the Russian manifesto, explicitly claims the freedom of neutral goods on board belligerent ships, as well as of belligerent goods on board of neutral ships. These facts show that in the general understanding of all Europe, the two maxims were entirely distinct and independent. (See also Martens's Law of Nations, translated by Cobbet, 318.) The United States did not exist as a nation until after the two maxims were thus completely separated.

Only three of the treaties by the United States have been produced on the other side. There are in fact eight in which the principle is mentioned: 1. The treaty with France of the 6th of February, 1778, (vol. 1, p. 398), which expressly adopts both maxims; the United States having in that instance yielded to the belligerent claim of France. 2. The treaty with Holland of the 8th of October, 1782 (vol. 1, p. 436). 3. The treaty with Sweden of 3d April, 1783 (vol. 2, p. 256), adopts only the maxim that free ships shall make free goods. 4. The treaty with Prussia of 1785 (vol. 2, p. 320), which adopts the principle free ships, &c., only. 5. The treaty *with Morocco, [409 1787 (vol. 2, p. 369), which stipulates that free ships shall make free goods, and that neutral goods on board of belligerent vessels shall also be free. This latter stipulation was necessary, inasmuch as the Barbary powers pay little respect in practice to the law of nations. 6. The treaty of 1795, with the Dey of Algiers (vol. 2, p. 500), which adopts the maxim, free ships, free goods. 7. The treaty with Spain of 1795 (vol. 2, p. 526), adopts the same maxim. 8. The treaty with Tripoli, of 1796 (vol. 4, p. 41), adopts the same maxim, and further stipulates that neutral goods shall be free in belligerent vessels. It was not necessary that such a stipulation should be inserted in the treaty with Spain, because Spain knew the law of nations and professed to respect it.

If there be no doubt, then, as to the construction to be given by the Spanish treaty, there is no necessity to dismiss the ordinance which is supposed to be connected with it. The principle which they call the rule of reciprocity ought more properly to be called the rule of retaliation.

But there is no such ordinance of Spain as is pretended. The ordinance applies only to Spanish goods found on board the vessels of the enemy, and was a mere temporary provision to continue only during the war. It appears by the extract from D'Habreu, found in 2 Azuni, 139, that the liability of the goods of neutrals found on board the vessels of the enemy depended upon treaties and not upon that ordinance.

The rule of retaliation is not a rule of the law of nations. The violation of the law of nations by one nation does not make it lawful for the offended nation to violate the law in the same way. It is true that states may resort to retaliation as a means of coercing justice from the other party. But this is always done as an act of state, and not as the mere result of a judicial execution of the law of nations. It is the effect of policy, not of law. Such were the measures adopted by the orders in council of Great Britain, and the offensive decrees of France, and of other nations under the control of France, which have been mentioned on the other side. The government of a state always undertakes 410*] to punish the violation *of its rights, and it chooses its own means. But the tribunals of justice must decide according to law.

The cases alluded to by Sir W. Scott in The Santa Cruz are cases in which the government could lawfully exercise its discretion in receding from its acknowledged rights. Thus in the case of property seized at the breaking out of a war, the government would have an unquestioned right to condemn or to release it. It was not the right to condemn which depended upon the rule of reciprocity, but the inexpediency. It was not a question of law, but of policy.

As to the armament, and the resistance.

It is difficult to say in what fact the opposite party consider the criminality to exist. Is it that Pinto took unarmed passengers on board? This was lawful. Was it the taking on board enemy goods? This was innocent. Was it in chartering an armed vessel? There is no rule of the law of nations against it. Was it in arming the vessel? The fact is not proved. Was it in joining in the combat? It is fully proved that he took no part in the contest.

But it is said that chartering the vessel makes him owner for the voyage. This is not the rule in a court of admiralty. Even if an enemy charter a neutral vessel he is not owner for the voyage. The vessel is always restored. Bynkershoek says it is not unlawful for a neutral to hire a vessel from the enemy for commercial purposes. But it is said that he means an unarmed vessel. There is nothing to support that idea. The natural presumption is that an enemy's ship would be armed.

It is said also that a neutral may deposit his goods in an armed belligerent vessel under a bill of lading, but not under a charter-party. That is, that several neutral merchants may severally occupy the whole ship, but that one cannot. A distinction founded upon no difference of principle cannot alter the case. How does he call the belligerent faculties of the ship into action more in one case than in the other? Does the neutral add to her belligereut faculty by lading her deeply and giving her a destination from which she dare not depart in quest of her enemy?

*This is not a commissioned vessel. [411 That case might be different. The Epervier was a commissioned vessel, and it is said was coming from Bermuda with bullion for the British troops in Canada; otherwise probably a claim for the bullion would have been interposed. In the case of the British packets captured during the present war, was the property of the neutral passengers confiscated? These vessels were armed and commissioned But there is no distinction taken in the books between commissioned and uncommissioned vessels, except that the latter cannot make captures, under the penalty of being treated as pirates. (2 Azuni, 233.)

If the doctrine be true in regard to an armed vessel, it must be equally true with regard to convoy: yet they do not pretend that this vessel is liable to condemnation because she sailed with convoy. The law of England is now that no vessel shall sail without convoy. Such a doctrine would go to prevent neutral property from being laden on board an English merchantman. Did England suppose, when she was passing the law requiring all vessels to sail with convoy, that she was cutting herself off from all neutral freight?

When writers on the law of nations speak of a belligerent vessel, what do they mean? They speak of it as of a wolf which you can only hold by the ears—Lupum auribus tenere. They mean a vessel carrying on war. But can a vessel carry on war without arms? What degree of armament is sufficient to make it unlawful for a neutral to employ her? One musket, or two, or twenty?

The Consolato del Mare, was written long before the knowledge of fire-arms, and does not speak of the distinction between armed and unarmed. In all the battles in which England has been engaged, and in all her commercial transactions, has such a case never occurred before? If it has, why are the books silent upon the subject. Why has not a single writer in the world mentioned the difference between neutral goods found in an armed and in an unarmed vessel of the enemy? (See 2 Azuni, 194, 195, 196, 197, and the authorities there cited.)

The owner of the ship was an enemy. He had a perfect right to arm and defend his ship. The master for *this purpose was his [412 exclusive agent. His act in defending the ship cannot be attributed to the innocent owner of the cargo, who also had a perfect right to put his goods on board such a ship; and who did not interfere in the combat. But it is said that a neutral has only a right to carry on his accustomed trade in his accustomed manner. Where is it said that it must be carried on in his accustomed manner? There is no authority for such a restriction, nor any principle to justify it.

But this trade from London to Buenos Ayres was always carried on in British ships, and often if not generally armed. This was a voyage carried on in the accustomed way.

It is said also that by putting these neutral goods on board an armed vessel our right of search, as a belligerent nation, was impaired.

But how is the right of search applicable to this case? This is a secondary right, auxiliary to the belligerent right of capturing the enemy's goods on board a neutral vessel. It is applicable only to a vessel bearing a neutral flag. The belligerent has a right to know whether the cargo be really neutral, and for that purpose must examine it at sea. But if the vessel bears the flag of an enemy there is no necessity to search the nature of the cargo at sea. You have the right to capture at once, and bring her in, when the cargo may be examined; the neutral must make out his claim, and is never entitled to damages for the delay or the detention.

Why does neutral resistance of search forfeit the cargo as well as the vessel, although the owner of the cargo had no concern in the vessel nor in the resistance? It is because the act of resistance was wholly unlawful; and the owner of the cargo can recover damages from the owner of the vessel or the master. But here the resistance was lawful; Pinto could never recover damages against the master for defending his ship.

March 11. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

413*] *In support of the sentence of condemnation in this case, the captors contend,

1. That the claimant, Manuel Pinto, has neither made sufficient proof of his neutral character nor of his property in the goods he claims.

2. That by the treaty between Spain and the United States the property of a Spanish subject in an enemy's vessel is prize of war.

3. That on the principles of reciprocity this property should be condemned.

4. That the conduct of Manuel Pinto and of the vessel has impressed a hostile character on his property and on that of other Spaniards laden on board of the Nereide.

1. Manuel Pinto is admitted to be a native of Buenos Ayres, and to carry on trade at that place in connection with his father and sister, who are his partners, and who also reside at Buenos Ayres; but it is contended that he has acquired a domicile in England, and with that domicile the English commercial character.

Is the evidence in any degree doubtful on this point? Baltaza Ximenes, Antonio Lynch, and Felix Lynch, three Spaniards, returning with Pinto in the Nereide, all depose that Buenos Ayres is the place of his nativity and of his permanent residence, and that he carries on trade at that place.

In his test affidavit Manuel Pinto swears in the most explicit terms to the fact that Buenos Ayres is, and always has been, the place of his permanent residence; that he carries on business there on account of himself, his father and sister, and that he has been absent for temporary purposes only. His voyage to London, where he arrived in June, 1813, was for the purpose of purchasing a cargo for his trade at Buenos Ayres, and of establishing connections in London for the purposes of his future trade at Buenos Ayres.

This plain and direct testimony is opposed,

*1. By his examination in preparatorio. [414

In this answer to the first interrogatory he says that he was born at Buenos Ayres, that for seven years last past he has lived and resided in England and Buenos Ayres, that he now lives at Buenos Ayres, that he has generally lived there for thirty-five years last past, and has been admitted a freeman of the new government.

Whatever facility may be given to the acquisition of a commercial domicile, it has never heretofore been contended that a merchant having a fixed residence, and carrying on business at the place of his birth, acquires a foreign commercial character by occasional visits to a foreign country. Had the introduction of the words "seven years last past" even not been fully accounted for by reference to the interrogatory, those words could not have implied such a residence as would give a domicile. But they are fully accounted for.

In his answer to the 12th interrogatory he repeats that he is a Spanish American; now lives and carries on trade at Buenos Ayres, and has generally resided there.

2. The second piece of testimony relied on by the counsel for the captors is the charter-party. That instrument states Manuel Pinto to be of Buenos Ayres, now residing in London.

The charter-party does not state him to have been formerly of Buenos Ayres, but to be, at its date, of Buenos Ayres. Nothing can be more obvious than that the expression, "now residing in London," could be intended to convey no other idea than that he was then personally in London.

As little importance is attached to the covenant to receive the return cargo at the wharf in London. The performance of this duty by the consignee of the cargo as the agent of Pinto, would be a complete execution of it.

Had the English character been friendly and the Spanish hostile, it would have been a hardy attempt indeed in *Mr. Pinto to found, [415 on these circumstances, a claim to a domicile in England.

The question respecting ownership of the goods is not so perfectly clear.

The evidence of actual ownership, so far as the claim asserts property existing at the time in himself and partners, is involved in no uncertainty. The test affidavit annexed to the claim is full, explicit, and direct. It goes as far as a test affidavit can go in establishing the right which the claim asserts. All the documentary evidence relating to this subject corroborates this affidavit. The charter-party shows an expectation that, of a freight of £700 the goods of Mr. Pinto would pay £400. The very circumstance that he chartered the whole vessel furnishes strong inducement to the opinion that a great part of her cargo would be his own.

The witnesses examined in preparatorio, so far as they know anything on the subject, all depose to his interest. William Pnzey was clerk to Pinto, and he deposes to the interest of his employer, on the knowledge acquired in making out invoices and other papers belonging to the cargo. His belief, too, is in some degree founded on the character of Pinto in London, where he was spoken of as a man of great respectability and property; and from the anxiety he discovered for the safety of the property after the Nereide was separated from her convoy.

The bills of lading for that part of the cargo which is claimed by Pinto are filled up, many of them with his name, some to order, and the marginal letters in the manifest would also denote the property to be his. Where he claims a part of a parcel of goods the invoice is sometimes to order, and the marginal letters would indicate the goods to be the property of Pinto and some other person.

This testimony proves, very satisfactorily, the interest of Pinto's house in the property he claims. There is no counter testimony in the cause, except the belief expressed by Mr. Puzey, that for a part of the goods, Pinto was agent for the government of Buenos Ayres. 416] This *belief of Mr. Puzey is supposed to derive much weight from his character as the clerk of Mr. Pinto. The importance of that circumstance, however, is much diminished by the fact that he had seen Pinto only a week before the sailing of the Nereide, and that he does not declare his belief to be founded on any papers he had copied or seen; or on any communication made to him by his employer. There are other and obvious grounds for his suspicion. A part of the cargo consisted of arms and military accoutrements; and it was not very surprising that Puzey should conjecture that they were purchased for a government about to sustain itself by the sword. But this suspicion is opposed by considerations of decisive influence, which have been stated at the bar. The demand for these articles in Buenos Ayres by the government would furnish sufficient motives to a merchant for making them a part of his cargo. In a considerable part of this warlike apparatus, British subjects were jointly concerned. It is extremely improbable that, if acting for his government, he would have associated its interests with those of British merchants. Nor can a motive be assigned for claiming those goods for himself instead of claiming them for his government. They would not by such claim become his if restored. He would still remain accountable to his government, and the truth would have protected the property as effectually as a falsehood, should it remain undetected. By claiming these goods for himself, instead of his government, he would commit a perjury from which he could derive no possible advantage, and which would expose to imminent hazard, not only those goods but his whole interest in the cargo. The court, therefore, must consider this belief of Mr. Puzey as a suspicion, which a full knowledge of the facts ought entirely to dissipate. If there was nothing in the cause but this suspicion, or this belief of Mr. Puzey, the court would not attach any importance to it. But Mr. Pinto himself has, in his examination in præparatorio, been at least indiscreet in asserting claims not to be sustained; and in terms which do not exhibit the real fact in its true shape. In his answer to the 12th interrogatory he says: "And this "deponent also has one-fourth interest as owner "of the following goods, &c., viz., 15 bales of "merchandise," &c. In his claim he thus states the transaction under which his title to the one-fourth of these goods accrued. He had *agreed with certain persons in England [417 to select for them a parcel of goods for the market of Buenos Ayres, of which he was to be the consignee, and which he would sell on a commission of 10 per cent. on the amount of sales at Buenos Ayres. These goods were selected, purchased, and consigned to Manuel Pinto. The bills of lading were in his possession, and he considered his interest under this contract as equal to one-fourth of the value of the goods, "wherefore," he says, "he did suppose that he was interested in the said goods and merchandise for himself, his father, and sister, and well entitled, as the owner thereof, or otherwise, to an equal fourth part of the said goods, inasmuch as his commissions as aforesaid would have been equal to such fourth."

It is impossible to justify this representation of the fact. The reasoning might convince the witness, but the language he used was undoubtedly calculated to mislead the court, and to extricate property to which the captors were clearly entitled, although the witness might think otherwise. Such misrepresentations must be frowned on in a prize court, and must involve a claim, otherwise unexceptionable, in doubt and danger. A witness ought never to swear to inferences without stating the train of reasoning by which his mind has been conducted to them. Prize courts are necessarily watchful over subjects of this kind, and demand the utmost fairness in the conduct of claimants. Yet prize courts must distinguish between misrepresentations which may be ascribed to error of judgment, and which are, as soon as possible, corrected by the party who has made them, and wilful falsehoods which are detected by the testimony of others, or confessed by the party when detection becomes inevitable. In the first case there may be cause for a critical and perhaps suspicious examination of the claim and of the testimony by which it is supported; but it would be harsh indeed to condemn neutral property, in a case in which it was clearly proved to be neutral, for one false step, in some degree equivocal in its character, which was so soon corrected by the party making it.

The case of Mr. Paul's printing press is still less dubious in its appearance. It would require a very critical *investigation of [418 the evidence to decide whether this press is stated in his answer to the 12th interrogatory to be his property or not. Four presses are said in that answer to belong to him; but he also says in his answer to another interrogatory, perhaps the 26th, that Mr. Paul had one printing press on board. Whether there were five presses in the cargo, or only four, has not been decided, because the declaration made in his examination in preparatorio that one of the presses belonged to Mr. Paul proves unequivocally that the mistake, if he made one, was not fraudulent.

That he should state as his the property which belonged to a house in Buenos Ayres, whose members all resided at the same place, and of which he was the acting and managing partner, was a circumstance which could not appear important to himself, and which was of no importance in the cause. These trivial and accidental inaccuracies are corrected in his claim and in his test affidavit. The court does not think them of sufficient importance to work a confiscation of goods of the real neutrality of which no serious doubt is entertained.

2. Does the treaty between Spain and the United States subject the goods of either party, being neutral, to condemnation as enemy property, if found by the other in a vessel of an enemy? That treaty stipulates that neutral bottoms shall make neutral goods, but contains no stipulation that enemy bottoms shall communicate the hostile character to the cargo. It is contended by the captors that the two principles are so completely identified that the stipulation of the one necessarily includes the other.

Let this proposition be examined.

The rule that the goods of an enemy found in the vessel of a friend are prize of war, and that the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are to be restored, is believed to be a part of the original law of nations, as generally, perhaps universally, acknowledged. Certainly it has been fully and unequivocally recognized by the United States. This rule is founded on the simple and intelligible principle that war gives a full right to capture the goods of an enemy, but gives no right to capture the 419] *goods of a friend. In the practical application of this principle, so as to form the rule, the propositions that the neutral flag constitutes no protection to enemy property, and that the belligerent flag communicates no hostile character to neutral property, are necessarily admitted. The character of the property, taken distinctly and separately from all other considerations, depends in no degree upon the character of the vehicle in which it is found.

Many nations have believed it to be their interest to vary this simple and natural principle of public law. They have changed it by convention between themselves as far as they have believed it to be for their advantage to change it. But unless there be something in the nature of the rule which renders its parts unsusceptible of division, nations must be capable of dividing it by express compact, and if they stipulate either that the neutral flag shall cover enemy goods, or that the enemy flag shall infect friendly goods, there would, in reason, seem to be no necessity for implying a distinct stipulation not expressed by the parties. Treaties are formed upon deliberate reflection. Diplomatic men read the public treaties made by other nations and cannot be supposed either to omit or insert an article, common in public treaties, without being aware of the effect of such omission or insertion. Neither the one nor the other is to be ascribed to inattention. And if an omitted article be not necessarily implied in one which is inserted, the subject to which that article would apply remains under the ancient rule. That the stipulation of immunity to enemy goods in the bottoms of one of the parties being neutral does not imply a surrender of the goods of that party being neutral, if found in the vessel of an enemy, is the proposition of the counsel for the claimant, and he powerfully sustains that proposition by arguments arising from the nature of the two stipulations. The agreement that neutral bottoms shall make neutral goods is, he very justly remarks, a concession made by the belligerent to the neutral. It enlarges the sphere of neutral commerce, and gives to the neutral flag a capacity not given to it by the law of nations.

The stipulation which subjects neutral property, found in the bottom of an enemy, to condemnation as prize of *war, is a con- [420 cession made by the neutral to the belligerent. It narrows the sphere of neutral commerce, and takes from the neutral a privilege he possessed under the law of nations. The one may be, and often is, exchanged for the other. But it may be the interest and the will of both parties to stipulate the one without the other; and if it be their interest, or their will, what shall prevent its accomplishment? A neutral may give some other compensation for the privilege of transporting enemy goods in safety, or both parties may find an interest in stipulating for this privilege, and neither may be disposed to make to, or require from, the other the surrender of any right as its consideration. What shall restrain independent nations from making such a compact? And how is their intention to be communicated to each other or to the world so properly as by the compact itself?

If reason can furnish no evidence of the indissolubility of the two maxims, the supporters of that proposition will certainly derive no aid from the history of their progress from the first attempts at their introduction to the present moment.

For a considerable length of time they were the companions of each other—not as one maxim consisting of a single indivisible principle, but as two stipulations, the one, in the view of the parties, forming a natural and obvious consideration for the other. The celebrated compact termed the armed neutrality, attempted to effect by force a great revolution in the law of nations. The attempt failed, but it made a deep and lasting impression on public sentiment. The character of this effort has been accurately stated by the counsel for the claimants. Its object was to enlarge, and not in anything to diminish the rights of neutrals. The great powers, parties to this agreement, contended for the principle, that free ships should make free goods; but not for the converse maxim; so far were they from supposing the one to follow as a corollary from the other, that the contrary opinion was openly and distinctly avowed. The King of Prussia declared his expectation that in future neutral bottoms would protect the goods of an enemy, and that neutral goods would be safe in an enemy bottom. There is no reason to believe that this opinion *was not common to [421 those powers who acceded to the principles of the armed neutrality.

From that epoch to the present, in the various treaties which have been formed, some contain no article on the subject and consequently leave the ancient rule in full force. Some stipulate that the character of the cargo shall depend upon the flag, some that the neutral flag shall protect the goods of an enemy, some that the goods of a neutral in the vessel of a friend shall be prize of war, and some that the goods of an enemy in a neutral bottom shall be safe, and that friendly goods in the bottom of an enemy shall also be safe.

This review, which was taken with minute accuracy at the bar, certainly demonstrates that in public opinion no two principles are more distinct and independent of each other than the two which have been contended to be inseparable.

Do the United States understand this subject differently from other nations? It is certainly not from our treaties that this opinion can be sustained. The United States have in some treaties stipulated for both principles, in some for one of them only, in some that neutral bottoms shall make neutral goods and that friendly goods shall be safe in the bottom of an enemy. It is therefore clearly understood in the United States, so far as an opinion can be formed on their treaties, that the one principle is totally independent of the other. They have stipulated expressly for their separation, and they have sometimes stipulated for the one without the other.

But in a correspondence between the Secretary of State of the United States and the minister of the French republic in 1793, Prussia is enumerated among those nations with whom the United States had made a treaty adopting the entire principle that the character of the cargo should be determined by the character of the flag.

Not being in possession of this correspondence the court is unable to examine the construction it has received. It has not deferred this opinion on that account, because the point in controversy at that time was the obligation imposed on the United States to protect belligerent *property in their vessels, not the liability of their property to capture if found in the vessel of a belligerent. To this point the whole attention of the writer was directed, and it is not wonderful that in mentioning incidentally the treaty with Prussia, which contains the principle that free bottoms make free goods, it should have escaped his recollection that it did not contain the converse of the maxim. On the talents and virtues which adorned the cabinet of that day, on the patient fortitude with which it resisted the intemperate violence with which it was assailed, on the firmness with which it maintained those principles which its sense of duty prescribed, on the wisdom of the rules it adopted, no panegyric has been pronounced at the bar in which the best judgment of this court does not concur. But this respectful defference may well comport with the opinion that an argument incidentally brought forward by way of illustration, is not such full authority as a decision directly on the point might have been. [*422]

3. The third point made by the captors is, that whatever construction might be put on our treaty with Spain, considered as an independent measure, the ordinances of that government would subject American property, under similar circumstances, to confiscation, and therefore the property claimed by Spanish subjects in this case ought to be condemned as prize of war.

The ordinances themselves have not been produced, nor has the court received such information respecting them as would enable it to decide certainly either on their permanent existence or on their application to the United States. But be this as it may, the court is decidedly of opinion that reciprocating to the subjects of a nation, or retaliating on them its unjust proceedings towards our citizens, is a political, not a legal measure. It is for the consideration of the government, not of its courts. The degree and the kind of retaliation depend entirely on considerations foreign to this tribunal. It may be the policy of the nation to avenge its wrongs in a manner having no affinity to the injury sustained, or it may be its policy to recede from its full rights and not to avenge them at all. It is not for its courts to interfere with the proceedings of the nation and to thwart its views. It is not for us to depart from the beaten track *prescribed for us, and to tread the devious and intricate path of politics. [*423] Even in the case of salvage, a case peculiarly within the discretion of courts, because no fixed rule is prescribed by the law of nations, Congress has not left it to this department to say whether the rule of foreign nations shall be applied to them, but has by law applied that rule. If it be the will of the government to apply to Spain any rule respecting captures which Spain is supposed to apply to us, the government will manifest that will by passing an act for the purpose. Till such an act be passed, the court is bound by the law of nations, which is a part of the law of the land.

Thus far the opinion of the court has been formed without much difficulty. Although the principles asserted by the counsel have been sustained on both sides with great strength of argument, they have been found on examination to be simple and clear in themselves. Stripped of the imposing garb in which they have been presented to the court, they have no intrinsic intricacy which should perplex the understanding.

The remaining point is of a different character. Belligerent rights and neutral privileges are set in array against each other. Their respective pretensions, if not actually intermixed, come into close contact, and the line of partition is not so distinctly marked as to be clearly discernible. It is impossible to declare in favor of either, without hearing, from the other, objections which it is difficult to answer and arguments which it is not easy to refute. The court has given to this subject a patient investigation, and has endeavored to avail itself of all the aid which has been furnished by the bar. The result, if not completely satisfactory even to ourselves, is one from which it is believed we should not depart were further time allowed for deliberation.

4. Has the conduct of Manuel Pinto and of the Nereide been such as to impress the hostile character on that part of the cargo which was in fact neutral?

In considering this question the court has examined separately the parts which compose it.

The vessel was armed, was the property of an enemy, *and made resistance. How [*424] do these facts affect the claim?

Had the vessel been armed by Pinto, that fact would certainly have constituted an important feature in the case. But the court can see no reason for believing she was armed by him. He chartered, it is true, the whole vessel, and that he might as rightfully do as contract for her partially; but there is no reason to believe that he was instrumental in arming her. The owner stipulates that the Nereide "well manned, victualed, equipped, provided "and furnished with all things needful for "such a vessel," shall be ready to take on board a cargo to be provided for her. The Nereide, then, was to be put, by the owner, in the condition in which she was to sail. In equipping her, whether with or without arms, Mr. Pinto was not concerned. It appears to have been entirely and exclusively the act of the belligerent owner.

Whether the resistance, which was actually made, is in any degree imputable to Mr. Pinto, is a question of still more importance.

It has been argued that he had the whole ship, and that therefore the resistance was his resistance.

The whole evidence upon this point is to be found in the charter-party, in the letter of instructions to the master, and in the answer of Pinto to one of the interrogatories in preparatorio.

The charter-party evinces throughout that the ship remained under the entire direction of the owner, and that Pinto in no degree participated in the command of her. The owner appoints the master and stipulates for every act to be performed by the ship, from the date of the charter-party to the termination of the voyage. In no one respect, except in lading the vessel, was Pinto to have any direction of her.

The letter of instructions to the master contains full directions for the regulation of his conduct, without any other reference to Mr. Pinto than has been already stated. That ref-425*] erence shows a positive limitation of *his power by the terms of the charter-party. Consequently he had no share in the government of the ship.

But Pinto says in his answer to the 6th interrogatory that "he had control of the said ship and cargo."

Nothing can be more obvious than that Pinto could understand himself as saying no more than that he had the control of the ship and cargo so far as respected her lading. A part of the cargo did not belong to him, and was not consigned to him. His control over the ship began and ended with putting the cargo on board. He does not appear ever to have exercised any authority in the management of the ship. So far from exercising any during the battle, he went into the cabin, where he remained till the conflict was over. It is, then, most apparent that when Pinto said he had the control of the ship and cargo, he used those terms in a limited sense. He used them in reference to the power of lading her, given him by the charter-party.

If in this the court be correct, this cause is to be governed by the principles which would apply to it had the Nereide been a general ship.

The next point to be considered is the right of a neutral to place his goods on board an armed belligerent merchantman.

That a neutral may lawfully put his goods on board a belligerent ship for conveyance on the ocean, is universally recognized as the original rule of the law of nations. It is, as has been already stated, founded on the plain and simple principle that the property of a friend remains his property wherever it may be found. "Since it is not," says Vattel, "the place "where a thing is, which determines the nature "of that thing, but the character of the person "to whom it belongs, things belonging to neu-"tral persons which happen to be in an enemy's "country, or on board an enemy's ships, are to "be distinguished from those which belong to "the enemy."

Bynkershoek lays down the same principles in terms equally explicit; and in terms entitled to the more consideration because he enters into the inquiry whether a *knowledge [426 of the hostile character of the vessel can effect the owner of the goods.

The same principle is laid down by other writers on the same subject, and is believed to be contradicted by none. It is true there were some old ordinances of France declaring that a hostile vessel or cargo should expose both to condemnation. But these ordinances have never constituted a rule of public law.

It is deemed of much importance that the rule is universally laid down in terms which comprehend an armed as well as an unarmed vessel; and that armed vessels have never been excepted from it. Bynkershoek, in discussing a question suggesting an exception, with his mind directed to hostilities, does not hint that this privilege is confined to unarmed merchantmen.

In point of fact, it is believed that a belligerent merchant vessel rarely sails unarmed, so that this exception from the rule would be greater than the rule itself. At all events, the number of those who are armed and who sail under convoy is too great not to have attracted the attention of writers on public law; and this exception to their broad general rule, if it existed, would certainly be found in some of their works. It would be strange if a rule laid down, with a view to war, in such broad terms as to have universal application, should be so construed as to exclude from its operation almost every case for which it purports to provide, and yet that not a dictum should be found in the books pointing to such construction.

The antiquity of the rule is certainly not unworthy of consideration. It is to be traced back to the time when almost every merchantman was in a condition for self-defense, and the implements of war were so light and so cheap that scarcely any would sail without them.

A belligerent has a perfect right to arm in his own defense; and a neutral has a perfect right to transport his goods in a belligerent vessel. These rights do not interfere with each other. The neutral has no control over the belligerent right to arm; ought he to be accountable for the exercise of it?

*By placing neutral property in a [427 belligerent ship, that property, according to the positive rules of law, does not cease to be neutral. Why should it be changed by the exercise of a belligerent right, universally acknowledged and in common use when the rule was laid down, and over which the neutral had no control?

The belligerent answers, that by arming his rights are impaired. By placing his goods under the guns of an enemy, the neutral has taken part with the enemy and assumed the hostile character.

Previous to that examination which the court has been able to make of the reasoning by which this proposition is sustained, one remark will be made which applies to a great part of it. The argument which, taken in its fair sense, would prove that it is unlawful to deposit goods for transportation in the vessel of an enemy generally, however imposing its form, must be unsound, because it is in contradiction to acknowledged law.

It is said that by depositing goods on board an armed belligerent the right of search may be impaired, perhaps defeated.

What is this right of search? Is it a substantive and independent right wantonly, and in the pride of power, to vex and harass neutral commerçe, because there is a capacity to do so? or to indulge the idle and mischievous curiosity of looking into neutral trade? or the assumption of a right to control it? If it be such a substantive and independent right, it would be better that cargoes should be inspected in port before the sailing of the vessel, or that belligerent licenses should be procured. But this is not its character.

Belligerents have a full and perfect right to capture enemy goods and articles going to their enemy which are contraband of war. To the exercise of that right the right of search is essential. It is a mean justified by the end. It has been truly denominated a right growing out of, and ancillary to the greater right of capture. Where this greater right may be le-428] gally exercised *without search, the right of search can never arise or come into question.

But it is said that the exercise of this right may be prevented by the inability of the party claiming it to capture the belligerent carrier of neutral property.

And what injury results from this circumstance? If the property be neutral, what mischief is done by its escaping a search. In so doing there is no sin even as against the belligerent, if it can be effected by lawful means. The neutral cannot justify the use of force or fraud, but if by means, lawful in themselves, he can escape this vexatious proceedure, he may certainly employ them.

To the argument that by placing his goods in the vessel of an armed enemy, he connects himself with that enemy and assumes the hostile character, it is answered that no such connection exists.

The object of the neutral is the transportation of his goods. His connection with the vessel which transports them is the same, whether that vessel be armed or unarmed. The act of arming is not his—it is the act of a party who has a right so to do. He meddles not with the armament nor with the war. Whether his goods were on board or not, the vessel would be armed and would sail. His goods do not contribute to the armament further than the freight he pays, and freight he would pay were the vessel unarmed.

It is difficult to perceive in this argument anything which does not also apply to an unarmed vessel. In both instances it is the right and the duty of the carrier to avoid capture and to prevent a search. There is no difference except in the degree of capacity to carry this duty into effect. The argument would operate against the rule which permits the neutral merchant to employ a belligerent vessel without imparting to his goods the belligerent character.

The argument respecting resistance stands on the same ground with that which respects arming. Both are lawful. Neither of them is chargeable to the goods *or their own- [429 er, where he has taken no part in it. They are incidents to the character of the vessel; and may always occur where the carrier is belligerent.

It is remarkable that no express authority on either side of this question can be found in the books. A few scanty materials, made up of inferences from cases depending on other principles, have been gleaned from the books and employed by both parties. They are certainly not decisive for or against either.

The celebrated case of the Swedish convoy has been pressed into the service. But that case decided no more than this, that a neutral may arm, but cannot by force resist a search. The reasoning of the judge on that occasion would seem to indicate that the resistance condemned the cargo, because it was unlawful. It has been inferred on the one side that the goods would be infected by the resistance of the ship, and on the other that a resistance which is lawful, and is not produced by the goods, will not change their character.

The case of The Katharina Elizabeth approaches more nearly to that of The Nereide, because in that case as in this there were neutral goods and a belligerent vessel. It was certainly a case, not of resistance, but of an attempt by a part of the crew to seize the capturing vessel. Between such an attempt and an attempt to take the same vessel previous to capture, there does not seem to be a total dissimilitude. But it is the reasoning of the judge, and not his decision, of which the claimants would avail themselves. He distinguishes between the effect which the employment of force by a belligerent owner or by a neutral owner would have on neutral goods. The first is lawful, the last unlawful. The belligerent owner violates no duty. He is held by force and may escape if he can. From the marginal note it appears that the reporter understood this case to decide in principle that resistance by a belligerent vessel would not confiscate the cargo. It is only in a case without express authority that such materials can be relied on.

If the neutral character of the goods is forfeited by the resistance of the belligerent vessel, why is not the neutral character of the passengers forfeited by the same *cause? The [430 master and crew are prisoners of war, why are not those passengers who did not engage in the conflict also prisoners? That they are not would seem to the court to afford a strong argument in favor of the goods. The law would operate in the same manner on both.

It cannot escape observation, that in argument the neutral freighter has been continually represented as arming the Nereide and impelling her to hostility. He is represented as drawing forth and guiding her warlike energies. The court does not so understand the case. The Nereide was armed, governed, and conducted by belligerents. With her force or her conduct the neutral shippers had no concern. They deposited their goods on board the vessel, and stipulated for their direct transportation to Buenos Ayres. It is true that on her passage she had a right to defend herself, did defend herself, and might have captured an assailing vessel; but to search for the enemy would have been a violation of the charter-party and of her duty.

With a pencil dipped in the most vivid colors, and guided by the hand of a master, a splendid portrait has been drawn exhibiting this vessel and her freighter as forming a single figure, composed of the most discordant materials of peace and war. So exquisite was the skill of the artist, so dazzling the garb in which the figure was presented, that it required the exercise of that cold investigating faculty which ought always to belong to those who sit on this bench, to discover its only imperfection; its want of resemblance.

The Nereide has not that centaur-like appearance which has been ascribed to her. She does not rove over the ocean hurling the thunders of war while sheltered by the olive branch of peace. She is not composed in part of the neutral character of Mr. Pinto, and in part of the hostile character of her owner. She is an open and declared belligerent; claiming all the rights, and subject to all the dangers of the belligerent character. She conveys neutral property which does not engage in her warlike equipments, or in any employment she may make of them; which is put on board solely for the purpose of transporation, and which en-431] counters the hazard incident *to its situation; the hazard of being taken into port, and obliged to seek another conveyance should its carrier be captured.

In this it is the opinion of the majority of the court there is nothing unlawful. The characters of the vessel and cargo remain as distinct in this as in any other case. The sentence, therefore, of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the property claimed by Manuel Pinto for himself and his partners, and for those other Spaniards for whom he has claimed, be restored, and the libel as to that property be dismissed.

JOHNSON, J. Circumstances known to this court have imposed upon me, in a great measure, the responsibility of this decision. I approach the case with all the hesitation which respect for the opinion of others and a conviction of the novelty and importance of some of the questions are calculated to inspire. The same respect imposes upon me an obligation briefly to state the course of reasoning by which I am led to my conclusion.

On the minor points I feel no difficulty. There is nothing to support the charge of English domiciliation; the charges of prevarication are satisfactorily explained; and on the question of national character, we must yet awhile reluctantly yield to the acknowledgement that Buenos Ayres is not free.

On the construction of the Spanish treaty, I feel as little hesitation. That a stipulation calculated solely to produce an extension of neutral rights should involve in itself a restriction of neutral rights; that a mutual and gratuitous concession of a belligerent right should draw after it a necessary relinquishment of a neutral right, which has never yielded but to express and (generally) extorted stipulation; are conclusions wholly irreconcilable to any principle of logical deduction.

Nor does the argument founded on reciprocity stand on any better ground. There is a principle of reciprocity known to courts administering international law; but I trust it is a reciprocity of beuevolence, and that the angry passions which produce reveuge and retaliation will never exert their influence on the administration of *justice. Dismal would be [432 the state of the world, and melancholy the office of a judge, if all the evils which the perfidy and injustice of power inflict on individual man were to be reflected from the tribunals which profess peace and good will to all mankind. Nor is it easy to see how this principle of reciprocity, on the broad scale by which it has been protracted in this case, can be reconciled to the distribution of power made in our constitution among the three great departments of government. To the legislative power alone it must belong to determine when the violence of other nations is to be met by violence; to the judiciary to administer law and justice as it is, not as it is made to be by the folly or caprice of other nations.

The last question in the case is the only one ou which I feel the slightest difficulty.

The general rule, the iucontestible principle is, that a neutral has a right to employ a belligerent carrier. He exposes himself thereby to capture and detention, but not to condemnation.

To support the condemnation in this case, it is necessary to establish an exception to this rule; and it is important to lay down the exceptions contended for with truth and precision.

Iu the first place, it is contended that a ueutral has not a right to transport his goods on board of an armed belligerent.

Secondly, that if this right be couceded, Pinto, iu this case, has carried the exercise of it beyond the duties of fair neutrality:

1. By laying the vessel under the obligation of a contract to sail with convoy.

2. By chartering an entire armed vessel of the enemy, and thus expediting an armed hostile force.

3. By taking in enemy goods on freight, and thereby laying himself under an implied contract that the armament of the vessel should be used in its defense.

*4. It was also contended that he had, [433 in fact, armed the vessel after chartering her, and increased her force by admitting passengers.

5. That the correspondence found on board shows that the armament was immediately directed against capture by Americans.

On the first and principal ground much may be said, but nothing added to the ingenious discussion which it has received from counsel.

The question is, why may not a neutral transport his goods on board an armed belligerent? No writer on the law of nations has suggested this restriction on his rights; and it can only be sustained on the ground of its obstructing the exercise of some belligerent right. What belligerent right does it interfere with? Not the right of search, for that has relation to the converse case; it is a right resulting from the right of capturing enemy's goods in a neutral bottom. It must be then the right, which every nation asserts, of being the sole arbiter of its own conduct towards other nations, and deciding for itself whether property claimed as neutral be owned as claimed. The question is thus fairly stated between the neutral and belligerent. On the one hand, the neutral claims the right of transporting his goods in the hostile bottom. On the other, the belligerent objects to his doing it under such circumstances as to impair his right of judging between himself and the neutral on the neutrality of his property and conduct. The evidence of authority, the practice of the world, and the reason and nature of things must decide between them.

All these are, in my opinion, in favor of the neutral claim.

Every writer on international law acknowledges the right of the neutral to transport his goods in a hostile bottom. No writer has restricted the exercise of that right to unarmed ships.

Every civilized nation (with the exception of Spain) has unequivocally acknowledged the existence of this right, unless it be relinquished 434] by express stipulation; *and, even with regard to Spain, the evidence is wholly unsatisfactory to prove that she maintains a different doctrine. My present belief is that she does not; but, admit that she does; and surely the practice of one nation, and that one not the most enlightened or commercial, ought not to be permitted to control the law of the world.

And what is the decision of reason on the merits of these conflicting pretensions?

Her first and favorite answer would be, that were the scales equally suspended between the parties, the decision ought to be given in favor of humanity.

Already is the aspect of the world sufficiently darkened by the horrors of war. It is time to listen to the desponding claims of man engaged in the peaceful pursuits of life.

But there are considerations in favor of the neutral to which the heart need not assent; they are addressed to the judgment alone.

Admit the claim of a belligerent, and you fritter away the right of a neutral until it is attenuated to a vision.

Admit the claim of the neutral and it is attended with a very immaterial change in the rights and interests of the belligerent.

Where are we to draw the line? If a vessel is not to be armed, what is to amount to an exceptionable armament? It extends to an absolute and total privation of the right of arming a hostile ship. Resistance, and even capture, is lawful to any belligerent that is attacked.

On the other hand, what injury is done to the belligerent by recognizing the right of the neutral? The cargo of a belligerent neither adds to nor diminishes his right to resist. If empty he must be subdued before he can be possessed; and, if laden, the right or faculty of resistance is in no wise increased. It is inherent in her national character, and can be exercised by strict right, without any reference to 435] the cargo that she contains. Suppose the case of a vessel and cargo wholly neutral; even she possesses a natural right to resist seizure; but her resistance must be effectual, or international law pronounces her forfeited. What injury results to the belligerent cruiser? If the cargo be really neutral, the exercise of his right of judging becomes immaterial; and if it be contraband, or otherwise subject to condemnation, what reason in nature can be assigned why the neutral owner should not throw himself upon the fortune of war, and rely upon the protection of your enemy? You treat him as an enemy if captured, and why should not he regard you as an enemy, and provide for his defense against you? I can very well conceive that a case may occur in which it may become the policy of this country to throw down the gauntlet to the world and assert a different principle. But the policy of these States is submitted to the wisdom of the legislature, and I shall feel myself bound by other reasons until the constitutional power shall decide what modifications it will prescribe to the exercise of any acknowledged neutral right.

The second ground of exception resolves itself into several points, and presents to my mind the greatest difficulties in the case.

1. There is a stipulation contained in the charter-party that the vessel shall sail with convoy.

2. Pinto chartered the whole vessel.

3. He took in sub-affreightment of hostile goods.

4. It is contended he had contributed to the arming and manning of the vessel after chartering her.

5. And that her equipment was pointedly against American capture.

With regard to the two latter points I am of opinion that the evidence does not prove that Pinto contributed to the armament of the vessel; and if she was armed by the owners, that it was against American capture is immaterial. As to the passengers, Pinto had no control over the reception of them into the vessel. He had *taken the hold and two berths in the [436 cabin; as to the residue it remained subject to the disposal of the captain or owner.

With regard to the three other points, after the best consideration that I have been able to give the subject, I satisfy my mind by two considerations:

1. I will not now give an opinion upon the abstract case of an individual neutral to all the world. It is known that Pinto was liable to capture both by the French and Carthagenians. This justified him in placing himself under British protection; and if, in the exercise of this unquestionable right, he has incidently impaired the exercise of our right of seizure for adjudication, we have nothing to complain of. The case occurs daily; and nothing but candor and fairness can be exacted of a neutral under such circumstances.

2. There appears to prevail much misconception with regard to the control acquired by Pinto, in this vessel, under the charter-party. His contract gave him the occupation of the hold of the vessel and two berths in the cabin; but went no further. Over the conduct of the master and crew, in navigating or defending the vessel, it communicated to him no power. It is true that by the conduct of the master and the fate of the vessel he might be incidentally affected as a sub-freighter, and so far he had an interest in her defense; still, however, it is reducible to the general interest which he had in the performance of the voyage, and it does not appear that he ever acted under an idea of being authorized to control the conduct of the captain, or took any part in the conflict which preceded the capture.

I am of opinion that the judgment should be reversed and the property restored.

STORY, J. My opinion will be confined to the point last argued because it definitively disposes of the cause against the claim of Mr. Pinto.

The facts material to this point are that Mr. Pinto chartered the Nereide, an uncommissioned armed ship belonging to British subjects, for 437] a voyage from London *to Buenos Ayres, and back to London at a stipulated freight. The ship was to be navigated during the voyage at the expense of the general owner, who expressly covenanted, in the charter-party with Mr. Pinto, that she should sail on the voyage under British convoy. Mr. Pinto, having thus hired the whole ship, took on board sundry shipments, partly on his own or Spanish account, and partly on account of British merchants from whom he was to receive, in lieu of freight, a portion of the profits and commissions. The Nereide sailed with her cargo under British convoy, and with instructions from the owner to the master to govern himself, in relation to the objects of the charter-party, according to the direction of Mr. Pinto, who accompanied the ship in the voyage. During the passage to Buenos Ayres the Nereide was accidentally separated from the convoy, and, while endeavoring to regain it, was, after a vigorous but unsuccessful resistance, captured by the privateer Governor Tompkins, and brought into New York for adjudication.

It is explicitly asserted in the testimony that Mr. Pinto took no part in the resistance at the time of the capture.

The question is, whether, upon these facts, Mr. Pinto, assuming him to be a neutral, has so incorporated himself with the enemy interests as to forfeit that protection which the neutral character would otherwise afford him.

The general doctrine, though formerly subject to many learned doubts, is now incontrovertibly established, that neutral goods may be lawfully put on board of an enemy ship without being prize of war. As this doctrine is asserted in the most broad and unqualified manner in publicists, it is thence attempted to be inferred by the counsel for the claimant that no distinction can exist whether the ship be armed or unarmed, or be captured with or without resistance. Arguments of this sort are liable to many objections, and are in general wholly unsatisfactory. Elementary writers rarely explain the principles of public law with the minute distinctions which legal precision requires. Many of the most important doctrines of the prize courts will not be found to be treated of, or even glanced at, in the elaborate treatises of Grotius, or Puffendorf, or Vattel. A striking illustration is their total silence 438] as to the illegality and penal *consequences of a trade with the public enemy. Even Bynkershoek, who writes professedly on prize law, is deficient in many important doctrines which every day regulate the decrees of prize tribunals. And the complexity of modern commerce has added incalculably to the number as well as the intricacy of questions of national law. In what publicist are to be found the doctrine as to the illegality of carrying enemy dispatches, and of engaging in the coasting, fishing or other privileged trade of the enemy? Where are transfers in transitu pronounced to be illegal? Where are accurately and systematically stated all the circumstances which impress upon the neutral a general, or a limited, hostile character, either by reason of his domicile, his territorial possessions, or his connection in a house of trade, in the enemy country? The search would be nearly in vain in the celebrated jurists whose authority has been quoted to silence the present inquiry. Yet the argument would be no less forcible that these doctrines have not a legal existence because not found in systematic treatises on the law of nations than that which has been so earnestly pressed upon us by the counsel for the claimants. The assumed inference is then utterly inadmissible. The question before the court must be settled upon other grounds; upon a just application of the principles which regulate neutral, as well as belligerent, rights and duties. Let us then proceed to consider them:

It is a clear maxim of national law that a neutral is bound to a perfect impartiality as to all the belligerents. If he incorporate himself into the measures or policy of either; if he become auxiliary to the enterprises or acts of either, he forfeits his neutral character; nor is this all. In relation to his commerce he is bound to submit to the belligerent right of search, and he cannot lawfully adopt any measures whose direct object is to withdraw that commerce from the most liberal and accurate search without the application on the part of the belligerent of superior force. If he resist this exercise of lawful right, or if, with a view to resist it, he take the protection of an armed neutral convoy, he is treated as an enemy, and his property is confiscated. Nor is it at all material whether the resistance be direct or constructive. The resistance of the convoy is the resistance of all the ships associated under the common protection, without any *distinction whether [439 the convoy belong to the same or to a foreign neutral sovereign, for upon the principles of natural justice, a neutral is justly chargeable with the acts of the party which he voluntarily adopts, or of which he seeks the shelter and protection. Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus—these principles are recognized in the memorable cases of The Maria (1 Rob., 340), and The Elsebe (5 Rob 173), and can never be shaken without delivering over to endless controversy and conflict the maritime rights of the world.

It has, however, been supposed by the counsel of the claimants that a distinction exists between taking the protection of a neutral and of a belligerent convoy. That in the former case all armament for resistance is unlawful; but in the latter case it is not only lawful but in the highest degree commendable. That although an unlawful act, as resistance by a neutral convoy, may justly affect the whole associated ships; yet it is otherwise of a lawful act, as resistance of a belligerent ship, for no forfeiture can reasonably grow out of such an act which is strictly justifiable.

The fallacy of the argument consists in assuming the very ground in controversy; and in confounding things in their own nature entirely distinct. An act perfectly lawful in a belligerent may be flagrantly wrongful in a neutral. A belligerent may lawfully resist search; a neutral is bound to submit to it. A belligerent may carry on his commerce by force; a neutral cannot. A belligerent may capture the property of his enemy on the ocean; a neutral has no authority whatever to make captures. The same act, therefore, that, with reference to the rights and duties of the one may be tortious, may, with reference to the rights and duties of the other, be perfectly justifiable. The act, then, as to its character, is to be judged of, not merely by that of the parties through whose immediate instrumentality it is done, but also by the character of those who, having co-operated in, assented to, or sought protection from it, would yet withdraw themselves from the penalties of the act. It is analogous to the case at common law where an act, justifiable in one party does not, from that fact alone, shelter his co-adjutor. They must stand or fall upon their 440] *own merits. It would be strange indeed, if, because a belligerent may kill his enemy, a neutral may aid in the act; or because a belligerent may resist search, a neutral may co-operate to make it effectual. It is therefore an assumption, utterly inadmissible, that a neutral can avail himself of the lawful act of an enemy to protect himself in an evasion of a clear belligerent right.

And what reason can there be for the distinction contended for? Why is the resistance of the convoy deemed the resistance of the whole neutral associated ships, let them belong to whom they may? It is not that there is a direct and immediate co-operation in the resistance, because the case supposes the contrary. It is not that the resistance of the convoy of the sovereign is deemed an act to which all his own subjects consent, because the ships of foreign subjects would then be exempted. It is because there is a constructive resistance resulting in law from the common association and voluntary protection against search under a full knowledge of the intentions of the convoy? Then the principle applies as well to a belligerent as to a neutral convoy? For it is manifest that the belligerent will at all events resist search; and it is quite as manifest that the neutral seeks belligerent protection with an intent to evade it. Is it that an evasion of search, by the employment, protection, or terror of force, is inconsistent with neutral duties? Then a fortiori the principle applies to a case of belligerent convoy, for the resistance must be presumed to be more obstinate and the search more perilous.

There can be but little doubt that it is upon the latter principles that the penalty of confiscation is applied to neutrals. The law proceeds yet farther and deems the sailing under convoy as an act per se inconsistent with neutrality, as a premeditated attempt to oppose, if practicable, the right of search, and therefore attributes to such preliminary act the full effect of actual resistance. In this respect it applies a rule analogous to that in cases of blockade, where the act of sailing with an intent to break a blockade is deemed a sufficient breach to authorize confiscation. And Sir W. Scott manifestly recognizes the correctness of this doctrine in The Maria, *although the [441 circumstances of that case did not require its rigorous application.

Indeed, in relation to a neutral convoy, the evidence of an intent to resist, as well as of constructive resistance, is far more equivocal than in case of a belligerent convoy. In the latter case it is necessarily known to the convoyed ships that the belligerent is bound to resist and will resist until overcome by superior force. It is impossible, therefore, to join such convoy without an intention to receive the protection of belligerent force in such manner and under such circumstances as the belligerent may choose to apply it. It is an adoption of his acts, and an assistance of his interests during the assumed voyage. To render the convoy an effectual protection, it is necessary to interchange signals and instructions, to communicate information, and to watch the approach of every enemy. The neutral solicitously aids and co-operates in all these important transactions, and thus far manifestly sides with the belligerent and performs, as to him, a meritorious service—a service as little reconcilable with neutral duties as the agency of a spy, or the fraud of a bearer of hostile dispatches. In respect to a neutral convoy the inference of constructive co-operation and hostility is far less certain and direct. To condemn, in such case, is pushing the doctrine to a great extent, since it is acting upon the presumption, which is not permitted to be contradicted, that all the convoyed ships distinctly understood and adopted the objects of the convoy, and intimately blended their own interests with hostile resistance.

There is not, then, the slightest reason for the favorable distinction, as to the belligerent convoy, assumed by counsel. On the contrary, every presumption of hostility is in such case more violent, and every suspicion of unneutral conduct more inflamed. And so in the argument of The Maria (1 Rob., 346), it was conceded by the counsel for the claimants, and recognized by the court. It was there said by counsel that it seemed admitted by the court on a former day that there was a just distinction to be made between the two cases of convoy, viz., between the convoy of an enemy's force and a neutral convoy; that the former (i. e., enemy convoy) would stamp a primary character of hostility on all ships *sailing under [442 its protection, and it would rest on the parties to take themselves out of the presumption raised against them; but that, even in that case, it would be nothing more than a presumption, which had been determined by a late case before the lords, The Sampson, Barney, an asserted American ship sailing with French cruisers at the time they engaged some English ships, and communicating with the French ships by signal for battle. That in that case, although there had been a condemnation in the court below, the lords sent it to further proof to ascertain whether there had been an actual resistance. Sir Wm. Scott emphatically observed: "I do not admit the authority of that case to "the extent to which you push it. That ques- "tion is still reserved, although the lords "might wish to know as much of the facts as "possible." It is clear, from this language, that the learned judge did not admit that the party could be legally permitted to contradict the presumption of hostility attached to the sailing under an enemy convoy. On the contrary, he seemed to consider that the primary character of hostility, which it was conceded on all sides was stamped upon such conduct, could not be permitted to be rebutted, but was conclusive upon the party. The case of The Sampson was originally heard before the Court of Vice-Admiralty, and the decree of condemnation was never disapproved of, if not ultimately affirmed, by the Lords of Appeal. I have been assured by very respectable authority that no proof of actual resistance ever was, or could have been, made on the final hearing. The case, therefore, affords a strong inference of the law as understood and administered in the prize courts of Great Britain.

And it may be added, in corroboration, that in Smart v. Wolff (3 T. R., 323, 332), Sir W. Scott (then Advocate-General), asserted, without hesitation, that if the neutral refused search, or sailed under convoy of the enemy's ships of war, or conveyed intelligence to the enemy, they are waivers of the rights of neutrality. The very circumstance of his putting these three cases in connection to illustrate his general argument, affords the most cogent proof that he considered himself as stating a doctrine equally clear and well established as to all of them.[1]

443*] *And this doctrine seems conformable to the sense of other European sovereigns. In the recent cases of the American ships captured while under British convoy by the Danes, the right of condemnation was not only asserted and enforced by the highest tribunal of prize, but expressly affirmed by the Danish sovereign after an earnest appeal made by the government of the United States. On that occasion the Danish minister pressed the argument, "that "he who causes himself to be protected by that "act (i. e., enemy convoy) ranges himself on the "side of the protector, and thus puts himself "in opposition to the enemy of the protector, "and evidently renounces the advantages at- "tached to the character of a friend to him "against whom he seeks the protection. If "Denmark should abandon this principle, the "navigators of all nations would find their ac- "count in carrying on the commerce of Great "Britain, under the protection of English ships "of war, without any risk;" and he further declared "that none of the powers in Europe "have called in question the justice of this "principle." (State papers, 1811, p. 527.)

It cannot be denied that our own government have acquiesced in the truth and correctness of this statement. And if to the general silence of the other European sovereigns we add the positive examples of Great Britain and Denmark (the latter of whom has not of late years been deficient in zeal for neutral rights), it seems difficult to avoid the conclusion that the doctrine is as well founded in national law as it seems to me to be in justice and sound policy.

Another argument which has been urged in favor of the assumed distinction ought not, however, to be omitted. It is that a party, neutral as to one power, may be *an enemy [444 as to another power, and he may lawfully place himself under belligerent convoy to escape from his own enemy. In such a predicament it is, therefore, always open to the neutral to explain his conduct in taking convoy, and to show, by proofs, his innocent intentions as to all friendly belligerents. In my judgment this supposed state of things would not remove a single difficulty.

It is not in relation to enemies that the question as to taking convoy can ever arise. It has reference only to the rights of friendly belligerents; and these rights remain precisely the same whatever may be the peculiar situation of the neutral as to third parties. Was it ever heard of that a neutral might lawfully resist the right of search of one power, because he was at war with another? And is not the evasion of this right just as injurious whether the neutral be at peace with all the world or with a part only?

There would be extreme difficulty in establishing, by any disinterested testimony, the fact of any such special intentions as the argument supposes. Independent of this difficulty, it would, in effect, be an attempt to repel, by positive testimony, a conclusive inference of law flowing from the very act of taking convoy. The belligerent convoy is bound to resist all visitations by enemy ships, whether neutral to the convoyed ships or not. This obligation is distinctly known to the party taking its protection. If, therefore, he choose to continue under the convoy, he shows an intention to avail himself of its protection under all the chances and hazards of war. The abandonment of such intention cannot be otherwise evidenced than by the overt act of quitting convoy. And it is impossible to conceive that the mere secret wishes or private declarations of a party could prevail over his own deliberate act of continuing under convoy, unless courts of prize would surrender themselves to the most stale excuses and imbecile artifices. It would be in vain to administer justice in such courts, if mere statements of intention would outweigh the legal effects of the acts of the parties. Besides, the injury to the friendly belligerent is equally great whatever might be the special objects of the neutral. The right of search is effectually prevented by the presence of superior force, *or exercised only after the perils and in- [445 juries of victorious warfare. And it is this very evasion of the right of search that constitutes the ground of condemnation in ordinary cases. The neutral, in effect, declares that he will not submit to search until the enemy convoy is conquered, and then only because he cannot avoid it. The special intention of the neutral, then, could not, if proved, upon principle prevail, and it has not a shadow of authority to sustain it. The argument upon this point was urged in The Maria and Elsebe, and was instantly repelled by the court.

1.—Since this opinion was delivered I find, by an account of all the appeals and final decisions thereon before the Lords of Appeal, published by order of the House of Commons in 1801, that the judgment of condemnation in The Sampson was affirmed by the Lords of Appeal. The following is a transcript of the printed account: "Sampson, "Joshua Barney, master; cargo, sugar, coffee, cot- "ton, indigo and dry goods, and specie, taken by "His Majesty's ship of war Penelope, Bartholemew "Samuel Rowley, Esq., commander, claimed for "American subjects for ship, cargo and specie— "sentence appealed from—pronounced at Jamaica, "22d April, 1794—ship, cargo and specie condemn- "ed. Sentence in the Court of Appeals, viz.: 31st "of May, 1798, sentence affirmed; as to the specie "claimed on behalf of Wacksmuth and Dutilh; and "21st of June, further proof directed to be made of "the property of the ship, cargo, and rest of the "specie. 29th June, 1799, ship, cargo and specie "condemned."

On the whole, on this point my judgment is, that the act of sailing under belligerent or neutral convoy is of itself a violation of neutrality, and the ship and cargo if caught in delicto are justly confiscable; and further, that if resistance be necessary, as in my opinion it is not, to perfect the offense, still that the resistance of the convoy is to all purposes the resistance of the associated fleet. It might, with as much propriety, be maintained that neutral goods, guarded by a hostile army in their passage through a country, or voluntarily lodged in a hostile fortress, for the avowed purpose of evading the municipal rights aud regulations of that country, should not in case of capture be lawful plunder (a pretension never yet asserted), as that neutral property on the ocean should enjoy the double protection of war and peace.

If these principles be correct, it remains to be considered how far the couduct of Mr. Pinto brings him within the range of their influence. It is clear that in the original concoction of the voyage it was his intentiou to avail himself of British convoy. The covenant in the charter-party demonstrates this intention; a covenant that, from its terms, being made by the ship-owner, must have been inserted for the benefit and at the instance of the charterer. Under the faith of this stipulation Mr. Pinto put his own property on board and received shipments from persons of an acknowledged hostile character. The ship sailed on the voyage, uuder British convoy, with Mr. Pinto on board, and though captured after a separation from the convoy, she was in the very attempt to rejoin it. There is no pretense, therefore, of an abandonment of 446] the convoy, and the corpus delicti*, the character of hostility, impressed by the sailing under convoy, if any attached, remained notwithstanding the separation. It is like the sailing for a blockaded port, where the offense continues, although at the moment of capture the ship be, by stress of weather, driven in a direction from the port of destination; for the hostile intention still remains unchanged.

Aud here, to avoid the effect of the general doctrine, we are met with another distinction founded upon the supposed difference between a belligerent and a neutral merchant ship as to the taking of convoy. It is argued that the belligerent ship has au undoubted right to take the protection of the convoy of the nation to which she belongs; and that this extends a perfect and lawful immunity to the neutral cargo on board.

It is certainly incumbent on the counsel for the claimant to support this exception to the general rule by precedent or analogy. Nothing has been offered which, in my judgment, affords it the slightest support. It is not true that a neutral can shelter his property from coufiscation behind an act lawful in a belligereut. The law imputes to the neutral the eonsequences of the act if he might have foreseen and guarded against it, or if he voluntarily adopts it. Was it ever supposed that a neutral cargo was protected from seizure by going in a belligerent ship to a blockaded port? or that contrabaud goods, belonging to a neutral, were exempted from confiscatiou because on board of such a ship bound on a voyage lawful to the belligerent, but not to the neutral? yet the pretensions in these cases seem scarcely more extravagant than that now urged. Why should a neutral be permitted to do that indirectly which he is prohibited from doing directly? Why should he aid the enemy by giving extraordinary freight for belligerent ships sailing under belligerent convoy with the avowed purpose of escaping from search, and often with the concealed intention of aiding belligerent commerce, and yet claim the benefits of the most impartial conduct? Until some more solid ground can be laid for the distinction than the ingenuity of counsel has yet suggested, it would seem fit to declare ita lex non scripta est.

But even if the distinction existed, it could not apply *to the case at bar. This is a [447 case where the claimant becomes the charterer of the whole vessel for the voyage and stipulates for the express benefit of convoy. The ship, though navigated by a belligerent master and crew, was necessarily under the control and management of the charterer. He was the real effective dux negotii. Whatever may be the technical doctrine of the common or prize law as to the general property in the ship, the charterer was, to all purposes important in this inquiry, the owner for the voyage, and the master his agent. Can there be a doubt that, as to the shipments of the enemy freighters, Mr. Pinto was responsible for the acts of the master? Was he not materially interested in the safety and protection of these shipments in respect to freight, commissions and profits? If they had been lost by capture, from the negligence of Mr. Pinto or of the master, when by ordinary diligence and resistance the loss might have been avoided, would not Mr. Pinto have been responsible? How, then, it can be consistently held that the ship was not essentially governed and managed by Mr. Pinto, aud all her conduct incorporated with his iuterests, I profess to be unable to comprehend. For what purpose should he insist ou a covenant for convoy, if he never meant to derive aid and protection from it to the whole cargo on board, aud to range himself and his interests on the side of resistance? His private conduct at the time of the capture, when resistance was almost hopeless, affords no evidence to repel the irresistible presumptions from his deliberate acts.

And here again it has been argued that Mr. Pinto had no hostile iuteutions against the United States; but that the taking of convoy was simply to resist the French aud Carthagenians, who are the euemies of his owu country. If such special intention could, in point of law, uphold his claim, which, for the reasons already stated, I am entirely satisfied it could not, yet there is not, in the present case, withiu my recollection, auy proof of such special inteution. It rests upon the mere suggestions of counsel. How, iudeed, could Mr. Pinto show that he meant to yield his property to the search of the cruisers of the United States, when the deliberate act of assuming British convoy precluded the possibility of its exercise, unless acquired by victory after resistance?

*If this view of the case be correct, [448 it must be pronounced that Mr. Pinto, by voluntarily sailing nnder couvoy, forfeited his neutrality, and bound his property to an indissolubly hostile character.

This, however, is not the only ground upon which the claim of Mr. Pinto ought to be repudiated. There was not merely the illegality of sailing under enemy convoy up to the very eve of capture, but the fact of actual resistance of the chartered ship, and submission to search only in consequence of superior force.

An attempt, however, is made to extract the case at bar from the penalty of confiscation attached to resistance of search, upon the ground that Mr. Pinto took no part in this resistance. It is asserted that a shipper in a general ship is not affected by the act of the enemy master; that the charterer of the whole ship is entitled to as favorable a consideration, and that there is no difference, in point of law, whether the ship have or have not a commission, or be or be not armed. It will be necessary to give to these positions a full examination.

In the first place, it is to be considered whether a neutral shipper has a right to put his property on board of an armed belligerent ship without violating his neutral duties. If the doctrine already advanced on the subject of convoy be correct, it is incontestible that he has no such right. If he cannot take belligerent convoy, a fortiori he cannot put his property on board of such convoy; or, what is equivalent, on board of an armed and commissioned ship of the belligerent. What would be the consequences if neutrals might lawfully carry on all their commerce in the frigates and ships of war of another belligerent sovereign? That there would be a perfect identity of interests and of objects, of assistance and of immunity, between the parties. The most gross frauds and hostile enterprises would be carried on under neutral disguises, and the right of search would become as utterly insignificant in practice as if it were extinguished by the common consent of nations. The extravagant premiums and freights which neutrals could well afford to pay for this extraordinary protection would enable the belligerent to keep up armaments of 449] incalculable *size, to the dismay and ruin of inferior maritime powers. Such false and hollow neutrality would be infinitely more injurious than the most active warfare. It would strip from the conqueror all the fruits of victory, and lay them at the feet of those whose singular merit would consist in evading his rights, if not in collusively aiding his enemy.

It is not, therefore, to be admitted that a neutral may lawfully place his goods under armed protection, on board of an enemy ship. Nor can it be at all material whether such armed ship be commissioned or not; that is an affair exclusively between a sovereign and his own subjects, but is utterly unimportant to the neutral. For whether the armament be employed for offense, or for defense, in respect to third parties, the peril and the obstruction to the right of search are equally complete. Nor is it true, as has been asserted in argument, that a non-commissioned armed ship has no right to capture an enemy ship, except in her own defense. The act of capture without such pretext, so far from being piracy, would be strictly justifiable upon the law of nations, however it might stand upon the municipal law of the country of the capturing ship. Vattel has been quoted to the contrary; but on a careful examination it will be found that his text does not warrant the doctrine.

I have had occasion to consider this point in another cause, in this court, and to the opinion then delivered I refer for a more full discussion of it. If the subject capture without a commission, he can acquire no property to himself in the prize; and if the act be contrary to the regulations of his own sovereign, he may be liable to municipal penalties for his conduct. But as to the enemy he violates no rights by the capture. Such, on an accurate consideration, will be found to be the doctrine of Puffendorf, and Grotius, and Bynkershoek, and they stand confirmed by a memorable decision of the Lords of Appeal, in 1759. (2 Brown's Civil and Adm. App., 524; Grotius, lib. 3, ch. 6, s. 8, 9, 10, and Barbeyrac's note on s. 8; Puffendorf, lib. 8, ch. 6, s. 21, &c.; Bynk. 2, P. J. ch. 3, 4, 16, 17; 2 Woodes. Lect., 432; Consol. del. Mare, ch. 287, 288; 4 Inst., 152, 154; Zouch Adm., 101; Casaregis Disc., 24 [n.] 24; Com. Dig. Admiralty, E; 3 Buls., e. 27.)

Admitting, however (what to me seems utterly inadmissible). *that a neutral may [450 lawfully ship his goods on board the armed ship of an enemy, it will be of little avail, unless he is exempted from the consequences of all the acts of such enemy. If the shipment be innocent, it will be of little avail in this case, if the resistance of the enemy master will compromit the neutral character of the cargo. To the establishment, therefore, of such an exemption, the exertions of counsel have been strenuously directed. It has been inferred from the silence of elementary writers, from the authority of analogous cases, and from the positive declarations of the court, in The Katherina Elizabeth (5 Rob., 206.)

The argument drawn from the silence of jurists has been already sufficiently answered. It remains to consider that which is urged upon the footing of authority. The reasoning from supposed analogous cases is quite as unsatisfactory. It is not true, as to neutrals, that the act of the master never binds the owner of the cargo unless the master is proved to be the actual agent of the owner. The act of the master may be, and very often is, conclusive upon the cargo, although no general agency is established. Suppose he violate a blockade, suppress and fraudulently destroy the ship's papers, or mix up under the same cover enemy interests, will not the cargo share the fate of the ship? The cases cited are mere exceptions to the general rule. They, in general, turn upon a settled distinction, that the act of the master shall not bind the cargo, where the act under the circumstances could not have been within the scope or contemplation of the shipper at the time of shipment; or where his ignorance of the voyage, and of the intended acts of the master, is placed beyond the possibility of doubt. (See The Adonis, 5 Rob., 256.) The very case of resistance is a strong illustration of the principle. The resistance of the neutral master has been deliberately held to be conclusive on the neutral cargo. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173; The Katharina Elizabeth 5 Rob., 206.) What reason can there be for a different rule in respect to a belligerent master?

It must be admitted that the language of the court in the case of The Katherina Elizabeth would at first view seem to support the position of the claimant's counsel. On a close examination, however, it will not be found to 451] *assert so broad a doctrine. The case was of a rescue attempted by an enemy master having on board a neutral cargo; and this rescue attempted, not of the captured, but of the capturing, ship. It was argued that this resistance of the master exposed the whole cargo entrusted to his management to confiscation. The court held that no such penalty was incurred. That the resistance could only be the hostile act of a hostile person who was a prisoner of war, and who, unless under parol, had a perfect right to emancipate himself by seizing his own vessel. That the case of a neutral master differed from that of an enemy master. No duty was violated by such an act on the part of the latter; lupum auribus teneo, and if he could withdraw himself he had a right so to do. And that a material fact in the case was, that the master did not attempt to withdraw his property, but to rescue the ship of the captor and not his own vessel. Such was the decision of the court, upon which several observations arise. In the first place the resistance was not made previous to the capture; and therefore whatever may be the extent of the language, it must be restrained to the circumstances of the case in judgment, otherwise it would be extrajudicial. In the next place it would be impossible to conceive how the fact, as to what vessel was seized, could be material, if the argument of the present claimant be correct, for in all events the resistance as to the cargo would be without any legal effects. In the last place it is clear that the case is put by the court upon the ground that the master at the time of the act had been dispossessed of his vessel by capture, and was a prisoner of war. He was therefore no longer acting as master of the ship, and had no further management of her. His rights and duties, as master, had entirely ceased by the capture, and there could be no pretense to affect the ship or cargo with his subsequent acts any more than with the acts of any other stranger. The case would have been entirely different with a neutral master, whose relation to his ship continues notwithstanding a capture and carrying in for adjudication. The case therefore admits of sound distinctions from that at bar, and cannot be admitted to govern it.

There is another text, not cited in the argument, which may be thought to favor the doctrine of the claimant's counsel. It is the only pas-452] sage bearing on the subject in *controversy which has fallen under my notice in any elementary work. Casaregis, in his commercial discourses (Disc., 24, [n.] 22) has the following remarks: "Verum tamen notandum est quod "si navis inimica onerata mercibus mercatorum "amicorum aggressa fuerit alteram inimicam et "mercatores aut domini mercium operam ac in-"dustriam dedissent pro ea aggredienda tunc "merces dominorum cadunt etiam sub præda, si "navis predicta onerata mercibus fuerit depræ-"data, &c., &c., et regulariter bona eorum qui "auxilium inimices nostris præstant vel confed-"erati cum iis sunt, prædari possunt." It is obvious that Casaregis is here considering the case of an attack of an enemy merchant ship, laden with a neutral cargo, upon the ship of its enemy, in which the former is unsuccessful and is captured. Under such circumstances he holds, that if the neutral shippers, or the persons having the management of the cargo (domini mercium), have aided in the attack, the cargo is forfeited, upon the ground that all who assist or confederate with an enemy are liable to be plundered by the law of war. He does not touch the case, where an enemy merchant ship simply makes resistance in her own defense, or resists the right of search; nor how far the master of such ship is the dominus mercium, or can by his own acts bind the cargo. Much less has he discussed the question as to what acts amount to an incorporation into the objects and interests of the enemy, so as to affix a hostile character. It does not seem to me that his text can be an authority beyond the terms in which it is expressed. It pronounces affirmatively that a co-operation in an attack will induce confiscation of the cargo (which cannot be doubted); but it does not pronounce negatively that the resistance of an enemy master will not draw after it the same penalty. And if it were otherwise, it would deserve consideration whether the opinion of a mere elementary writer, respectable as he may be, delivered at a time when the prize law was not as well settled as it has been in the present age, should be permitted to regulate the maritime rights of belligerent nations.

The argument, then, on the footing of authority, fails, for none is produced which directly points at circumstances like those in the case at bar. And upon principle it seems quite as difficult to support it. I am unable *to [453 perceive any solid foundation on which to rest a distinction between the resistance of a neutral and of an enemy master. The injury to the belligerent is in both cases equally great, for it equally withdraws the neutral property from the right of search, unless acquired by superior force. And until it is established that an enemy protection legally suspends the right of search, it cannot be that resistance to such right should not be equally penal in each party. I have, therefore, no difficulty in holding that the resistance of the ship is, in all cases, the resistance of the cargo, and that it makes no difference whether she be armed or unarmed, commissioned or uncommissioned. He who puts his property on the issue of battle must stand or fall by the event of the contest. The law of neutrality is silent when arms are appealed to in order to decide rights; and the captor is entitled to the whole prize won by his gallantry and valor. This opinion is not the mere inference, strong as it seems to me to be, of general reasoning. It is fortified by the consideration that in the earliest rudiments of prize law, in the great maritime countries of Great Britain and France, confiscation is applied by way of penalty for resistance of search to all vessels without any discrimination of the national character of the vessels or cargoes. The black book of the admiralty expressly articulates that any vessel making resistance may be attacked and seized as enemies; and this rule is enforced in the memorable prize instructions of Henry VIII. (Clerk's Praxis, 164, Rob. Collect. Marit., p. 10, and note, and p. 118.) The ordinance of France of 1584, is equally broad; and declares all such vessels good prize; and this has ever since remained a settled rule in the prize code of that nation.

Valin informs us that it is also the rule of Spain; and that in France it is applied as well to French vessels and cargoes as to those of neutrals and allies. (Coll. Marit. 118, Valin Traits des Prizes, ch. 5, § 8, p. 80.) There is not to be found in the maritime code of any nation, or in any commentary thereon, the least glimmering of authority that distinguishes, in cases of resistance, the fate of the cargo from that of the ship. If such a distinction could have been sustained, it is almost incredible that not a single ray of light should have beamed upon it during the long lapse of ages, in which mari-

454*] time warfare *has engaged the world. And if any argument is to be drawn from the silence of authority, I know not under what circumstances it can be more forcibly applied than against the exception now contended for.

But even if it were conceded that a neutral shipper in a general ship might be protected, the concession would not assist the present claimant. His interests were so completely mixed up and combined with the interests of the enemy; the master was so entirely his agent under the charter-party, that it is impracticable to extract the case from the rule that stamps Mr. Pinto with a hostile character. The whole commercial enterprise was radically tainted with a hostile leaven. In its very essence it was a fraud upon belligerent rights. If for a moment it could be admitted that a neutral might lawfully ship goods in an armed ship of an enemy, or might charter such a ship, and navigate her with a neutral crew, these admissions would fall far short of succoring the claimant. He must successfully contend for broader doctrines, for doctrines which, in my humble judgment, are of infinitely more dangerous tendency than any which Schlegel and Hubner, the champions of neutrality, have yet advanced into the field of maritime controversy. I cannot bring my mind to believe that a neutral can charter an armed enemy ship, and victual and man her with an enemy crew (for though furnished directly by the owner they are in effect paid and supported by the charterer), with the avowed knowledge and necessary intent that she should resist every enemy; that he can take on board hostile shipments on freight, commissions and profits; that he can stipulate expressly for the benefit and use of enemy convoy, and navigate during the voyage under its guns and protection; that he can be the entire projector and conductor of the voyage, and co-operate in all the plans of the owner to render resistance to search secure and effectual; and that yet, notwithstanding all this conduct, by the law of nations he may shelter his property from confiscation and claim the privileges of an inoffensive neutral. On the contrary, it seems to me that such conduct is utterly irreconcilable with the good faith of a friend, and unites all the qualities of the most odious hostility. It wears the habiliments of neutrality only when the sword and the armor of an enemy become 455*] *useless for defense. If it be, as it undoubtedly is, a violation of neutrality to engage in the transport service of the enemy, or to carry his dispatches even on a neutral voyage, how much more so must it be to enlist all our own interests in his service, and hire his arms and his crew in order to prevent the exercise of those rights which, as neutrals, we are bound to submit to? The doctrine is founded in most perfect justice, that those who adhere to an enemy connection shall share the fate of the enemy.

On the whole, in every view which I have been able to take of this subject, I am satisfied that the claim of Mr. Pinto must be rejected, and that his property is good prize to the captors. And in this opinion I am authorized to state that I have the concurrence of one of my brethren. It is matter of regret that in this conclusion I have the misfortune to differ from a majority of the court, for whose superior learning and ability I entertain the most entire respect. But I hold it an indispensable duty not to surrender my own judgment, because a great weight of opinion is against me—a weight which no one can feel more sensibly than myself. Had this been an ordinary case I should have contented myself with silence; but believing that no more important or interesting question ever came before a prize tribunal, and that the national rights suspended on it are of infinite moment to the maritime world, I have thought it not unfit to pronounce my own opinion, diffident indeed of its fullness and accuracy of illustration, but entirely satisfied of the rectitude of its principles.

In the sales of lots, in the city of Washington, the lots are not chargeable for their proportion of the internal alley laid out for the common benefit of those lots; although the practice so to charge them has been heretofore universally acquiesced in by purchasers; and if a purchaser has acquiesced in that practice and has received a conveyance accordingly, without objection, yet he does not thereby acquire a fee-simple in such proportion of the alley, and may, in equity, recover back the purchase money which he has paid therefor.

If a purchaser of city lots stipulates to build within a limited time, a house on every third lot purchased, or in that proportion, and receives conveyances for the greater part of the lots conveyed, he is not bound to build in proportion to the lots conveyed, unless the whole number be conveyed.

In a case where it would be difficult to ascertain the injury resulting from the breach of contract, or the sum in damages by which the injury might be compensated, this court will not themselves ascertain the injury nor the damages, nor direct an issue quantum damnificatus.

Where a contract for the sale of land has been in part executed by a conveyance of part of the land, and the vendor is unable the convey the residue, a court of equity will decree the repayment of a proportionate part of the purchase money with interest.

THESE several suits in chancery in the Circuit Court for the County of Washington, in the District of Columbia, being involved in each other and relating to the same property, were heard and argued as one cause.

The first of these suits, in the order of time, was that of Pratt and Others v. Duncanson and Ward, which was instituted on the 24th of March, 1801. The bill prayed that Duncanson and Ward might be enjoined from selling certain squares in the city of Washington, which had been mortgaged by Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, to Duncanson, to indemnify him against the return of certain bills of exchange which he had drawn for their accommodation, to the amount of £12,000 sterling, a part whereof, viz., £7,600, it was alleged, had been taken up by Ward, who claimed payment from Duncanson, and persuaded him to advertise the mortgaged property for sale. The bill alleged that although the bills had been taken up by Ward, he had done it as the agent of Greenleaf, one of the mortgageors, and with his funds; and 457] *prayed for general relief. The squares which were thus mortgaged to Duncanson were included in a previous mortgage to Thomas Law.

The next suit, in order of time, was that of Pratt and Others v. Thomas Law and William Campbell. The bill was filed on the 14th of December, 1804.

Its objects were to compel Law to release to the complainants, who were assignees of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, certain squares in the city of Washington, which had been mortgaged by them to secure to him the conveyance of certain lots and squares in the same city, which they had contracted to convey to him, and which he was to select from a larger number which they had purchased of the commissioners of the city; to compel Law to complete his selection; and to vacate certain releases made by him, at the solicitation of Campbell, who had attached the equity of redemption of some of the squares, which were included in the mortgage to Law.

The third suit, in the order of time, was that of Thomas Law v. Pratt and Others. The bill was filed on the 4th of October, 1805, and its object was to foreclose the mortgage given to secure to Law the conveyance of 2,400,000 square feet of land in the city of Washington, agreeably to a certain contract between him and Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf; because about 400,000 square feet, which Law contended he had selected agreeably to his contract, had not been conveyed to him.

The last of these suits, in the order of time, was that of William Campbell v. Pratt and Others (assignees of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf) and W. M. Duncanson and Samuel Ward. The bill was filed in June, 1806, and was in the nature of a bill of interpleader. Its object was to obtain a release from Duncanson of the mortgage given to him by Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, to indemnify him against the return of certain bills of exchange drawn by him for their accommodation, and which Campbell alleged had been taken up by them, or some of them; which release, if made, would enure to the benefit of Campbell, inasmuch as he had attached, and under the proceedings upon the attachment, had *purchased Morris & [458 Nicholson's equity of redemption.

In order to understand the argument of counsel, and the opinion of the court, it may be necessary to state more minutely the allegations of the parties.

The bill of Pratt and others against Law and Campbell stated that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, on the 3d of December, 1794, gave to the defendant, Thomas Law, their bond with condition to convey to him in fee-simple within 90 days from that date, "2,400,000 square "feet of land in the city of Washington, the "said Law having paid them the sum of five "pence Pennsylvania currency per square foot, "for the same."

That on the 4th of December, 1794 (the day after the date of the bond), a written agreement was executed between the same parties, by which (after reciting the bond) Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf covenanted that if Law should, within 18 months, be displeased with his purchase, they would return him the purchase money, with interest, at the expiration of that term. And Law covenanted that if within the same term he should finally determine to keep the land, he would, within 4 years from the time of such determination, cause to be built on every third lot, or in that proportion, one brick dwelling-house, or other brick building, at least two stories high; the lots were supposed to average 5,265 square feet each. The bill further charges that Law did, within the limited time, elect to keep the land, and thereby became liable to build the houses mentioned in the agreement of the 4th of December, 1794, but had not built them. That on the 10th of March, 1795, the parties entered into another agreement, by which Law was "to have his "selection under his contract of the 4th of "December last, in all squares in which the "said Morris & Greenleaf have a right of selec-"tion, excepting water property, and except-"ing such squares as are now appropriated, or "respecting which the said Morris, Nicholson

" & Greenleaf have made arrangements, a list " of which squares is hereunto annexed." By the same agreement Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf covenanted to mortgage to Law other squares and lots which were then in their pos-
459*] session, until they could give him *a good title to such property as he might select; Law agreed to give up his right to return the property, and thereby made the purchase absolute. He also agreed to select by squares and not by lots, and to close his selection within 90 days from the date of the agreement, and stipulated that the houses which he was to build should be such houses as Morris & Greenleaf were obliged to build by contract with the commissioners.

The bill further states that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, agreeably to that contract, on the 4th of September, 1795, mortgaged to Law 857 lots, and 3,333 square feet of land, the condition of which mortgage was, that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf should pay the penalty of the bond, or, agreeably to its condition and to the contract of the 10th of March, 1795, convey to Law, in fee-simple, with general warranty, 2,400,000 square feet in the city of Washington.

That Law selected about 2,000,000 square feet, but in making his selections violated his agreement of the 10th of March, 1795, by selecting lots in squares from which he was excluded by that agreement, to the injury of Greenleaf, who never assented to such selection.

That Law had obtained titles to about 2,000,000 of square feet, and that there remain to be conveyed to him about 400,000 square feet, when he shall have complied with his contract of selection, and when he shall have built the stipulated number of houses.

That on the 13th of May, 1796, Greenleaf conveyed to Robert Morris and John Nicholson all his interest in the city of Washington, excepting three squares, "and excepting all " such lots, lands or tenements as were either " conveyed or sold, or agreed to be conveyed " by all or either of them, the said Greenleaf, " Morris and Nicholson, or any of their agents " or attorneys to any person prior to the 10th of " July, 1795."

That on the 26th of June, 1797, Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf conveyed all their interest in the city of Washington to Pratt and others, the present complainants.

460*] *That Law, knowing the complainants' interest in the property, and with intent to injure the complainants, and to benefit the defendant, Campbell, on the 4th of September and 5th of October, 1797, executed two deeds releasing to Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf part of the mortgaged property, which had been attached by Campbell; which releases were executed by Law with a full knowledge of the interest of the complainants in the mortgaged property; in defiance of their express prohibition; and with a fraudulent intent to vest the legal estate in Morris & Nicholson so as to give effect to the attachment of Campbell. That Campbell had engaged to indemnify Law for that act. That the releases were executed without the knowledge or consent of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, or either of them, and were never delivered to them or either of them, but were put on record by Law. The complainants pray that those deeds of release may be vacated and annulled. They state that they are ready, able, and willing, to carry into effect the contracts between Law and Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, and to do everything that in justice and equity ought to be done on their part; but that Law has refused and neglected to build the houses, and to make his selection within the time limited, and out of the squares prescribed; has violated his contract in setting up a claim and keeping the property mortgaged as a collateral security for making him titles to property, which titles he has prevented by refusing to select the property, &c.

The bill requires Campbell to state when, from whom, and at what price he obtained the notes of Morris & Nicholson, upon which his attachment was issued; and prays for general relief.

The answer of Law admits that he had received conveyances for "about 2,000,000 of square feet of ground under the contract, but not within the time stipulated;" it states the number and kind of houses which he had built; denies that he was bound to receive conveyances with a condition to build, the building contract being independent of the contract to convey the land. It states that he was induced to enter into the building contract, by the contract which Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf had entered into with the commissioners and others to build *a large number of [461 houses, which contract it avers they never complied with.

It states, also, that Morris & Nicholson assigned Law's building contract to the commissioners of the city, and that the present complainants are not the assignees thereof, nor have any interest therein; and that if they had, their remedy is at law and not in equity.

With regard to the releases of September and October, 1797, he says that the mortgaged property was more than ample security; that Morris & Nicholson were in 1797 generally deemed bankrupts; that their creditors were suing out attachments, and he thought it unjust to keep covered, by his mortgage, from fair creditors, a property so much more than enough to secure his demands, and therefore executed those releases. He admits that Campbell gave him a bond of indemnity, but denies that he received any compensation. He admits also that one of the complainants desired him not to execute them; but he disregarded the request.

Exceptions having been taken to this answer, Mr. Law filed an amended answer, in which he insists that he was released from his building contract because he had not received titles for all the lots he had purchased; or that, as he had originally four years from the date of the contract to complete his buildings, and was to have had his titles in 90 days, he ought to be allowed four years from the time of receiving his titles. He affirms that he made his selection within the time limited by his contract, and exhibits a copy thereof. He avers that by the contract of March 10th, 1795, he had a right to select as well from the property which Greenleaf had contracted to purchase in his own name from D. Carroll as from that which Morris & Greenleaf had contracted to purchase from the commissioners of the city. That on the 14th of March, 1796, after much trouble and vexation, he received his first conveyance of a part of his lots, amounting to 773,122¼ square feet, to obtain which he had to release to Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf a part of the mortgaged property, viz., squares No. 465, 468, 469, 470, 495 and 498. He avers that any variation which may appear between his original selection and the squares afterwards conveyed to him, was 462] *occasioned by the slow compliance on the part of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf with their contracts with Carroll and the commissioners. He states that they gave him full liberty to make another selection of any lots within their purchases or contracts, and refers to Morris & Nicholson's letter to him of the 17th of September, 1796, in which they say: "You may select by squares out of any "that within our selection, although not "chosen by you already, except water prop- "erty, or where we have since your selection or "before improved on or contracted for the sale "of that which you desire; and we wish you "now to name the squares, as the selection and "titles shall be completed for you without "delay."

That in consequence of that letter he made another selection including other squares, and on the 20th of July, 1797, received another conveyance of lots from the commissioners containing 1,142,068¾ square feet. That he also received a deed dated January 28th, 1797, directly from Morris & Nicholson, for 128,223 square feet, the title to which has since been decided by the chancellor of Maryland, not to have been in them but the commissioners of the city.

He also states that after receiving these three conveyances "he had selected to have the resi- "due of what was due conveyed to him out of "the half of square 743, square 699, and square "696, containing 314,829½ square feet, which, "if the deed of January 28th, 1797, had re- "mained good would have been near the quota "to which he was entitled; but the said "squares, or the proper portion thereof never "were conveyed, though the said Morris & "Nicholson frequently promised so to do. "That the said squares were a part of the "property which they had contracted to pur- "chase of the said Carroll according to their "contract of the 26th of September, 1793," (a copy of which is exhibited and appears to be a contract by Greenleaf alone, with Carroll.) He refers to a letter from Morris & Nicholson to him of the 19th of March, 1797, in which they say: "We are equally anxious with you to get "Mr. Carroll paid on his (Mr. Carroll's) ac- "count, upon our account, and upon your own "account; and yet with all this anxiety we do "not agree to sign the articles, which were 463] *"handed us yesterday; our objections "thereto will be filed. But to make your "mind at ease on the subject of the property "to be conveyed to you by Mr. Carroll, and "ours at ease about getting our property re- "leased from your mortgage, which it then "ought to be, we propose to enter into a con- "tract, with penalty, with you, to fix a limited "time within which the money shall be tend- "ered to Mr. Carroll, say in six weeks, and on "your part to covenant therein, that upon so "doing you will release to us our mortgage "when Mr. Carroll makes the titles." He refers also to a letter from Mr. Morris to him of the 21st of June, 1797, in which Mr. Morris says: "I am in pursuit of money for Mr. Carroll "and expect success, but I hope, when it "comes, he will not plague himself, and em- "barrass us by a refusal of it. He ought to "have had his money, and I have always "lamented that we could not pay it when due, "but certainly we will pay as soon as we "can."

The answer then avers that Morris & Nicholson never paid the purchase money due to Mr. Carroll, nor in any other respect complied with the contract with him, whereby they forfeited all right to the purchase of the property therein mentioned, and disabled themselves from conveying to the defendant, Law, the property he had so selected. That one of the purposes of the deed of assignment under which the complainants claim title, was to pay Mr. Carroll $13,000 due upon that contract, whereby it became their duty to pay that sum so as to obtain titles for the defendant, Law; but they never did pay that sum to Mr. Carroll, and it is not now in their power to comply specifically with the contract between the defendant, Law, and Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf.

To this answer exceptions were also taken, and the complainants, Pratt and others, filed an amended bill, in which they contend that the defendant, Law, had not made his selection in due time and manner according to the original contract; that, therefore, the complainants might now satisfy the balance of the contract by a conveyance of such lots as they should deem proper; and under that idea had tendered to Mr. Law a conveyance for the quantity of land which he had a right to claim.

*That by the original contract Mr. [464 Law had a right to select only out of the property which Morris & Greenleaf had contracted to purchase from the commissioners; for that was the only contract which gave them a right of selection.

The complainants also contended that if, upon Mr. Law's failure to select his lots within the time limited, the right of selection did not revert to Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, yet he was bound to close his selection in a reasonable time, and before Morris & Nicholson had completed their selection under the contract of Morris & Greenleaf with the commissioners; and that, after closing their selection, they were not bound to convey to Mr. Law any lots not selected by them, or not before that time selected by him and notified to them. They admit that although Mr. Law had forfeited his right of selection, yet Morris & Nicholson, being desirous of gratifying him, and of stimulating him to make the stipulated improvements, caused to be conveyed to him, by deeds dated the 14th of March, 1796, and the 20th of July, 1797, 1,935,008 square feet of land, without annexing thereto the condition of building which they had a right to insist upon, including therein sundry lots not within his right of selection, whereby he obtained more valuable lots, and on better terms than he was entitled to under his contracts.

They aver that they are the bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf's equity of redemption in the mortgaged property, without notice of any agreements or transactions between them and the said Law, other than those which appear on the face of the bond of the 3d of December, 1794, the agreement of the 4th of December, 1794, that of March 10th, 1795, and the mortgage of the 4th of September, 1795; and are not in equity bound by any other agreement, if any such exist.

They further state that the legal estate of the mortgaged premises never was in Morris & Nicholson, or either of them, but was in Greenleaf alone. That after Greenleaf had sold to Morris & Nicholson his interest in the Washington lots, being largely their creditor, he caused all their property in the city to be attached by process, 465] *issued under the laws of Maryland, on the 21st of April, 1797, which attachment was for the benefit of the complainants, and was laid on the same property which on the following day was attached at the suit of the defendant, Campbell, which attachment, in favor of Greenleaf, was continued until and after the 26th of June, 1797, when Morris & Nicholson assigned and transferred to the complainants, for a valuable consideration, all the attached property; whereupon Greenleaf's attachment was dismissed by consent of the parties, inasmuch as the complainants had, by the assignment, obtained all the benefit which they could have obtained by prosecuting the attachment to judgment of condemnation. They aver, therefore, that if the defendant, Campbell, had any equitable claim to the property by virtue of his attachment, the complainants have a prior equitable claim by virtue of their prior attachment.

But they aver also that neither Morris nor Nicholson ever had such an estate in the mortgaged premises as could be the subject of an attachment at law, or as could be condemned at law, or as could be seized and sold under a fieri facias; and that the defendant, Campbell, had notice of the complainants' legal and equitable title when he purchased the property.

That if Morris & Nicholson had any equitable interest therein, it was subject to the duty of doing justice to Greenleaf, the legal proprietor, by paying all they owed him, before the trust as to them would be decreed to be performed; and if they had an equity of redemption in the mortgaged lots, and if anything was seized, condemned and sold, under the said Campbell's attachment, it could be only the right which Morris & Nicholson had to redeem the said lots, by conveying to Mr. Law the balance of property due to him, and by satisfying all equitable claims which Greenleaf had upon them. And that if the complainants should be compelled to convey to Mr. Law the balance of property which he claims, the defendant, Campbell, can have no right to the lots as against the complainants until he shall have satisfied them for all the property which they shall have been so 466] compelled to convey to the *defendant, Law, and shall also have satisfied all equitable claims of Greenleaf upon Morris & Nicholson.

The claimants further state that they have been informed and believe that the attachments of the defendant, Campbell, were founded upon notes of Morris & Nicholson, purchased upon speculation at market, and at a price far below their nominal value; and they contend that Campbell could not, in equity, recover, even if he had a prior lien upon the lots, more than the bona fide actual value which he gave for the notes, with legal interest thereon. They call upon him to state what consideration he gave for the notes; and at what price he purchased in the mortgaged lots at the sale under the fi. fa. issued upon the judgment on his attachments.

The answer of the defendant, Campbell, disclaims all benefit and title under or by virtue of the releases executed by the defendant, Law, at his request; but claims to hold entirely under the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland upon his attachments; and refers to his bill of interpleader (as he terms it), and the transcript of the record of the Court of Appeals of Maryland exhibited therewith; by which transcript it appears that the attachments were issued on the 21st of April, 1797, by virtue of the act of assembly of Maryland, of 1795, ch. 56, entitled "a supplement to the act entitled an act directing the manner of suing out attachments in this province and limiting the extent of them;" and commanded the sheriff "to attach, seize, take and safe keep all the lands, "tenements, goods, chattels and credits," of Robert Morris, which should be found in his bailiwick, "to the value of, as well the damages aforesaid, as," &c.; and to have the same before the judges of the General Court, &c.; then and there to be condemned, according to the act of assembly aforesaid, to the use of the said W. Campbell, unless the said Robert Morris should appear and answer to the said William Campbell in a plea of trespass on the case, &c., according to law. The sheriff was also commanded to make known to the garnishees that they appear, &c., to show cause why the lands, tenements, &c., should not be condemned, and execution thereof had and made as in other cases of recoveries and judgments given in courts of record according to the directions of the act of assembly *aforesaid, &c. The [467 like process was issued against the property of Mr. Nicholson.

On the 22d of April, 1797, the sheriff levied these attachments on part of the property included in the mortgage to Law, and particularly set forth in the sheriff's return.

On the return of these attachments, Morris & Nicholson appeared by attorney, and upon argument, the General Court quashed the sheriff's return; whereupon Campbell took a bill of exceptions, which stated that the plaintiff, Campbell, offered in evidence the deed of the 13th of May, 1796, from Greenleaf to Morris & Nicholson, whereby Greenleaf conveyed to them all his property in the city of Washington, excepting 3 squares, "and excepting all such squares, "lots, lands and tenements as were either con-"veyed or sold, or agreed to be conveyed either "by all or either of them, the said Morris, Ni-"cholson & Greenleaf, or any of their agents "prior to the 10th of July, 1795." That Campbell prayed condemnation of one moiety of certain squares, particularly described, as the property of Morris, and the other moiety as the property of Mr. Nicholson. That Morris & Nicholson offered in evidence the mortgage to Mr. Law of the 4th of September, 1795, which included those squares; and that Campbell offered in evidence one of the releases of Mr. Law, dated the 5th of October, 1797, to Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, which are mentioned in the bill of Pratt and others v. Law and Campbell, Morris & Nicholson then offered in evidence the deed of trust from Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf to the complainants, Pratt and others, of the 26th of June, 1797, conveying to them all the right and interest of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf in the city of Washington; and proved that the aforesaid deed of release from Mr. Law to Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf was lodged by Mr. Law alone, in the proper office to be recorded; and that it was executed by Mr. Law with a knowledge of the aforesaid deed of trust to the complainants, against their will and express prohibition, and without the knowledge or assent of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, or either of them; whereupon the 468] General Court of Maryland was *of opinion that neither Morris & Nicholson, nor either of them, had "such an estate in those "squares, whereof the plaintiff could have "judgment of condemnation."

Upon this bill of exceptions the cause was carried to the Court of Appeals of Maryland, who reversed the judgment of the General Court "as to the land contained in the return "of the sheriff of Prince George's County;" and adjudged "that the lands and tenements so "as aforesaid attached, that is to say," (&c., describing them), "be condemned towards sat- "isfying unto the said William Campbell, as "well the said sum of;" &c., "and that the "said W. Campbell have thereof execution," &c. . "Whereupon execution issued from the "Court of Appeals, returnable to the General "Court." This execution was a special fieri facias, which after reciting the attachment, the sheriff's return, the judgment of the General Court, the writ of error, and the judgment of the Court of Appeals, commands the sheriff of Prince George's County, that of the lands and tenements attached (describing the squares, &c.) he cause to be made the damages and costs, &c.

Upon this execution the sheriff sold the attached property to W. Campbell, the plaintiff, for a comparatively small sum.

Under these proceedings the defendant, Campbell, in his answer contends that, by the laws and constitution of Maryland, his title and interest in the said lots is conclusive upon all the world, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland cannot be opened. He admits, however, that he acquired by those proceedings no more interest or title than Morris & Nicholson had in the property at the time of the attachment, and that Mr. Law's mortgage was a prior incumbrance; but denies that there is any other lien or incumbrance thereon. He contends that he has a right to redeem the lots from that mortgage on any terms which should be agreed upon between him and Mr. Law. He affirms that the complainants knew of his attachment when they took their deed of assignment of the property. He denies that the complainants had any valid attachment prior to his. He admits that Morris & Nicholson had 469] only an *equitable title in the lots at the time of his attachment. He admits that he knew of the assignment to the complainants when Mr. Law executed his release, and at the time he purchased the property under his attachment.

He demurred to so much of the bill as charged that he purchased the notes of Morris & Nicholson (upon which the attachment issued) on speculation, at a low price, and to so much as required him to state what consideration he paid therefor. To this answer the complainants excepted, because the defendant, Campbell, did not answer that part of the bill to which he demurred.

The bill of Law against Pratt and others, stated the bond of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf of the 3d December, 1794, to convey to him 2,400,000 square feet of ground in the city of Washington; the agreement of the 10th of March, 1795; and the mortgage of the 4th of September, 1795. That he had received conveyances for 773,121¼ square feet on the 14th of March, 1796; for 1,142,068¼ square feet on the 20th July, 1797; and for 128,223 square feet by a subsequent conveyance, the title of which last-mentioned quantity was defective. That Morris & Nicholson, having obtained all the right, title, and interest of all the joint property of M., N. & G. in the city of Washington, in the year 1797 became insolvent, and conveyed the same to the defendants, Pratt and others. That neither M., N. & G. nor the defendants, Pratt and others, did procure from the commissioners of the city of Washington a good, clear, and sufficient title to the property, out of which the complainant, Law, had the right of selection; so that although he made his selection, and requested a conveyance of the remaining 400,000 square feet, the defendants refused to convey the same, and are unable to comply with the engagements of M., N. & G. with him. Wherefore he prays a decree that they should pay him the original purchase money of five pence, Pennsylvania currency, per square foot for the amount of square feet unconveyed, with interest, from the 3d December, 1794, by a certain day; and in default thereof, that they should be foreclosed of their equity of redemption; and for general relief.

The joint and several answer of the defendants, Pratt *and others, admits the [470 bond of 3d December, 1794, the agreement of the 10th of March, 1795, and the mortgage of the 4th of September, 1795, which, it is averred, was executed to remedy a defect in a former mortgage of the 11th May, 1795. The defendants also produce the agreement of the 4th of December, 1794. They admit that the complainant, Law, had received good titles to 1,915,189¾ square feet in part compliance with the condition of the bond; and that the title to the 128,223 square feet was defective. They admit that M., N. & G. became insolvent and conveyed all their interest to these defendants as trustees for certain creditors.

They do not admit that either they or M., N. & G. were ever bound to procure a good title to all the property out of which the complainant had a right to select, nor that he made his selection within the time limited by the contract of the 10th of March, 1795; nor that they, or M., N. & G., ever refused to convey to him any property which he had a right to demand under those agreements.

They say that they have been informed and believe that the complainant, Law, never made a definite and final selection of lots to satisfy the condition of the bond; but, without authority or limitation of time, assumed the right of varying his choice from time to time according as circumstances indicated a prospect of increasing value, and did not confine himself to the property, nor to the terms contained in the contract of the 10th of March, 1795. They admit, however, that Morris & Nicholson, as a matter of indulgence, acquiesced in the selections thus made, as far as they had the ability to convey the lots so selected.

They contend that upon the complainant's having failed to make his selection within the limited time, the right to select reverted to M., N. & G., and that the complainants, as their assignees, had a right to select and tender a conveyance for the balance remaining unconveyed; and that they had done so, but the complainant refused to accept the same.

They contend also that the complainant is not entitled to relief in equity, until he shall 471] have complied with *his agreement to build certain houses according to the agreements of the 4th of December, 1794, and 10th of March, 1795; and they aver that the damage they have sustained by reason of his not having built the houses exceeds the value of the property remaining to be conveyed to him.

They claim the benefit of his releases of certain parts of the mortgaged property, dated March 11th, 1796; September 4th and October 5th, 1797, copies of which they exhibit; and,

They deny, in general terms, that the mortgage is forfeited or the condition thereof broken.

After replication to this answer, the complainant, Law, filed an amended bill stating in substance the same matters which are contained in his answers to the bill of Pratt and others against him.

To this amended bill the defendants, Pratt and others, filed their answer, referring to the proceedings in all the causes before mentioned, and praying that the whole may be considered as one cause. They aver that the building contract constituted a material part of the consideration in the sale of lots to the complainant; that the assignment of that contract to the commissioners of the city, by Morris & Nicholson, was not valid, and did not exonerate the complainant from his obligation in equity to perform it. They proceed to state with more minuteness the facts and transactions stated in their original and amended bills against Law and Campbell.

They deny that Morris & Nicholson could authorize the complainant to make a new selection so as to embarrass the mortgaged property, or to disable themselves from complying with the terms of the mortgage, whereby subsequent incumbrancers, whose rights accrued before such new selection, could be defeated.

They deny, also, that they are bound by any agreements between the complainant and M. & N., of which they had not notice at the time of the assignment to these defendants.

472*] *The complainant having in his amended bill stated that he had solicited to have the residue of what was due to him conveyed out of half of square 743, square 699, square 696, square 730, and the square north of 697, the defendants in that answer deny his right to select either of those squares. As to the square 743, which is the only one in which Morris & Greenleaf ever held any definite interest, they aver that all their interest therein, consisting of one moiety thereof, has been conveyed to him. That as to the square 696 and 730, the complainant was expressly prohibited from selecting them by the contract of the 10th of March, 1795; and that neither of the squares 699, 730, 696, and north of 697 are mentioned in the complainant's selection of December 5th, 1795, nor in any former selection pretended to have been made by him; that neither of those squares ever belonged to M., N. & G. or either of them, nor are included in the 6,000 lots bought by Morris & Greenleaf of the commissioners, or have been apportioned to them or either of them, or can of right be claimed by them, or either of them, under any contract.

To this answer there was a general replication.

The bill of Pratt and others against Duncanson and Ward was originally filed to obtain an injunction to prevent Duncanson from selling certain squares which he had advertised for sale under a mortgage dated the 12th of September, 1795, given to him by Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf to indemnify him against the return of certain bills of exchange which he had drawn for their accommodation for £12,000 sterling, £7,600 sterling of which had been taken up by the defendant, Ward, with the funds of Greenleaf, and the residue by Greenleaf himself; and to obtain a conveyance of those squares to the complainants who were the assignees of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf's equity of redemption. Those squares were all included in the prior mortgage to Thomas Law.

After Duncanson and Ward had filed their answers, and testimony had been taken in the cause, by which it appeared that the facts stated in the bill were true, William Campbell filed a bill against all the parties to the cause, viz., Pratt and others, assignees of Morris, *Nicholson & Greenleaf, and Duncan- [473 son and Ward, in which bill (which he calls a bill of interpleader) he sets forth his attachment of the squares included in the mortgage to Duncanson, the condemnation thereof by the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland (while the city of Washington was under the jurisdiction of Maryland), the fieri facias issued upon that judgment, and his purchase of the squares at the sheriff's sale; whereby he avers he acquired the equity of redemption of those squares. He states that the bills mentioned in the mortgage had all been discharged by Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, or one of them, or with their funds, and the property thereby exonorated; and prays for a conveyance thereof to him, and for general relief.

The defendants, Pratt and others, in their answer, admit that they have heard that the complainant, Campbell, claims the lots mentioned in his bill, by virtue of a pretended judgment of condemnation upon certain pretended attachments issued upon certain pretended claims against Morris & Nicholson; but they deny the validity of those claims and of all proceedings founded thereon; and aver that if any such judgments of condemnation have been obtained, they were obtained, as they believe, by fraud and imposition practiced upon the court rendering such judgments, by producing to such court certain pretended deeds of release fraudulently executed by Thomas Law (meaning the releases mentioned in the bill of Pratt and others v. Law and Campbell). They aver that they were not parties to such judgments, and cannot be bound thereby. That the proceedings exhibited by the complainant appear to be proceedings at law, and not in equity; and therefore, that if the complainant has any title under those proceedings, it must be a title at law, and his remedy is at law and not in equity; and that no proceeding by these defendants against Duncanson and Ward in equity can injure the complainant's title at law, if any he has. They therefore deny his right to relief in equity, and contend that the court, as a court of equity, has not jurisdiction in the case stated by the complainant in his bill. They do not admit that any valid attachment was laid on the property before the assignment from M., N. & G. to them. They aver that on the day before the date of Campbell's attachment, Green-474*] leaf, being a large creditor *of Morris & Nicholson, caused attachments in his name, but for the use of these defendants, to be laid on the same property; which attachments remained in full force (if the property was liable to attachment for the debts of Morris & Nicholson) until and after their assignment of their interest therein to these defendants, when they, having by the assignment obtained all the benefit which they could have obtained by prosecuting the attachments to judgment of condemnation and sale, caused the attachments to be dismissed. And therefore that if Campbell could claim any title in equity under his attachments, these defendants have a prior claim in equity by virtue of their prior attachments, and the assignment from Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf. They deny that the legal title was ever in Morris & Nicholson, or either of them, but was in Greenleaf alone, until conveyed to Thomas Law by the mortgage of the 4th of September, 1795, in whom it remained until his releases of the 4th of September, and 5th of October, 1797, which releases, if valid, enured to the benefit of these defendants.

As to certain squares contained in the mortgage to Duncanson, viz., the square east of 546, the square east of 547, the squares 549 and 596, the square east of 596, and the square 597, they aver that long before Campbell's pretended attachment, viz., on the 20th of June, 1796, Morris & Nicholson conveyed to the said Greenleaf all their interest therein for a valuable consideration, since which time M. & N. have never had any interest therein.

They aver that the complainant had notice of all these facts at the time of his purchase at the sheriff's sale under his attachment.

They contend also that if the complainant could, by any process at law, attach the equity of redemption, yet he can have no remedy in equity, unless he has offered and can show himself able to redeem the property by a compliance with the contract between Law and M., N. & G., which he has not done.

They say they have heard, and believe that the complainant's pretended attachments were 475*] founded on notes *of M. & N. purchased in market at a great discount as an object of speculation, with a view to take the chance of such an attachment; and they are advised that if the complainant should in equity have a prior lien on the property, he could not claim, in equity (as against these defendants who are bona fide creditors of Morris & Nicholson, and purchasers of their equity of redemption for a valuable consideration, and who are seeking for satisfaction out of the same fund) more than the amount of money actually paid by the complainant for the said notes and bills, with lawful interest thereon.

One of the defendants, John Miller, Junior, assignee of Greenleaf under the bankrupt law of the United States, answering separately, for himself, states that the bills for £12,000 sterling, in the bill mentioned, were sold and the proceeds thereof equally divided between Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, each of whom were bound in equity, as well as by agreement, to take up one-third of the amount if they should come back protested. That they did come back protested; that Morris & Nicholson wholly failed to take up any part thereof, but the whole was paid by Greenleaf with his own separate funds, and that Morris & Nicholson are still indebted to him for two-thirds of the amount of the £12,000 sterling, with interest, charges, damages and costs of protest, and were also otherwise largely indebted to him at the time of the attachment. That upon taking up the bills, Greenleaf informed Duncanson thereof and forbade him to release the mortgage, on his intimating a design so to do, and requested him to retain the same as a security to him (Greenleaf) for the two-thirds of the amount of the said bills, which Duncanson agreed to do; and thereby became in equity a trustee of the mortgage for the benefit of Greenleaf; and this defendant, as his assignee, claims a right to stand on the same equitable ground as Duncanson would have stood upon if the bills had not been taken up, so far as respects two-thirds of the amount of the bills, with damages, &c., and therefore to have a prior equity to that of the complainant, if any he has.

There was evidence tending to show that Mr. Law made a selection of squares within the time stipulated. And that the public property in those squares which Morris & [ 476 Greenleaf had contracted to purchase of the commissioners, was more than sufficient to satisfy Mr. Law's contract. That the commissioners had conveyed to him about 2,000,000 of square feet; and that it was probable they would have conveyed the remaining 400,000 square feet, also at the same time, if Mr. Law would have taken them out of the squares contained in his first selection. No tender, however, was made to him of the balance out of those squares, and there was evidence that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf had acquiesced in Mr. Law's claim to have part of the property which Greenleaf had contracted to purchase of Mr. Carroll, although neither Greenleaf nor Morris & Greenleaf ever had any right of selection in that property. There was also evidence that it was the universal practice of the commissioners, in selling lots, to charge each lot with its proportion of the alley laid out for the general benefit of the lots in the squares; and that such practice had been universally acquiesced in.

With regard to the opinion of the Court of Appeals of Maryland upon the subject of Campbell's attachment, there was evidence that the counsel for Morris & Nicholson had written a letter to Judge Rumsey, the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, requesting to know the extent and ground of the opinion of the court upon which the judgment was rendered; and received from him the following answer:

"The Court of Appeals signed a regular "judgment under their hands. It does not con- "tain the point upon which they gave it; but "my brethern thought the covenant for a quiet "enjoyment[1] was a lease for years, which was "an interest subject to attachment, and this in- "fluenced their judgment and they gave it ac- "cordingly. The opinion (whether a fee-sim- "ple, or an estate for years) will not alter the "nature of the judgment, which, in my opinion, "will be only of such interest as the party had "in the estate, and, if tried in ejectment, can "only operate so far. I own, privately I was "of opinion that an attachment ought to lie "against a mortgageor's interest, because he is 477] "considered, in chancery, as the *owner; "because I would not send a man to chancery "in so plain a case where there ought to have "been conformity in law; and becausc all men "would secure themselves under this artifice. "This, also, was agreeable to the practice of the "city of London, where an equitable interest is "attachable. But on this the judges gave no "opinion. Sufficient to them was it, that in "their opinion any interest was attachable, and "upon ejectment this would have been dis- "closed.

"In conformity to my opinion I pointed out "a case or two, that was in my common place "book, to Mr. Shaaff, that indicated an equita- "ble interest attachable.

"But this was done as an individual, not as "a judge; but, being at the time of judgment, "he might have mistaken. At the same time "I remarked, and do so now, that the dis- "tresses of my family and my own state of "health were such that I could not be so much "master of the subject as I wished.

"You were wrong in delaying opening the "points so long, in which you obliged the "court to give a judgment so late in the cause. "And wherein is their judgment (hastily ob- "tained) better than that of other courts? It "quite destroys the use of a court of the last "resort.

"I have opposed, I shall hereafter oppose, "this practice totis viribus, ergo caveto.

"There is no impropriety in asking the "court's opinion; they always wish their senti- "ments to be known; and will, I hope, in a "land of law and liberty, always be willing to "disclose them when required.

"I am, &c.

"1st March, 1801."

These causes having been heard together as one cause, the court below decreed as follows:

In the case of Pratt and others v. Law and Campbell, that the complainants' bill be dismissed.

478*] *In the case of Law v. Pratt and others, that the defendants should pay to the complainant on or before the 1st of April, 1814, $25,832.88, being the original purchase money for the part not conveyed, with interest from the 3d of December, 1794, and in default thereof, that the mortgaged property should be sold to raise the same, &c.

In the case of Pratt and others v. Duncanson and Ward, no decree appears to have been made.

In the case of Campbell v. Pratt and others (assignees of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf), and Duncanson and Ward, the defendants, Duneanson and Ward, never answered the bill, nor was it taken for confessed against them, nor was the bill dismissed or abated as to them, but the court below decreed "that the defend- ants," Pratt and others, "and William M. "Duncanson, and Samuel Ward, release, con- "vey and transfer to the complainant, Wil- "liam Campbell, all their interest and estate in "the squares and lots of land sold under the "complainant's attachment, as mentioned and "set forth in his bill; and that the said "complainant, his heirs and assigns, be for- "ever quieted in the title, possession, and en- "joyment of said squares and lots, against all "the claims, interest and estate of the said de- "fendants."

From these decrees Pratt and others appealed to this court.

The cases were argued at great length by Jones and P. B. Key for the appellants, and by J. Law, F. S. Key and Pinkney for the appellees, Law and Campbell.

In the case of Law v. Pratt and others, the argument turned almost entirely upon questions of fact.

In the cases of Pratt and others v. Law and Campbell, and Campbell v. Pratt and others, and Ward and Duncanson, the following questions were made:

1. Whether Campbell, by the judgment of condemnation in the Court of Appeals of Maryland, and the proceedings *under it, ac- [479 quired Morris & Nicholson's equity of redemption in the squares attached.

2. Whether J. Miller, the assignee of Greenleaf, had a prior equitable lien upon the squares mortgaged to Duncanson, to the extent of the two-thirds of the amount of the bills of exchange secured by that mortgage.

3. Whether Campbell was bound to disclose the consideration he gave for Morris & Nicholson's notes, upon which he obtained the attachments.

P. B. Key, for the appellants, contended,

1. As to the first point, that nothing was condemned under those attachments but the legal estate of Morris & Nicholson, if they had any.

An equitable estate is not liable to attachment or execution under the laws of Maryland.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, in this case, does not purport to condemn the equity of redemptionn, or to designate what interest in the land Morris & Nicholson had.

It appears by the letter from Judge Rumsey, the Chief Judge of that court, that the majority of the court was of opinion that the covenant in the mortgage to Mr. Law, that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf should quietly enjoy the land until default made, gave them a legal estate, in the nature of an estate for years, which was liable to condemnation; and that the court intended to condemn nothing more than the legal estate, whatever it might be, which Morris & Nicholson had in the land at the time of the attachment. That it was the legal, and not the equitable estate, which they considered liable to condemnation, appears from the language of the judge. "But on this" says he (meaning, on the question whether an attachment ought to be against a mortgagor's interest), "the "judges gave no opinion. Sufficient to them "was it that, in their opinion, any interest was "attachable, and upon ejectment this would have been disclosed." Now, no interest could, in Maryland, have been maintained upon 480] ejectment, but a *legal estate; which shows that the Court of Appeals contemplated the condemnation of a legal interest only. This is sufficient to show that the judgment of the Court of Appeals is not conclusive evidence that the equity of redemption of Morris & Nicholson was affected by the attachment.

1.—The mortgage from Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf to Mr. Law, contained a covenant that they should quietly enjoy the mortgaged property, until the condition of the mortgage should be broken.

By the construction which the courts of Maryland have uniformly given to the British Statute of 5 G. 2, making lands in the colonies liable for debts, nothing but the legal estate is liable to execution at law. The rule is the same in England. (2 Atk. 292, Plunket v. Penson; 3 Atk. 200, Shirley v. Watts; 3 Atk. 739, Burden v. Kennedy.) The act of assembly of Maryland, 1794, ch. 60, sec. 10, is founded upon this known and acknowledged rule of law. It recites that, "whereas, it often occurs that per- "sons against whom judgments or decrees are "obtained, hold and possess, or claim lands, "tenements, or hereditaments, by equitable "title only, and the creditor or creditors of such "persons are often without remedy, either at "law or in equity," and then goes on to give the chancellor power to decree a sale of the equitable title; and to give the purchaser all the remedies which the person had whose equitable title is thus sold.

The act of Maryland in 1810, ch. 60, which, for the first time subjected equitable estates to legal process, was passed ten years after the judgment of the Court of Appeals in this case, and is strong, if not conclusive evidence, that such estates were not before that time liable to such process.

But if an equity of redemption be liable to attachment, yet the complainant's equity is prior to that of Campbell, for they had a prior attachment, in the name of Greenleaf, against Morris & Nicholson, which was continued until they obtained an assignment of that equity of redemption which was the object of their suit. If I attach the personal property of a man, and before condemnation he sell it to me in satisfaction of my claim, I am under no obligation to proceed with my suit to judgment. I have already obtained the fruit of my action. If he does voluntarily what the law would compel him to do, it is sufficient.

481*] *2. As to the prior equity of Miller, assignee of Greenleaf, under the bankrupt law of the United States.

Greenleaf conveyed his rights in the Washington property, on the 13th of May, 1796, with certain exceptions, reservations, and conditions.

That conveyance was expressly made subject to this mortgage to Duncanson. All the rights of Greenleaf, growing out of those exceptions, reservations and conditions, were assigned, by the bankruptcy, to Miller, one of the defendants to Campbell's bill, and one of the complainants in the bill against Law & Campbell.

The bills secured by the mortgage to Duncanson were sold, and the proceeds equally divided between Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, each of whom agreed to take up one-third of the amount thereof if they should return protested. They returned protested, and Greenleaf was obliged to take up the whole. Upon doing this, he requested Duncanson not to release the mortgage, but to retain it as his security. This Duncanson agreed to do, and thereby became a trustee, in equity, of the mortgage for the benefit of Greenleaf.

Ten of these squares, mortgaged to Duncanson, had been conveyed by Morris & Nicholson to Greenleaf, in June, 1796, subject to Law's and Duncanson's mortgage; Morris & Nicholson, therefore, at the time of the attachment, had no equity of redemption in those ten squares. Four other squares are claimed by Ashley, another of these defendants, to whom Morris & Nicholson had assigned their equity of redemption prior to Campbell's attachment.

3. As against these defendants, who are seeking satisfaction out of the same fund with Campbell, he ought not, even if he has a prior lien, to be permitted to enforce it beyond the amount of what he paid for Morris & Nicholson's notes, with interest. Equity will not permit him to profit by our loss. "Equality is equity." (Maxims in Equity, p. 9.) "A stran- "ger who buys in a prior incumbrance, shall "be allowed only what he really paid, as "against other incumbrancers." (1 Vern., 476.) "But as against the owner of *the es- [482 "tate, who made the incumbrance, or his heir, "he shall be allowed the whole that is due "upon it."

Morris & Nicholson, it is true, could not set up this defense; but we, who are their bona fide creditors, and assignees of their equity of redemption for a valuable consideration, have a right to redeem Campbell's incumbrance by paying him his purchase money and interest.

F. S. Key, for Campbell, relinquished the claim as to the ten squares conveyed to Greenleaf, and the four squares assigned to Ashley.

As to Miller's claim to a lien in consequence of Greenleaf's payment of the bills, he contended that no such lien was thereby created, or could be created, without an actual assignment of the mortgage. The condition of the mortgage was, that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, or one of them, should take up the bills. One of them did take up the bills and thereby the mortgage was discharged. The lien no longer existed, and the property reverted to Morris & Nicholson.

As to the claim that Campbell should be compelled to take only what he gave for the notes, he contended that the judgment of the Court of Appeals had ascertained the amount of this debt, and that the judgment could not now be opened.

As to the question whether an equitable interest could be attached, he relied upon the judgment of the Court of Appeals as conclusive.

As to the prior attachment by Greenleaf, for the use of Pratt and others, he contended that it created no lien inasmuch as it was not prosecuted to judgment. That the attachment and the deed of assignment could not be connected together so as to preserve the inchoate lien which was commenced by the attachment.

Pinkney, on the same side.

Campbell contends, not only that he has an equitable, but a legal title. His attachment gave him a legal title to an equitable thing. If 483] it did not, it gave him no title. *Upon the great principles of justice, real property is as much liable for a man's debts as personal. Uses were never extended in England until the statute of H. 8. And the courts always refused to extend trusts until the statute of frauds authorized them so to do. Nor could an equity of redemption be affected at law.

But this question here turns wholly upon the local law of Maryland, and the construction of the statute under which these attachments were issued. It is the act of 1795, ch. 56, which authorizes a justice of peace, &c., to issue his warrant to the clerk of the court requiring him to issue an attachment "against the lands, tenements, goods, chattels and credits" of the debtor.

The single question is, whether these were the lands of Morris & Nicholson at the time of the attachment.

From the time of the colonization of Maryland, its jurisprudence has been divided between courts of law and courts of chancery. If the statute speaks the language of the courts of chancery, as well as of law, the case is clear. In chancery, the mortgageor, and not the mortgagee, is owner of the land. The equity of redemption descends to the heir; the testator may devise it; his wife is entitled to dower; the husband is tenant by curtesy; in short, the mortgageor is owner of the land, as against all the world except the mortgagee. The legislature, by its acts, speaks to the whole jurisprudence of the state, not to one branch only.

A trust estate was liable to execution and attachment long before. Why should not an equity of redemption be equally liable? The act expressly makes credits liable to attachment, which was as contrary to the course of the common law as to subject equitable interests in land to condemnation.

Lord Mansfield, in a case in Douglass's reports (Doug., 610) says, it is an affront to common sense to say that the mortgageor is not the real owner. The equity of redemption is the substantial ownership in the view of all the world.

The act of Maryland in 1810 applies to exe-484] cutions *only, and not to attachments, upon equitable interests in lands. The legislature supposed the case of attachments already provided for.

The act of 1794 only shows that the legislature thought equitable interest in lands ought to be as much liable for debts as legal interests.

They also thought it expedient to give the purchaser of an equitable interest under the decree of the court, all the remedies legal as well as equitable which the debtor formerly had.

The case of Waters v. Stewart (1 Caine's Cases in Error, 47) is precisely analagous to this. The statute of New York, upon which that case arose, subjected to execution, "lands, tenements and real estate;" under which expressions it was decided that an equity of redemption, of a mortgage in fee, was liable to be sold by virtue of a fieri facias.

It is said, however, that the Court of Appeals in Maryland was of opinion that the covenant for quiet enjoyment was equivalent to a lease for years, which is a legal estate, and that they did not mean to condemn anything more than that legal interest. But that covenant created no legal estate. No specific term was mentioned during which Morris & Nicholson should hold it. It was not an estate for years. If anything was condemned by the judgment of the Court of Appeals, it must have been the equity of redemption; for that was the only interest in Morris & Nicholson at the time of the attachment. To that equity of redemption Campbell acquired a legal right.

But it is said that Campbell purchased the notes of Morris & Nicholson at a discount, and ought to be permitted to enforce his lien only to the extent of his purchase money and interest. There is no evidence of the fact; but if there was, yet if he was guilty of no fraud, he became the creditor of Morris & Nicholson to the full amount of the notes; he was pari gradu with the other creditors, and he who got the first attachment was in the best situation. Campbell obtained the first effective lien. That of Greenleaf was only incipient. *It was [485 abandoned before it was complete. The assignment cannot be connected with it. The claim under the attachment is a claim in the post; that under the assignment is a claim in the per. No two claims can be more distinct. They cannot be amalgamated, nor is the latter a continuation of the former. The deed does not purport to be a continuation of the lien; nor could it transfer what Morris & Nicholson did not possess,. Non dat qui non habet.

But it has been objected that the judgment cannot be executed by a fieri facias, which is applicable only to legal estates in possession. But if the condemnation of an equity of redemption is sanctioned by the act, the sale of that equity under a fieri facias is equally sanctioned. The one is a necessary consequence of the other. An execution is as natural to a decree in equity as to a judgment at law. In both cases the thing is to be taken to satisfy the debt.

This is no longer a mere equitable lien. It is a right of property, derived from the attachment, the judgment, the execution, the sale, and the purchase, which it may be necessary for a court of equity to effectuate; but the right is a legal right.

This was a proceeding in rem, and the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland is conclusive against all the world.

As to the rule cited from Maxims in Equity, p. 9, and found also in 1 Vern., 479, that "a stranger who buys "in a prior incumbrance "shall be allowed only what he really paid, as "against other incumbraneers;" its authority is doubtful. It is questioned by two cases; one in Salkield, cited in the margin; and the other in 2 Atk., 54, Mullet v. Park. And the doctrine applies only to agents, trustees, heirs at law, or executors.

Campbell's incumbrance was a legal one. He had a statute title.

P. B. Key, in reply.

There cannot be a legal title to an equitable 486] thing. It *is a solecism. No legal right can exist without a legal remedy. It is true there may be tenaut by courtesy in an equity of redemption; but he has no legal estate. He has a just title, but it is an equitable title. His remedy is in equity, and not at law. A trust estate may be sold under a fieri facias, because such a proceeding is expressly authorized by the statute of frauds. The general rule is that equitable rights must be enforced by equitable means, aud legal rights by legal means.

The case in New York was decided upon the statute of that state, and a long previous practice under the statute of 5 G. 2, c. 7.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland does not purport to decide what sort of a title Morris & Nicholsou had in the property attached. It was sufficieut for them that Morris & Nicholson were in possession. They cousidered that possession under a covenant for quiet enjoyment, as a legal estate; and they gave judgment of condemnation in order that Campbell might make out his title in ejectment. So says the Chief Judge of that court in his letter, and that opinion is perfectly consistent with the terms of the judgment. No inference can be drawn from the judgment that the court was of opinion that an equity of redemptiou was subject to attachment; aud the judge affirms that on that point the court gave no opinion. The point is therefore entirely open for discussion. No case has been produced from Maryland iu which an equity of redemption has been sold under a fieri facias or attachmeut. The want of such a case is strong evidence of the universal opinion of the courts of judicature in Maryland upon that point; and the statutes of 1794, c. 60, and 1810, c. 160, seem conclusively to show what was the opinion of the legislature.

March 11. JOHNSON, J., delivered the opin ion of the court as follows:

In order to present a distinct view of the uumerous questions which arise out of this intricate and voluminous case, we will pursue them through a history of the transactions in which they originated, and consider them in order as they occur.

487*] *It is well known that at the founding of this city, the proprietors of the soil gratuitously relinquished a proportion of their property to commissioners appointed to receive it.

Morris, Nicholsou & Greenleaf purchased city lands to the amount of fifty millions of square feet, to which quautity they were entitled on the 3d of December, 1794. Of this quantity 6,000 lots were purchased from the commissioners; 220 lots of Dauiel Carroll, and the residue of other persons not necessary to be specified in this case.

In the agreement with the commissioners they stipulate to choose the lots by squares; to build twenty houses per annum for seven years; and until the year 1796, not to sell without the building stipulation.

In the agreement with Carroll, the divisiou was to take place by lots; not by selection, but alternately in order; and a variety of building and other stipulations were entered iuto, which, not being complied with, Carroll re-entered on his land, and the contract was finally abandoned.

On the 3d of December, 1794, Law entered into a contract with Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf for the purchase of 2,400,000 square feet of city land at the rate of five pence, Pennsylvania currency, per foot, for which Law paid them £50,000, and took their bond to convey him that quantity of land, in the penalty of £100,000.

To secure this boud the mortgage was given which is the principal subject of these suits.

On the 13th of May, 1796, Greenleaf conveyed all his estate and interest in the Washington lands to Morris & Nicholson, who, on the 26th of June, 1797, executed an assignment of all their interest to these complainants (Pratt and others). Greenleaf afterwards becoming bankrupt, John Miller, one of these complainants, was made his assignee.

In the several bills and answers relative to these transactions, there are various contradictory assertions on *the subject of [488 fraud; but as there is no evidence to sustain any charge of that kind, and all the various writings executed between the parties appear fair, unimpeached and reconcilable, we shall wholly reject the cousideration of that subject, and dispose of the case upon the unequivocal meaning of the contracts of the parties, and their various acts, which have relation to the execution of those contracts.

By the bond to make titles, dated Dec. 3, 1794, Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf are simply bound to make titles to Law, for the specified quantity of laud in the city of Washington, leaving the situation of it, and the mode of selection entirely undefined, and, of coursc, retaining it to themselves.

On the day following, the same parties entered into articles of agreement, having relation to objects which appear not to have entered into their contemplatiou originally, and which, on the face of them, bear the appearance of perfect reciprocity. An option is given to Law to decline his purchase in eighteen months, and Law stipulates that if he should not then decline it, he shall be bound to improve every third lot pursuant to the original coutract of Morris & Greenleaf with the coumissiouers, iu a specified time.

On the 10th of March, 1795, Law purchases other concessious. By reliuquishiug his right of declining the purchase, he is allowed the right of selecting the property to be conveyed to him "excepting water property, and except- "ing such squares as are now appropriated, or "respecting which the said Morris, Nicholson "& Greenleaf have made arrangements." A list of the excepted squares is subjoined, numerically distinguished.

Morris, Nicholson & Greeuleaf also stipulate to secure Law in the discharge of their coutract by a mortgage of other lands in the city "which "are now in their possession, uutil they can "give good and sufficient titles to the said Law "of such property as he may select, and of "which the titles are not already vested in "them." But Law is to select by squares; to select in ninety days, and to build in conformity with Morris & Greenleaf's contract with the commissioners.

*From this contract emanated the [489 mortgage of the 4th of September, 1795.

It was evidently incumbent on Law to make his selection in ninety days, or show some adequate cause to excuse him from the discharge of that part of his agreement. The evidence that he did make his selection in the prescribed time is contained in his amended answer, drawn from him by express allegations in the bill, and an exception to his answer, in which he swears that his selection was made in due time, and that a copy of his selection, thus made, was, in due time, communicated to the other parties. This fact, therefore, being uncontradicted by any evidence, and confirmed by the solicitude expressed by Law, in all his correspondence, to obtain his titles, must be considered as established, and throws upon the opposite party an obligation to show, either that he complied with the selection so made or some sufficient reason why it was not complied with. For these purposes they contend that it was in part complied with, and that it was the fault of Law himself that it was not wholly complied with.

It appears that on the 14th of March, 1796, there were conveyed to Law 792,939 square feet of ground; and on the 20th of July, 1797, 1,155,857 square feet.

In these conveyances Law acquiesces, with two exceptions:

1. That 128,223 square feet contained in squares 727, 789, and 729 have since been recovered of him by due course of law.

2. That in the computation of square feet supposed to be conveyed to him, are included the superfices of the alleys passing through those squares in which the entire squares were not conveyed.

To understand this objection it is necessary to remark that, in the division between the commissioners and the proprietors, it frequently happened that several lots in a square were assigned to the proprietor. In the selections made by Morris & Nicholson, and in those made by Law, the exigency of the agreement to choose 490] by *squares was considered as gratified by the choice of all that part of a square which had been allotted to the commissioners.

To the first exception, the assignees reply that Law was conusant of the defect of title in the squares alluded to; that he took them with his eyes open, and therefore cannot now claim indemnity.

But we do not subscribe to this opinion. There is no evidence in the case that he did agree to take these squares cum onere. The letter of the 1st of September, 1799, proves nothing of the kind. The condition of the obligation is not complied with by a conveyance of a defective title.

The obligation to convey a good and sufficient title with a general warranty will carry with it the obligation to refund in case of eviction. Law's knowledge of the incumbered state of the title is of no consequence whilst the opposite party was under an obligation to make that title good and sufficient. The assignees are, in this respect, in no better situation than the original parties. Their rights and interests are altogether subordinate to those of Law. They take the property in every respect incumbered with the obligation to make good the contracts of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf with him, not only on general principles, but by express exception in favor of existing liens and incumbrances.

With regard to the allowance for the superficies of the alleys, we remark, that if the alleys be comprised under the denomination of streets, the conveyance of the ground which they cover would be void, and unquestionably will not amount to a gratification of the contract. But from the President's instructions of the 17th of October, 1791, there is reason to think that they were rights of way appurtenant to the lots of each square respectively. If this claim of Law's extended to the alleys in those squares, of which the whole was conveyed to him, there would be some ground for disputing it. But as it is confined to those squares only in which the right could not be merged, because some one or more of the lots were the property of another, we think the allowance ought to be made; for Law certainly has not acquired a title in fee-simple in those alleys.

*2. It is contended that it was in Law's [491 power to have obtained a full performance; and they charge him with various acts to which alone they attribute the non-compliance on their part.

1. His frequent varying of his selections.

On this subject there is a great variety of evidence and many contradictory allegations. But upon the whole, it appears that after acquiescing in a number of changes, the selections about the last of the year 1796, settled down to 699, 696, and half of 743, and the deficiency, if any, to be supplied out of squares 730, and north of 697.

But Law's inclination to vary his selections furnishes no sufficient excuse; for a tender of a conveyance conformably to any one of those selections would have been a performance.

On the 5th of December, 1796, it appears a deed was tendered, and this is asserted to have been a legal performance of their part of the agreement. Law contends that it was not because it contained the building stipulation, a distinct, independent contract, and which ought not to have been made a part of this conveyance. This question appears at that time to have been submitted to counsel and decided in favor of Law. Whether correctly or not, it is now too late to inquire; for it appears to have been acquiesced in, and conveyances executed for nearly the whole of the same land which was contained in the tendered deed. The conveyance tendered cannot, even if in unexceptionable form, be now considered as a performance for the balance unconveyed, since the land contained in it constitutes a great part of that for which credit is given upon the agreement; and after receiving conveyances in a different form, it is surely too late now to contend for the sufficiency of those tendered.

3. It is contended that the selection of squares 696, 699, and 743 was not sanctioned by the contract of March, 1795, and therefore Morris & Nicholson were under no obligation to convey.

It appears that these squares were situated in Carroll's *land, and, in the division [492 between Carroll and the commissioners, were assigned to the former. They thus became a part of that land out of which Morris & Nicholson were to be entitled to have conveyed to them their 220 lots, and it is contended that Law's right of selection could not extend to these lots because they were to be assigned alternately; whereas, Law's right of selection was to be made by squares out of those in which Morris & Greenleaf had the right of selection. It appears, however, that Morris & Nicholson acquiesced in Law's right to select from Carroll's land, and in a letter of March 19th, 1797, explicitly acknowledge it.

The solution of this apparent inconsistency is to be found in an observation previously made on another point in this case. A selection by squares was in practice considered by these parties as complied with when made of all those lots contained in any given square which were owned by the party bound to convey. There could then be no reason for excluding Law from enjoying his right of selection from among the squares contained in Carroll's land. The objection certainly comes too late at this day. In Morris's letter to Mr. Cranch, of February 22d, 1796, is contained an express recognition of the correctness of that selection, or at least of his acceptance of it in lieu of one more correctly made.

This act with its attendant consequences must be considered by this court as giving legitimacy to the selection, though it had been otherwise indefensible. Had Law been then informed that this selection was not authorized by contract, he would have been thrown on his right to amend his selection, at a time when he might have done it with little prejudice to his interest. But at this time it is surely too late to retract an assent given nearly twenty years ago.

With regard to the two other squares selected, as it was only provisional, to make up any deficiency that might exist after conveying the three positively selected; until the three absolutely chosen were conveyed, nothing final could be done with these.

The last objection is founded on Law's failure to comply with his building contract.

493*] *But to this we auswer: Law was not restricted as to the specific lots on which the buildings were to be erected. His choice, therefore, extended over the whole, and the obligation was not complete until the whole land was conveyed to him. We are of opinion that the selection was sufficiently proved; and that Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf were in default with regard to the deficiency of laud. On them, therefore, must fall the consequences of a state of things produced by their own default.

But there are other reasons, furnished by the case, in support of this opinion.

Law had advanced very considerably in the discharge of his building contract. He asserts (and it is hardly possible to believe otherwise) that he was originally induced to enter into that stipulation in consideration of similar stipulations entered into by Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf with the commissioners and Carroll, and urges their failure as his excuse in part for desisting from building. But be this as it may, it is impossible for the ingenuity of man to devise any expedient by which a means of comparison can be resorted to that would enable this court, or a jury, to ascertain the injury resulting from this cause, or the sum in damages by which it may be compensated. We therefore put the building contract entirely out of the case.

It then only remains to decide what remedy Law is entitled to.

It is contended in behalf of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf that it should be by specific performance or by an issue quantum damnificatus; that, at any rate, it should not be by a decree to refund the purchase money with interest, as the value of the residue was necessarily diminished by the gratification of so large a proportiou of his right to select.

To obtain a specific performance is no object of Law's bill; it is incumbent on the opposite party, therefore, to show some ground of right to force such a decree upon him. But considering, as we do, that Law is not in default, there can be no reason to decree a specific performance *when everything shows that it [494 would be productive of nothing but loss. Besides, a specific performance, such as would answer the ends of justice between these parties, has now become impossible. Carroll's property is resumed; a large proportion of the land, purchased of the commissioners, sold under legal process, and thus the benefit of selection so diminished that if performance were to take place, it must take place stripped of this its most valuable appendage; whilst the diminution of the value of property, and the change of circumstances, produced by a lapse of twenty years, would render it mockery to call any execution specific.

An issue quantum damnificatus it is certainly competent to this court to order in this case; but it is not consistent with the equity practice to order it in any case in which the court can lay hold of a simple, equitable, and precise rule to ascertain the amount which it ought to decree.

In this case, the failure on the part of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf certainly was as early as December, 1796, at a time when there is no reason to suppose that any diminution in the value of property had taken place.

And as to the argument that the value of the right of selection diminished in proportion to the exercise of it; that each subsequent choice was of less value than the preceding, we think it is a sufficient answer that Law never appears to have enjoyed the full benefit of his right of selection in consequence of the difficulties which appear at all times to have obstructed his getting titles from the commissioners or others. And finally, when his choice settled dowu upon the squares 727, 789 and 729, and on Carroll's squares 696, 699, and half of 743, he was evicted from the three former, and never could get the titles to the three latter. Now, these squares nearly make up his deficiency, and there is reason to believe they are among the most valuable of his choice. At any rate they appear to have been the favorite objects of his choice. We are therefore of opiniou that the rule of equity in this case is that adopted by the court below—to wit, refuuding at the rate of purchase according to the quantity actually deficient; but that interest is to be calculated only from the time when the selections were finally made, which we fix at 1st of January, 1797.

*With regard to the actual deficien- [495
cy, it is understood that there will be no difficulty in adjusting it, as the measurement and calculations of Mr. Kiug will be acquiesced in.

We must next determine in what manner the money to be decreed to Law, in pursuance of the foregoing principles, is to be raised from the mortgaged premises; and this leads us to the connection between the interests of Law and those of Campbell & Duncanson.

Campbell was holder of the negotiable paper of Morris & Nicholson to a considerable amount.

Greenleaf had conveyed to Morris & Nicholson all his interest iu the mortgaged premises, so that each of them was entitled to an undivided half part of the equity of redemption. Campbell sued out an attachmeut against Morris aud Nicholson severally, under the laws of Maryland (as this part of the district was then under the jurisdiction of Maryland), and had it levied on sundry of these mortgaged squares, specifically designating them by their numbers. An issue was made up, and at the trial before the court to which the writ was returnable, the question was distinctly made whether the equitable interest of the defendants in these squares was the subject of attachment. That court decided that they were not; and the plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeals to have their judgment reversed.

On the hearing before the Court of Appeals the decision of that court is reversed and the squares attached are specifically and numerically condemned to satisfy the debt due to Campbell. And finally, process issues out of that court, to the sheriff of the county, reciting the attachment and condemnation of these squares, describing them with equal precision, and commanding the sheriff to make, from the said lands, the money necessary to satisfy the judgment. Under this writ the squares so condemned were sold; Campbell becomes the purchaser; and Law, at the instance of Campbell, and without the privity of the assignees, executes a release to Morris & Nicholson, which is put on record; at the same time taking a bond of indemnity, from Campbell, against all consequences that might result from this act.

496*] *Much ability has been exhibited in argument ou the question whether an equitable interest in lands and tenements be the subject of attachment under the laws of Maryland. But we are of opinion that we are not now at liberty to enter into the consideration of that question. The decision of the Court of Appeals is final and conclusive on this point. The question was fully brought before them; and although it had not fixed the law, would have fixed the fate of these lands beyond reversal.

Some doubt is entertained, by one member of the court, whether the laws of Maryland go farther than to authorize the condemnation of this interest to satisfy the judgment so as to leave the plaintiff still under the necessity of applying to an equitable tribunal to effect a sale.

But the majority are of opinion that the attachment act, in making this interest tangible, makes it subject to the ordinary process of the law courts, and that in vesting in the courts in which the condemnation takes place, the power to issue execution as in case of other judgments, it has left it with those courts so to fashion its process as to meet the exigency of each case. In this case, the very special nature of the execution shows that it has been fashioned with great care and learning. We therefore hold the sale, under this execution, to be valid.

Some conclusions were attempted to be drawn, in favor of the assignees, from the inadequacy of the price at which the property sold, and from the following state of facts: Greenleaf had issued au attachment, to the use of the assignees, against this property of Morris & Nicholson, a day prior to that of Campbell. Subsequent to that of Campbell, Morris & Nicholson assign all their interest in this property to these assignees. Greenleaf's attachment was never proseeuted to judgment.

It is contended that this union between the prior lien and the interest attached, defeats the immediate lien.

But we cannot admit this conclusion.

*Levying an attachment has the [497 double effect of creating a lien and instituting an action. But the lien is only inchoate; it awaits the judgment of the court for its consummation, and must fall with the suit. To decide otherwise would be to permit the defendant, by collusion, or his own act, to nullify the lien of the subsequent attachment.

As to the inadequacy of price, the evidence is full to show that it was produced altogether by the steps taken by the agents of the assignees to embarrass or prevent the sale, and by the supposed weight of the incumbrances resting upon the land. In this respect, therefore, there is no imputation to be cast upon Campbell.

With regard to the release, it is very evident that, as it was never accepted by the assignees, it ought in no wise to operate to their prejudice; nor ought Campbell to derive any benefit from it, as it was gratuitously proposed by him under an arrangement with Law. Give efficacy to this release, and consider how it will operate. Campbell purchases at a reduced price, subject to an incumbrance; but give effect to this release and he holds an absolute fee absolved from all incumbrance.

Again, the property mortgaged to Law is liable for the whole amount to be raised for his indemnity; but give efficaey to this release and whilst Campbell acquires an unincumbered estate on the one hand, on the other the residue of the mortgaged property (that of which the assignees have not been deprived by sale of the sheriff) must be sacrificed to raise the money due to Law. From this it will follow, either that a rateable abatement should be made by Law, proportionate to the squares by him releascd to Campbell, or that those squares should contribute their due proportion towards paying Law.

Before we proceed to apply these principles to the final disposal of the case, it is necessary to show in what manner the interests of Duncanson and Ward become involved with those of these other parties.

Duncanson, at the request of Morris, Nicholson & *Greenleaf, and for their use, [498 drew bills on a variety of correspondents to the amount of £12,000.

On the 12th of September, 1795, Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf executed a mortgage of eighteen squares in the city of Washington to indemnify Duncanson against the return of these bills. They were eighteen of the squares previously mortgaged to Law.

Of these bills about £7,600 were returned under protest as the property of Ward; and that sum, together with the damages, was paid, on the 26th of December, 1796, to Ward by Greenleaf. No satisfaction was entered on the mortgage; nor any assignment demanded until a day long subsequent. The residue of the bills were also returned and paid by Greenleaf.

Thus circumstanced, whilst the mortgage appeared on record in full life when in fact defunct, as the purpose for which it was created had been answered, the attachment of Campbell was levied on thirteen of these squares, and they were finally condemned, sold, and purchased by him. After the sale, notice was given to Duncanson not to release, and that an assignment to Miller, the assignee of Greenleaf, would be demanded of him. The demand of Greenleaf on Morris & Nicholson, arising from taking up these bills, was contained in his assignment to Miller; and this payment is among the items making up the debit side of the account stated between Greenleaf and Morris & Nicholson.

Miller, the assignee, contends that he is entitled to such an assignment from Duncanson, and therefore to be considered in this court as entitled to all the advantages which he would have derived from such an assignment if actually made.

On the one hand, Campbell had, at the sale, all the benefit of this sum as an existing incumbrance upon the land. It was, in fact, so much credited on the purchase money for which it sold; but on the other, it is contended that it was a fraud upon the public to keep up the appearance of an existing mortgage on this property when it was in fact satisfied; that the agents of the assignees alone knew this fact, and good faith demanded of them that they should have avowed it.

499*] *We are of opinion that the answer to this argument is complete. The assignees did not conceive it to be a satisfied mortgage; they then supposed, and now contend, that an equitable interest in the security given for the payment of the bills resulted to Greenleaf for two-thirds of the sum paid by him on the bills and passed to them on the assignment. This reply, whether correct in point of law or not, certainly removes all imputation of fraud. But if it did not, what reason can be assigned why Campbell should take to himself a benefit from it? Had it been productive, in any mode, of injury or loss to him, it might have been urged with some plausibility; but there is no reason to suppose that any such effect has resulted from it. It could only operate to reduce the sales of the squares; and in this respect all the effects produced by it resulted to his benefit altogether.

One thing is indisputable; that if this mortgage be decreed satisfied, Campbell has acquired an interest which he never purchased, and acquired that interest in property which ought otherwise to belong to the assignees. It might, perhaps, be made a question whether the whole amount apparently secured by the mortgage ought not to be made the measure of compensation to the assignees; for to that amount it may reasonably be supposed the price of the property was reduced at the sale; to that amount were they damnified, and to that amount the purchaser was benefitted. But it would not be consistent with the nature of these purchases to apply that rule to them with strictness. The uncertainty under which a purchase is made, when made subject to an unliquidated incumbrance, gives such a purchase somewhat the nature of a speculation which the purchaser ought, to a reasonable extent, to have the benefit of, if it prove lucrative. It is, therefore, only on the ground of an equitable existing lien upon the mortgaged premises, or equitable claim upon Campbell, that the court can decree in favor of the assignees. And as Campbell has filed his bill of interpleader, in the nature of a bill to redeem, we think the court at liberty, when decreeing in his favor, to impose on him such equitable terms as the nature of the case suggests.

The foregoing reasoning proves that Campbell ought in conscience to make compensation to the mortgageor, *the former proprietor [500 of the fee, for that part of the interest which the mortgage appeared to cover. He did not purchase it, and therefore, although strict right may secure to him the whole, he ought to be charged with a sum in compensation for the interest so acquired above what was proposed to be sold.

Again, had these bills not been taken up, and the holder prosecuted all the drawers and indorsers to insolvency, there can be no doubt that the holder would have been entitled to charge the mortgaged premises, in equity, with the payment of the bills. But what difference is there, in equity, between the case of any other holder of these bills and that of Greenleaf, who, when liable equitably only for one-third, was compelled to take up the whole, and did it with his own funds? It consists only in this: that the one becomes creditor for the whole; the other only for two-thirds.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the thirteen squares purchased by Campbell should be rateably charged with the payment of the debt resulting, under these transactions, from Morris & Nicholson to Greenleaf.

PRATT AND OTHERS, Plaintiffs below, v. THOS. LAW AND WM. CAMPBELL. } DECREE.

THIS cause came on to be heard, &c. Whereupon it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia in this case be reversed and annulled; and this court decrees, that the complainants shall be permitted to redeem the mortgaged premises, exclusive of those squares purchased by the said William Campbell, upon paying and satisfying to the said Thomas Law, at the rate of five pence Pennsylvania currency, per square foot, for the actual difference between the number of square feet conveyed to the said Law and the number of 2,400,000 square feet which Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf were bound to convey, deducting from the number of square feet, said to have been conveyed to Law, the square feet covered by the alleys in those squares in which the entire square was not conveyed to Law, with interest on the sum so to be liquidated, calculated from the first day of January, 1797, at 6 per cent.

*And it is further decreed, that [501 towards paying and satisfying the sum so to be ascertained, the said William Campbell do pay and contribute a sum proportionate to the ratio which the squares purchased by him bear to the residue of the premises mortgaged to Law, in quantity of square feet, with interest thereon from the 1st of January, 1797.

That on payment of the said sum, the said Thomas Law shall reconvey to the complainants all those squares, or other mortgaged premises which were not sold as aforesaid; and to the said William Campbell all those squares which the said William Campbell attached and purchased as in bill and answer set forth.

And the court further decrees, that if the said William Campbell shall not, in six months after the liquidation of the sum to be paid by him and notice thereof, with interest thereon as aforesaid, pay and satisfy to the said complainants the sum so liquidated, then the said squares, so purchased by him, shall be sold under order of the said Circuit Court, to pay and satisfy that sum; and that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court for further proceedings necessary to carry into effect this decree.

PRATT AND OTHERS, Def'ts. below, v. THOMAS LAW. } DECREE

THIS cause came on to be heard, &c. Whereupon it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled; and this court decrees, that the said mortgaged premises, whereof the said Thomas Law prays foreclosure, shall be sold, under order of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in the county of Washington, to pay and satisfy to the said Thomas Law so much of the sum adjudged to the said Law, in the case of these defendants against the said Law and W. Campbell, decided at this term, as will be proportionate to the ratio which the said portion of the said premises bears to that proportion of the said premises to which the said Law executed a release in favor of Campbell, as in bill mentioned; unless the 502] said *complainants shall, in six months after liquidation of the said sum, and notice thereof, pay and satisfy to the said Law so much of the said sum as is, in this decree, ordered to be raised. Upon payment of which sum the said Law (shall) release to the said complainants his interest in the said premises.

It is further ordered, that this cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in the county of Washington, for further proceedings to carry into effect this decree.

PRATT AND OTHERS, Def'ts. below, v. WILLIAM CAMPBELL. } DECREE

THIS cause came on to be heard, &c. Whereupon it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled; and this court decrees, that whenever William Campbell shall pay and satisfy to John Miller, Junior, assignee of James Greenleaf, so much of the two-thirds of the sum paid by Greenleaf on the bills secured by the mortgage to Duncanson as will be proportionate to the ratio which the squares bought by Campbell subject to the mortgage to Duncanson bear, in quantity, to the whole 18 squares mortgaged to Duncanson, then the said Campbell shall hold the said squares so purchased by him, free and discharged of the said mortgage; and the said Duncanson, and the complainants shall thereupon convey and assign to the said Campbell all their right and interest in the said squares so purchased by him.

And it is further ordered and decreed, that if the said Campbell shall not within six months next after the liquidation of the sum to be paid by him and notice thereof, pay and satisfy the said sum to the said Miller, then the said squares so purchased by him shall be sold under order of the Circuit Court, and the proceeds thereof applied to the payment thereof; having regard, nevertheless, to any other existing prior lien upon the said squares; and this cause is remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings thereon to carry into effect this decree.

NOTE.

The Extra Annotation here following is arranged in the order of the cases in the original reporter's volume which precede it. At the upper outside corner of the page is given the volume and pages of the cases to which the Annotation refers. After the official reporter's volume and page in the heading of each case is given book and page of the present edition, the abbreviation L being used for Lawyers' Edition, or Law. Ed. for brevity, as it is throughout in the duplicate citations of cases from the Supreme Court.

ABBREVIATIONS.

F. C. appended to a citation from the regular reports of the U. S. Circuit and District Courts refers to the series of reprints called the Federal Cases and gives, as its publishers do and recommend, the number of the case in that series.

Fed. Cas. is used when the case is contained in the series of Federal Cases but is not reported in the regular series of U. S. Circuit and District Court Reports, and the citation of such cases is to the volume and page of Fed. Cas., not to the number of the case.

Fed. or Fed. Rep. refers to the well known series Federal Reporter, containing reports of the Circuit and District Court decisions since 1880.

L. R. A. will be readily recognized as the abbreviation for the Lawyers' Reports Annotated, and particular attention should be given to these citations, as in a large proportion of cases the citing case will be found accompanied by a note on its principal point absolutely exhaustive of the authorities thereon.

Am. Dec., Am. Rep. and Am. St. Rep. will be readily recognized as the abbreviations for the well known trinity of selected case reports, The American Decisions, American Reports and American State Reports.

Pennsylvania State Reports (Pa. St.) The New Jersey Law Reports (N. J. L.) and Equity Reports (N. J. Eq.) are distinguished by the number of the series, not by the name of the reporter, while the North and South Carolina Reports, Law and Equity, are cited by the name of the reporter where the reports are so titled and it has been the universal custom.

Duplicate citations are given to the National Reporter System where cases are therein contained, and to the Reporter System alone of cases not, at the date of the preparation of the annotation, officially reported. The usual abbreviations are used, as follows:

Atl.	Atlantic Reporter,	So.	Southern Reporter,
Pac.	Pacific Reporter,	S. E.	Southeastern Reporter,
N. E.	Northeastern Reporter,	S. W.	Southwestern Reporter,
N. W.	Northwestern Reporter,	S. Ct.	Supreme Court Reporter.

We think that in all other respects the abbreviations used are clear and familiar to all who are accustomed to the use of legal reports and text books.

Orton, 6 Sawy. 182, 32 Fed. 471, holding that in action of trespass brought by corporation authorized to receive grants of land, defendant cannot dispute authority of corporation to take land in question; Gray v. Davis, 1 Woods, 424, F. C. 5,715, holding that corporate charter cannot be annulled by provisions of State Constitution subsequently adopted; Magill v. Brown, 16 Fed. Cas. 413, 419, as to grant to unincorporated religious society.

Citing cases in the State courts also apply the rule, dissenting opinion, Dale v. Governor, 3 Stew. 418, 423, majority holding that act of legislature settling annuity for military services rendered vested no interest in annuity until paid, and was repealable; Stone v. Gazzam, 46 Ala. 275, ruling similarly as to grant to individual; Boyd v. State, 46 Ala. 334, denying right of legislature to repeal grant of power to conduct lottery during year for which license already paid; Micou v. Bridge Co., 47 Ala. 656, holding that grant of power to build bridge cannot be impaired by grant of power to another company to build similar bridge; Commissioners v. Rather, 48 Ala. 447, and Howard v. Jones, 50 Ala. 69, denying right of legislature to charge remedy upon contracts so as to impair obligation; Montgomery v. Kasson, 16 Cal. 194, as to grant of public lands; Seymour v. Hartford, 21 Conn. 486, denying right to repeal exemption from taxation; Trustees v. Bailey, 10 Fla. 130, 81 Am. Dec. 199, granting injunction to restrain appropriation of funds to other purpose than that for which raised, so as to impair security of bondholder; County Commissioners v. King, 13 Fla. 474, holding that where statute provides for discharge of bonds legislature cannot impair rights of bondholders by amendment providing insufficient means; Savannah v. Steamboat Co., Charlt. (Ga.) 346, 348, as to legislative grant of land to municipal corporation; In re Flournoy, 1 Ga. 608, denying right of governor to remit portion of penalty due to indlvldual; Young v. Harrison, 6 Ga. 154, 155, as to grant of right to take tolls; Hilliard v. Connelly, 7 Ga. 179, and Winter v. Jones, 10 Ga. 196, 54 Am. Dec. 382, as to grant of land to individual; Campbell v. Georgia, 11 Ga. 370, where authorities collected and discussed; Bruce v. Schuyler, 4 Gilm. 276, 278, 46 Am. Dec. 458, 460, as to grant to individual; dissenting opinion, Weidenger v. Spruance, 101 Ill. 300, majority holding valid act of legislature changing conditions as to liability of shareholders in corporation; Board of Education v. Bakewell, 122 Ill. 351, 10 N. E. 384, denying right of legislature to transfer property of private educational institution to State board of education; Martindale v. Moore, 3 Blackf. 279, where statute exempting executors from personal liability held not to affect judgment rendcred previous to passage; State v. Vincennes University, 5 Ind. 89, holding that corporation cannot be dissolved by legislature because of mere loss of members; State v. Springfield Township, 6 Ind. 97, as to grant of school lands; dissenting opinion, Noel v. Ewing, 9 Ind. 58, majority sustaining right of legislature to diminish inchoate dower; dissenting opinion, Scobey v. Gibson, 17 Ind. 577, arguing that statutc cannot act retrospectively so as to affect rights under judgment rendered previously; Edwards v. Jagers, 19 Ind. 417, as to grant of land to college; Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 207, 22 Am. St. Rep. 627, 26 N. E. 779, denying right of legislature to repeal laws providing for funding and payment of public debt; Louisville v. University, 15 B. Mon. 673, 674, denying right of legislature to control private educational institution, part of whose lands were received from State; Gregory v. Trustees, 2 Met. (Ky.) 598, as to grant of lottery privilege under which vested rights have accrued; dissenting opinion, State v. Flanders, 24 La. Ann. 64, majority asserting power of legislature to control municipal corporation; New Orleans, etc., R. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 26 La. Ann. 482, denying right of legislature to impair vested property rights of municipal corporation; Yarmouth v. North Yarmouth, 34 Me. 418, 56 Am. Dec. 670, as to grant of school lands; Canal Co. v. Railroad Co., 4 Gill & J. 122, 128, denying power of legislature to repeal clause in charter empowering corporation to acquire property; Appeal Court v. Patterson, 50 Md. 372, dcnying power to repeal exemption from taxation; dissenting opinion, Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 7 Pick. 494, majority holding that grant of power to build bridge and take tolls does not imply agreemcnt on part of State not to grant similar privilege to another corporation; Michigan State Bank v. Hastings, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 234, 41 Am. Dec. 551, holding void statute repealing bank charter where such right not reserved; Tromblcy v. Humphrey, 23 Mich. 483, 9 Am. Rep. 102, denying power of State to exercise right of eminent domain in behalf of Federal government; People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 104, 9 Am. Rep. 112, and Detroit v. Detroit, etc., Co., 43 Mich. 148, 5 N. W. 280, denying power of legislature to impair vested rights of public corporation.

Other citing cases show the following applications of the doctrine that a legislative grant is protected by the obligation clause: State v. Fry, 4 Mo. 132, denying right of legislature to pass special act granting divorce; Mitchell v. Clark, 64 Mo. 582, on point that State legislature is bound by clause in Federal Constitution prohibiting deprivation of property without due process of law; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Majors, 5 Mont. 126, 2 Pac. 325, applying rule to grant by congress to railway corporation; Koenig v. Railroad Co., 3 Neb. 381, holding that where legislature has granted land to be used for certain purpose is cannot subsequently order use for other purpose; Spaulding v. Andover, 54 N. H. 55, applying rule to grant of land to municipal corporation; dissenting opinion, Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H. 647, majority sustaining right of legislature to appropriate property of corporation under power of eminent domain; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 500, holding that where charter exempts corporation from taxation, such exemption extends to stock in hands of stockholders; Glover v. Powell, 10 N. J. Eq. 229, as to grant of right to build dam, and see dissenting opinion, State v. Mathews, 3 Jones (N. C.), 464; Lowe v. Harris, 112 N. C. 481, 17 S. E. 540, denying right of legislature to give retroactive effect to statute of limitations; Le Clercq v. Trustees, 7 Ohio (pt. 1), 221, 28 Am. Dec. 643, holding that where land dedicated to town for public square, legislature cannot order town to change its character; In re Malone's Estate, 21 S. C. 449, ruling similarly as to grant to municipality of proceeds of escheated estates; Grammar School v. Burt, 11 Vt. 641, as to grant to city for educational purposes, and in Grammar School v. Bailey, 62 Vt. 478, 20 Atl. 823, on same point; dissenting opinion, Prince W. Bd. v. Stuart, 80 Va. 79, majority holding valid act of legislature revoking grant for public charitable uses; Town of Milwaukee v. City of Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 102, 105, denying right of legislature to transfer property of one town to another on consolidation of latter with part of former; Attorney-General v. Railroad Cos., 35 Wis. 606, denying right of legislature to fix rates, where such right granted absolutely to company by charter.

The rule is approved in discussing the general subject, without particular application to the point at issue in the following cases: Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. 657, 7 L. 553; dissenting opinion, Inglis v. Trustees, 3 Pet. 153, 7 L. 636; Dudley v. Caldwell, 19 Conn. 227; University v. Railroad Co., 76 N. C. 107, 22 Am. Rep. 674; Knighton v. Burns, 10 Or. 550; Lyman v. Martin, 2 Utah, 157. See also note, 35 Am. St. Rep. 532.

The principal case is distinguished on this point as follows: Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 582, 9 L. 838, holding grant to bridge company of power to build bridge and take tolls, did not imply agreement on part of State not to grant similar power to another company (see also 7 Pick. 446); West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 542, 548, 12 L. 549, 552, limiting rule in holding that in exercise of right of eminent domain State may appropriate private bridge for use as part of highway; Rice v. Railroad Co., 1 Black, 373, 17 L. 151, holding that where grant is void no vested rights are impaired by revocation; Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. 213, 20 L. 553, and Miller v. State, 15 Wall. 489, 21 L. 101, where power of amendment or repeal of charter reserved by legislature; Chicago Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 580, 583, 28 L. 1087, 1088, 5 S. Ct. 684, 685, holding that grant of power is subject to condition that it shall not be abused, and that when so abused it may be revoked; Eagle Ins. Co. v. Ohio, 153, U. S. 454, 38 L. 780, 14 S. C. 870, limiting rule and holding that under police power, State may require insurance companies to submit reports of business done, although charter silent on the point; Pearsall v. Railway Co., 161 U. S. 661, 40 L. 843, 16 S. Ct. 708, holding that where charter authorizes corporation to do acts unnecessary to object of incorporation, such power, until executed, is revocable; Bonaparte v. Camden, etc., Co., 1 Bald. 218, 227, 232, F. C. 1,617, asserting power of legislature to exercise right of eminent domain for benefit of railroad company, and see also dissenting opinion, McElvain v. Mudd, 44 Ala. 76; Galland v. Lewis, 26 Cal. 48, and Higgins v. Bear River, etc., Co., 27 Cal. 159, holding valid retrospective statute not impairing contract or vested rights; Dudley v. Caldwell, 19 Conn. 227, as to executory legislative contracts, where no vested rights have accrued; Wilder v. Lumpkin, 4 Ga. 220, where retrospective statute not impairing vested rights, held valid; Stewart v. Supervisors, 30 Iowa, 17, 1 Am. Rep. 242, asserting power of legislature to take property of corporation in exercise of right of eminent domain; State v. Railway Co., 44 Md. 165, and Inland Fisheries v. Holyoke, etc., Co., 104 Mass. 448, 6 Am. Rep. 250, under constitutional provisions reserving right to repeal or amend corporate charters; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 1 N. H. 122, but see 4 Wheat. 695, 4 L. 673, supra; Gray v. Navigation Co., 2 Watts & S. 160, 37 Am. Dec. 502, holding that act increasing privileges of corporation will not be declared void on ground that liabilities are thereby increased and stockholder incidentally affected; Durkee v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 468, 9 Am. Rep. 504, holding void act exempting corporation from payment of costs in action against it.

Vested property rights.— Dissolution of government does not work forfeiture of, p. 50.

Cited and rule applied in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 707, 4 L. 676, holding that charter of college created by sovereign of England was not revoked by Revolution; Society, etc. v. New Haven, 8 Wheat. 481, 482, 5 L. 666, holding also that termination of treaty by war does not affect rights vested under it; Blair v. Odin, 3 Tex. 304, holding beneficial use of land not dissolved on attainment of independence by Texas. Approved in Kilpatrick v. Cisneros, 23 Tex. 126.

Corporations, exclusive privileges of, inconsistent with new government, may be abolished under new Constitution, p. 52.

Cited and applied: Murphy and Glover Test Oath Cases, 41 Mo. 381, where court argued in favor of constitutionality of "Test Oath Acts," but followed rule contra as laid down by Supreme Court in In re Cummings, 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. 356; dissenting opinion, Matheny v. Golden, 5 Ohio St. 434, majority denying power of legislature to repeal clause in charter exempting corporation from taxation; Peerce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 573, holding that State Constitution will be enforced in all cases unless in conflict with Federal Constitution.

Franchise, forfeiture of, may be decreed after judicial inquiry for misuser or nonuser, p. 51.

Cited and applied in Importing Co. v. Locke, 50 Ala. 334, holding corporation not to be deemed dissolved for purposes of business until misuser judicially determined; State v. Bank, 5 Ark. 604, 41 Am. Dec. 117, holding assignment by bank of all assets and property ground for forfeiture; Darnell v. State, 48 Ark. 324, 3 S. W. 366, holding that decree of forfeiture of turnpike franchise carries with it forfeiture of ferry privilege, incident to such turnpike; People v. Stanford, 77 Cal. 373, 18 Pac. 86, holding also that complaint must allege legal existence of defendant as corporation; Enfield Bridge Co. v. Connecticut River Co., 7 Conn. 46, 48, denying, however, right of legislature to transfer charter to other corporation until default judicially determined; Henderson Loan Assn. v. People, 163 Ill. 206, 45 N. E. 144, decreeing forfeiture of bank charter where business discontinued unreasonable time without excuse; State v. New Orleans Gas Co., 2 Rob. Dec. 108, where assignment by bank of assets and property held ground for forfeiture of charter; State ex rel. v. Railway Co., 140 Mo. 553, 62 Am. St. Rep. 751, 41 S. W. 958, denying right of city to abridge sovereign power of State to proceed by quo warranto for forfeiture of franchise of railway; also in State v. Equitable Loan Assn., 142 Mo. 340, 41 S. W. 919, holding that where State Constitution provides for issuance of quo warranto writ against corporation, such power cannot be impaired by legislature; State v. Railroad Co., 24 Neb. 156, 8 Am. St. Rep. 172, 38 N. W. 47, where act of railroad company in leasing lines held cause for forfeiture, such power not being given by charter; People v. Bank of Hudson, 6 Cow. 219, holding further that judgment in such case is one of seizure; People v. Turnpike Co., 23 Wend. 235, decreeing forfeiture for failure to maintain road as required by charter; Thompson v. People, 23 Wend.

590, decreeing forfeiture of franchise of individuals for failure to construct bridge as stipulated; Bradt v. Benedict, 17 N. Y. 99, on point that to constitute dissolution of corporation by surrender of charter, such surrender must be accepted by legislature; State v. Choate, 11 Ohio, 519, on point that public officer not deemed to have forfeited right to hold office by reason of misfeasance, until fact determined judicially; Commonwealth v. Bank, 28 Pa. St. 389, decreeing forfeiture of bank charter on ground that bank charged higher rates of interest than allowed by statute; Chincleclamouche, etc., Co. v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. St. 445, where forfeiture of lumber company's charter decreed for failure to engage in business for which chartered; State v. Bank, 1 Spears L. 502, where suspension of specie payments by bank held cause for forfeiture of charter; Green v. Allen, 5 Humph. 217, on point that equity will by injunction restrain misemployment of land granted to corporation for special purpose. See also notes, 53 Am. Dec. 110, 96 Am. Dec. 757, 5 Am. St. Rep. 804, 7 Am. St. Rep. 719, 725, 8 Am. St. Rep. 179, 180. The principle is approved also in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat, 663, 664, 4 L. 665, 666, and in dissenting opinion, Landon v. Litchfield, 11 Conn. 273, discussing general subject.

Distinguished in Nevitt v. Bank, 6 Smedes & M. 580, 593, holding that default cannot be set up in action on promissory note where such default has not been judicially determined; State v. Bank, 2 McMull. L. 451, 39 Am. Dec. 139, holding that where forfeiture of charter had been decreed but bank had continued to exist de facto, subsequent regrant of charter operated as waiver of previous forfeiture.

Public corporations.— Charters of, may be amended or repealed by legislature, p. 52.

Cited and applied in East Hartford v. Hartford Bridge Co., 10 How. 536, 13 L. 529, holding revocable, grant to town of right to construct bridge; Lucas v. Evidence.— Circumstances may outweigh positive testimony, p. 74.

Cited and applied in The Bark John Griffin, 4 Ben. 26, F. C. 7,348, holding, in proceedings against vessel for smuggling, that positive testimony of crew was outweighed by circumstance that contraband goods were found on board and by fact of probable interest; The Meteor, 17 Fed. Cas. 197, condemning vessel fitted out and armed in violation of neutrality laws, where there was no evidence to explain suspicious circumstances surrounding actions of vessel.

Evidence.— Party offering an excuse for violating a penal statute must make out the vis major, so as to leave no reasonable doubt of his innocence, p. 74.

9 Cr. 76–86, 3 L. 662, RANDOLPH v. DONALDSON.

Escape.— United States marshal is not liable for escape of prisoner whom he has committed to State jail, p. 86.

The principle involved in this rule has been applied in the following citing cases: United States v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 145, 35 L. 389, 11 S. Ct. 744; United States v. Harden, 4 Hughes, 463, 10 Fed. 809; United States v. Ebbs, 4 Hughes, 482, 10 Fed. 376, 49 Fed. 155, and Erwin v. United States, 37 Fed. 485, holding that as keeper of State jail is not deputy of United States marshal, mittimus is necessary in order to authorize such keeper to detain prisoner as against habeas corpus from State court; United States v. Martin, 9 Sawy. 95, 17 Fed. 154, holding that keeper of State jail is not obliged to deliver prisoner to Federal court without written order from court; In re Hartwell, 1 Low. 537, F. C. 6,173, sustaining right of State authorities to remove such prisoner to another jail; Ex parte Paris, 3 Wood. & M. 235, F. C. 10,714, holding that order to bring prisoner up for trial should be addressed directly to keeper of State jail; In re Birdsong, 39 Fed. 600, holding State jailer liable personally for mistreatment of prisoner; State v. Dews, Charlt. (Ga.) 409, holding sheriff not liable for negligence of jailer resulting in escape of prisoner. Cited approvingly in Nall v. State, 31 Ala. 266; Morre v. Allen, 7 J. J. Marsh. 651.

Distinguished in Lewis v. Marsh, 38 Fed. 796, where marshal held liable for escape of prisoner from deputy marshal.

9 Cr. 87–102, 3 L. 665, POLK'S LESSEE v. WENDAL.

Statutes.— Federal courts will adopt construction of State statute settled by State courts, p. 98.

This principle has been cited and applied in Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. 168, 6 L. 589, construing statute regulating devises of lands; Green v. Neal's Lessee, 6 Pet. 296, 8 L. 404, construing statute of limitations as applied to action of ejectment; Fairfield v. County of Gallatin, 100 U. S. 52, 25 L. 546, as to construction of State Constitution; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 34, 27 L. 365, 2 S. Ct. 22, as to statute prescribing liability of stockholders for debts of corporation; McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 391, 28 L. 1031, 5 S. Ct. 667, as to statute regulating descent, applying rule although similar statute receives opposite construction in other States; Thompson v. Phillips, 1 Bald. 284, F. C. 13,974, construing statute prescribing effect of sheriff's deed; Blanchard v. Sprague, 1 Cliff. 290, F. C. 1,516, as to statute prescribing rules of evidence; Loring v. Marsh, 2 Cliff, 319, F. C. 8,514, refusing to reverse judgment based upon construction of State statute regarding contract law, although State court had subsequently adopted different construction; Merrill v. Portland, 4 Cliff. 144, F. C. 9,470, as to construction of municipal regulations; Hiller v. Shattuck, Flipp. 274, F. C. 6,504, construing statute allowing new trials in actions of ejectment; In re Wyllie, 2 Hughes, 459, F. C. 18,112, construing "homestead exemption" clause, in insolvency statutes; Mitchell v. Lippincott, 2 Woods, 472, F. C. 9,665, as to statute limiting capacity of married woman to mortgage separate estate; State v. Grand Trunk Railway, 3 Fed. 888, construing statute defining liability of railroads for injuries resulting from negligence; New Orleans Water Works v. Southern Brewing Co., 36 Fed. 834, and Evansville v. Woodbury, 60 Fed. 720, 18 U. S. App. 514, construing grant of power to municipal corporation; Lookout Mountain Ry. Co. v. Houston, 44 Fed. 450, holding that where cause is removed to Federal court after decision on demurrer in State court, such decision is binding on Federal court; Hearfield v. Bridges, 75 Fed. 51, 44 U. S. App. 574, as to statute defining rights of husband and wife in community property; Willis v. Commissioners, 86 Fed. 873, following decision of State court declaring statute unconstitutional; Prentice v. Zane, 19 Fed. Cas. 1272, as to statute defining liabilities of parties to negotiable note; Bloodgood v. Grasey, 31 Ala. 589, construing statute respecting emancipation of slaves. The rule has been cited approvingly but without particular application in the following cases: Hempstead v. Reed, 6 Conn. 487; McClure v. Owen, 26 Iowa, 254; Levy v. Mentz, 23 La. Ann. 262.

Distinguished in Beals v. Hale, 4 How. 54, 11 L. 873, where decision relied upon was not rendered in court of last resort; Foxcroft v. Mallett, 4 How. 379, 11 L. 1020, ruling otherwise as to construction by State court, of deed by rules of common law; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. 504, 14 L. 517, and Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. 89, 15 L. 818, where statute in conflict with State Constitution; Railroad Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 53, 26 L. 75, denying authority of State decisions on questions of general commercial law. Limited in Lauriat v. Stratton, 6 Sawy. 347, 11 Fed. 114, holding that where there is but one decision on statute in question, Federal court is not bound by it if clearly erroneous. Criticized in Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 603.

Public lands.— Younger patent on elder entry prevails over elder patent on younger entry, p. 98.

Rule applied in Ross v. Reed, 1 Wheat. 486, 4 L. 142, under similar facts; McAfee v. Keirn, 7 Smedes & M. 789, 45 Am. Dec. 333, holding title of actual settler, complying fully with requirements, superior to title claimed by mere entry and patent, although later patent be the older; Lee v. Summers, 2 Or. 268, holding that legal title under patent relates back to date of entry.

Distinguished in Chavez v. De Sanchez, 7 N. Mex. 86, 32 Pac. 146, holding that patent issued by United States will prevail over grant by Spanish Crown, where such grant not confirmed as required by act of congress. Limited in Parkison v. Bracken, 1 Pinn. 181, 39 Am. Dec. 298, holding first patent conclusive in action at law.

Public lands.— Patent raises presumption that all prerequisites of law have been complied with, p. 98.

This rule has been cited and applied in United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 728, 730, 731, 8 L. 561, 562, in suit involving grants of land by Spanish officers in Florida before acquisition by the United States; Brush v. Ware, 15 Pet. 105, 10 L. 677, sustaining patent founded on assignment of certificate of military right; Minter v. Crommelin, 18 How. 88, 15 L. 279, holding patent to Indian lands prima facie evidence that Indian reservee had abandoned such lands; Clements v. Macheboeuf, 92 U. S. 425, 23 L. 507, holding that where deed is regular on face, invalidity must be established by affirmative proof; Hardy v. Harbin, 4 Sawy. 547, F. C. 6,060, applying principle to Mexican land grant; Harkrader v. Carroll, 76 Fed. 476, as to patent of mineral lands; Mayor of Mobile v. Eslava, 9 Port. 596, 33 Am. Dec. 332, as to grant executed by officer of Spanish government; so also in Kennedy's Exrs. v. Jones, 11 Ala. 86; Knabe v. Burden, 88 Ala. 439, 7 So. 93, applying rule to certificate of entry given by land commissioner; Yount v. Howell, 14 Cal. 469, holding that courts will take judicial notice of such patent, as authenticated by signature of president and seal of government; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 229, ruling similarly in construing grant by Mexican governor; Johnson v. Drew, 34 Fla. 137, 43 Am. St. Rep. 177, 15 So. 782, holding such patent prima facie evidence of title of government and authority of officer to convey; Winter v. Jones, 10 Ga. 206, 54 Am. Dec. 390, 391, holding that warrant and survey of land and payment of price gives purchaser right to action of ejectment; McKinney v. Bode, 33 Minn. 453, 23 N. W. 853, holding patent not impeachable for mere irregularity in proceedings; Kissell v. St. Louis Public Schools, 16 Mo. 582, as to grant to city of school lands; Cramer v. Keller, 98 Mo. 282, 11 S. W. 735, as to grant of swamp lands; Ming v. Foote, 9 Mont. 219, 23 Pac. 520, ruling similarly in case of grant by State land officers; American Dock, etc., Co. v. Trustees, 39 N. J. Eq. 448, 449, as to grant by State of lands below tide water; dissenting opinion, Pino v. Hatch, 1 N. Mex. 140, majority holding burden of proof on grantee, to show authority of Mexican officers to execute grant; People v. Mauran, 5 Den. 400, entertaining ejectment by holder of patent from State; Bell v. Duncan, 11 Ohio, 197, holding that in case of issue of patent to assignee, there is no presumptive notice of latent defects in assignment; Delay v. Chapman, 3 Or. 461, and Blakesley v. Caywood, 4 Or. 288, construing grants under "Donation Act;" Neal v. College, 6 Yerg. 197, applying rule in case of grant for military services; Parkison v. Bracken, 1 Pinn. 180, 39 Am. Dec. 297, holding patent conclusive evidence of title in action at law, and evidence is admissible to show adverse equitable title. See also notes, 2 Am. Dec. 570, and 12 Am. Dec. 565, 566, on general subject. The rule has also been approved in general discussion in State v. Batchelder, 5 Minn. 237, 242, 80 Am. Dec. 414, 418; Ferry v. Street, 4 Utah, 537, 11 Pac. 576.

Distinguished in Patterson v. Jenks, 2 Pet. 237, 7 L. 409, holding it to be error to instruct jury that no fraud of public officer could invalidate public grant. Limited in Sabariego v. Maverick, 124 U. S. 281, 31 L. 438, 8 S. Ct. 472, holding that patent to lands confiscated by government because of treason of owner, raises no presumption that such treason was judicially determined. Distinguished in Reeder v. Barr, 4 Ohio, 459, 22 Am. Dec. 763, where patent issued to person as assignee, and such patent held to give notice of existing equities. Limited in Goode v. McQueen, 3 Tex. 255, holding burden of proof to be on patentee to show authority of officer to issue it.

Patent.— Obliteration of consideration will not avoid patent, in absence of fraud, p. 97.

Public lands.— Patent is void at law if State had no title, or if officer issuing it had no authority to do so, p. 99.

This rule has been cited and the principle applied in numerous cases: Polk v. Wendell, 5 Wheat. 302, 5 L. 94, where entry on public lands was under forged warrant; Rice v. Railroad Co., 1 Black, 375, 17 L. 152, holding void, act of territorial legislature granting to railroad land to which territory had not title; Morton v. Nebraska, 21 Wall. 675, 22 L. 645, where land granted had been previously reserved from sale; Doolan v. Carr, 125 U. S. 625, 626, 629, 31 L. 847, 848, 8 S. Ct. 1231, 1233, 1236, admitting evidence of grant from Mexican government properly confirmed, to show want of power of land office to issue patent to same land; but see dissenting opinion, p. 634, 31 L. 850, where principal case distinguished; Knight v. United States Land Assn., 142 U. S. 176, 35 L. 979, 12 S. Ct. 262, following Doolan v. Carr, supra; Noble v. Railroad Co., 147 U. S. 174, 37 L. 127, 13 S. Ct. 274, holding that defect in patent may be shown in any collateral proceeding; but see St. Louis, etc., Co. v. Green, 4 McCrary, 235, 13 Fed. 210, citing principal case to opposite effect; Patterson v. Tatum, 3 Sawy. 173, F. C. 10,830, holding patent void where land in question granted to another prior to acquisition of title by United States; Chamberlain v. Marshall, 8 Fed. 409, holding tax sale of lands held under void grant, ineffectual to convey title; Lake Superior, etc., Co. v. Cunningham, 44 Fed. 832, 838, allowing defendant in ejectment to set up title in third person; Lakin v. Dolly, 53 Fed. 336, holding such patent impeachable in collateral proceeding; Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. Cannon, 54 Fed. 258, 7 U. S. App. 507, holding void, grant of land previously reserved from sale; United States v. Winona, etc., Ry. Co., 67 Fed. 956, 959, 32 U. S. App. 272, holding void, grant by land department of military lands; Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 82 Fed. 583, 587, where grant was of land previously reserved; United Land Assn. v. Knight, 85 Cal. 462, 480, 24 Pac. 825, 821, where government had no title (see 142 U. S. 176, 35 L. 979, 12 S. Ct. 262, supra); Chever v. Horner, 11 Colo. 75, 7 Am. St. Rep. 222, 17 Pac. 498, where State had no title; Wright v. Nagle, 48 Ga. 391, ruling similarly as to grant of exclusive right by municipal corporation, when power to make such grant not included in corporate charter; Ballance v. McFadden, 12 Ill. 324, holding void, patent issued to person who had not complied with law as to settlement; Bruckner's Lessee v. Lawrence, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 30, holding grant void if at same time land is in possession of another claiming under title adverse to grantor; Webber v. Pere Marquette Boom Co., 62 Mich. 637, 30 N. W. 473, where government had previously conveyed some land to other person; Perry v. O'Hanlon, 11 Mo. 595, 49 Am. Dec. 109, where land previously reserved from sale; so also in Easton v. Salisbury, 23 Mo. 106, holding also that subsequent repeal of such reservation does not operate to confirm void patent; Magwire v. Tyler, 40 Mo. 434, holding that elder patent conveys absolute title, and junior patent void; Le Beau v. Armitage, 56 Mo. 194, holding that congress cannot confirm void patent as against one regularly issued previous to such confirmation; Mantle v. Noyes, 5 Mont. 291, 294, 5 Pac. 862, 864, holding that under statute patent to placer claim passes no title to previously located quartz claim; Silver Bow, etc., Co. v. Clark, 5 Mont. 422, 425, 5 Pac. 580, 582, holding that patent to mining claim relates back to date of location, and is not defeated by intermediate town site patent; so also in Talbott v. King, 6 Mont. 108, 9 Pac. 442, on same point, following Silver Bow etc., Co. v. Clark, supra; Rose v. Richmond M. Co., 17 Nev. 64, 27 Pac. 1113, holding that running claims are not open to relocation until rights of former locator abandoned or forfeited; Miller v. Tobin, 16 Or. 552, 16 Pac. 168, as to patent issued by land office for land included in previous grant to State; Overton v. Campbell, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 167, 173, 203, 9 Am. Dec. 785, holding that void grant is attackable collaterally in any action; Moss v. Gibbs, 10 Heisk. 286, where State had no title; so also in Calloway v. Hopkins, 11 Heisk. 377; Sherwood v. Fleming, 25 Tex. Supp. 427, holding legislative act cannot confirm void patent so as to defeat rights accruing under second patent issued before such act; Blankenpickler v. Anderson's Heirs, 16 Gratt. 62, holding patent void, where grantee dead at time of issue; Randolph v. Longdale Iron Co., 84 Va. 466, 5 S. E. 34, holding patent void on face, impeachable in any collateral proceeding. The rule is cited generally in Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 612; in Horsky v. Moran, 53 Pac. 1067, holding mining claimant estopped by laches from attacking town titles; notes, 3 Or. 399, and 2 Overt. 37.

Distinguished in Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 382, 6 L. 500, denying retroactive effect of statute restricting size of grant; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 520, 30 L. 1048, 7 S. Ct. 999; Anderson v. Bartels, 7 Colo. 264, 3 Pac. 229; Hancock v. McKinney, 7 Tex. 440; Todd v. Fisher, 26 Tex. 241, and Bryan v. Shirley, 53 Tex. 458, holding grant not avoided by mere irregularity in manner of issue; Colorado Coal Co. v. United States, 123 U. S. 325, 31 L. 189, 8 S. Ct. 140, holding that where "coal lands" are reserved from sale mere surface indications of coal will not invalidate grant, and burden of proof is on government to show them to be in fact coal lands; St. Paul & N. P. Ry. Co. v. St. Paul, W. & M. Ry. Co., 57 Fed. 273, holding excessive grant voidable only; New Dunderberg Mining Co. v. Old, 79 Fed. 602, 49 U. S. App. 208; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 330, holding such patent not attackable collaterally unless void on face; Garner v. Willett, 18 Ill. 458, where congress had confirmed patent irregularly issued; Hollinan v. Peebles, 1 Tex. 700, holding that abandonment of patent confers authority on United States to regrant; Carson City, etc., Co. v. North Star, etc., Co., 73 Fed. 600, holding that statute limiting size of grant does not limit number of grants that may be held.

Public lands.— Conflicting claims under a patent are subject to jurisdiction of equity courts, p. 99.

This rule has been cited and applied in Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 642, 648, 652, 26 L. 877, 879, 880, where patent tainted with fraud; Smythe v. Henry, 41 Fed. 716, entertaining bill to quiet title; and in the following: Arnold v. Grimes, 2 G. Greene, 83, 84; De Armes v. New Orleans, 5 La. 178; Cook's Lessee v. Carroll, 6 Md. 112, and Green v. Barker, 47 Neb. 942, 66 N. W. 1034, all denying jurisdiction to entertain action at law where fraud set up; in Sykes v. McRory, 10 Ga. 471, 54 Am. Dec. 404, holding that mistake as to grantee can be corrected only by scire facias. Approved also in Davis v. Davis, 9 Mont. 276, 23 Pac. 717.

Limited in Sharp v. Stevens, 6 Sawy. 50, F. C. 12,710, holding that patent can be impeached in equity only by directly pleading fraud or mistake.

Miscellaneous citations.— Cited also in Ming v. Foote, 9 Mont. 221, 23 Pac. 522, on point that consideration named on face of deed is not conclusive; Derby v. Jacques, 1 Cliff. 439, F. C. 3,817, but application doubtful.

9 Cr. 102–104, 3 L. 670, THE RICHMOND v. UNITED STATES.

Admiralty jurisdiction.— Seizure of vessel without jurisdiction of United States does not render unlawful, regular judicial proceedings against vessel instituted after arrival within such jurisdiction, p. 104.

Cited and rule applied in The Merino, 9 Wheat. 403, 6 L. 121, holding that appearance and claim in admiralty waives objection to regularity of process to enforce appearance; dissenting opinion, United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 435, 30 L. 434, 7 S. Ct. 249, majority holding that person extradited for purpose of being tried for murder can be tried for no other offense; Kerr v. Illinois, 119 U. S. 444, 30 L. 424, 7 S. Ct. 229, refusing to revise decision of State court holding that forcible transfer of defendant within jurisdiction renders him amenable to prosecution on criminal charge; In re Johnson, 167 U. S. 126, 42 L. 105, 17 S. Ct. 737, sustaining indictment for murder, although prior arrest illegal; In re Ezeta, 62 Fed. 968, holding in extradition proceedings that it is immaterial how party came or was brought within jurisdiction of court; United States v. Arms and Ammunitions, 24 Fed. Cas. 863, where American vessel seized within foreign jurisdiction for violation of neutrality laws.

Non-intercourse act.— Under act prohibiting intercourse with enemy, vessel cannot proceed to prohibited port in ballast, p. 103.

9 Cr. 104–120, 3 L. 671, ARNOLD v. UNITED STATES.

Computation of time.— Where computation is to be made from act done, date on which act is done is to be included, p. 120.

This rule is cited and applied in Lapeyre v. United States, 17 Wall. 198, 21 L. 608, holding proclamation of president relieving certain classes from penalties to have taken effect when signed by president and sealed with great seal of United States; Taylor v. Brown, 147 U. S. 644, 37 L. 315, 13 S. Ct. 551, holding that in computing time during which alienation of public land acquired under patent is forbidden, day of issue of patent should be included; Smith v. Draper, 5 Blatchf. 240, F. C. 13,037, construing statute imposing duty on teas; United States v. O'Neill, 19 Fed. 572, as to statute increasing duty on liquors; United States v. Chong Sam, 47 Fed. 883, construing Chinese exclusion act; Vailes v. Brown, 16 Colo. 466, 27 Pac. 946, construing statute of limitations; Taylor v. Brown, 5 Dak. Ter. 349, 40 N. W. 530 (see S. C., 147 U. S. 644, 37 L. 315, 13 S. Ct. 551, supra); Woolbright v. Sneed, 5 Ga. 171, on point that statute of limitations does not begin to run until right of action accrues; so also in Jacobs v. Graham, 1 Blackf. 392; Ryman v. Clark, 4 Blackf. 329, construing statute prescribing time within which return on execution to be made; Swift v. Tousey, 5 Ind. 198, construing statute prescribing time for taking appeal, and in Coal Co. v. Barber, 47 Kan. 30, 31, 27 Pac. 115, on same point; Batman v. McGowan, 1 Met. (Ky.) 547, construing statute requiring notice of intention to contest election; Mallory v. Hiles, 4 Met. (Ky.) 55, holding act suspending courts effective after approval by governor; Parkinson v. State, 14 Md. 200, 74 Am. Dec. 533, holding that where act declares time when it shall take effect, it will operate at such time, although not published; Commonwealth v. Brooks, 109 Mass. 357, holding that municipal ordinance takes effect from date of passage, unless otherwise specified; Bailey v. Lubke, 8 Mo. App. 60, construing statute prescribing time for taking appeal; Carothers v. Wheeler, 1 Or. 196, construing statute prescribing time for taking appeal; Barber v. Chandler, 17 Pa. St. 50, 55 Am. Dec. 534, construing statute regulating issue and return of summons; Ex parte De Hay, 3 S. C. 565, holding void proceedings of court after time prescribed in statute changing time for holding such court; State v. Maneke, 18 S. C. 86, construing statute regulating issue of municipal licenses; In re Welman, 20 Vt. 660, denying validity of petition filed on same day that bankrupt act repealed; Robinson v. Robinson, 32 Vt. 741, construing statute prescribing time for taking appeal; State v. Mounts, 36 W. Va. 190, 14 S. E. 410, holding that term "passage" refers to passage by legislature and not approved by governor. See also notes, 7 Am. Dec. 250, and 26 Am. Dec. 234. Cited, generally, also in Spencer v. Champion, 13 Conn. 16, and note, 2 Hill, 356.

Distinguished in Dutcher v. Wright, 94 U. S. 560, 24 L. 132, excluding day on which petition in insolvency is filed, in computing time, before such filing, within which assignments are void; Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U. S. 384, 24 L. 1106 (see 1 Hughes, 359, F. C. 12,262), and Louisville v. Bank, 104 U. S. 475, 26 L. 777, holding that increase in internal revenue did not operate upon goods on which tax paid before act approved, although paid on same day that act approved; United States v. Stoddard, 89 Fed. 701, under terms of statute; Wood v. Fort, 42 Ala. 642, limiting rule to remedial statutes not prescribing punishments or penalties; Bemis v. Leonard, 118 Mass. 505, 19 Am. Rep. 473, and McGinley v. Laycock, 94 Wis. 208, 68 N. W. 872, where statutes expressed different intention; Arrowsmith, Hamering, 39 Ohio St. 578, holding that rule will not prevail when actually in conflict with right acquired earlier in point of time on same day. Denied in In re Tyson, 13 Colo. 489, 22 Pac. 812, construing statute prescribing time within which execution shall be held; Vailes v. Brown, 16 Colo. 466, 27 Pac. 946, construing statute limiting time for filing contest of election; Weeks v. Hull, 19 Conn. 382, 50 Am. Dec. 252, holding that date of act from which future time is to be ascertained, is to be excluded from computation; Parkinson v. Brandenburg, 35 Minn. 295, 59 Am. Rep. 326, 28 N. W. 919, holding that where statute provides that it shall take effect "from and after passage," day of passage is to be excluded.

Duties, right to, accrues on arrival of goods within port of entry, p. 120.

Rule applied in Meredith v. United States, 13 Pet. 494, 10 L. 262, holding, further, that duties due, constitute personal debt of importer as well as lien upon goods; dissenting opinion, Keck v. United States, 172 U. S. 463, majority holding that mere concealment of goods after entering port did not constitute smuggling; United States v. Cigars, 2 Curt. 437, F. C. 16,450, holding importation without manifest complete, for purposes of forfeiture, when goods brought within limits of port of entry; so also in United States v. Dodge, Deady, 126, F. C. 14,973; United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 499, F. C. 15,647, holding that action of debt lies to recover such duties; Kidd v. Flagler, 54 Fed. 369, holding exportation complete when goods landed in foreign port; United States v. Merriam, 26 Fed. Cas. 1239, holding entry in custom-house not necessary to render goods liable to forfeiture for fraud in invoicing. Cited in general discussion in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 453, 6 L. 690; United States v. Segars, 27 Fed. Cas. 1017; note, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 423, F. C. 16,555.

Distinguished in McLean v. Hager, 31 Fed. 606, holding opium exempt from duty where collector refused to give permit for trans-shipment as required by statute.

Bond, recovery on, cannot exceed penalty with interest (so held in lower court, 1 Gall. 358, F. C. 14,469, but point not raised on appeal).

Trading with enemy.— Quære, whether one belligerent may withdraw his property from country of the other, on breaking out of war, p. 121.

Referred to in Amory v. McGregor, 15 Johns. 36, 8 Am. Dec. 209, asserting right to do so within reasonable time.

9 Cr. 122–125, 3 L. 677, DRUMMOND v. MAGRUDER.

Appeal, evidence.— Court is confined to proofs as shown by record of lower court, p. 125.

Cited and applied in Kerr v. Watts, 6 Wheat. 562, 5 L. 331, holding that higher court will not consider a particular defense as having been waived, from mere fact that court below did not consider it.

Appeal.— If the Supreme Court reverse a decree upon a technical objection to the evidence, it will not dismiss the bill absolutely, but remand the cause for further proceedings, p. 125.

Authentication.— Document attested by clerk of court, cannot be received as evidence, without certificate of presiding judge that such attestation is in due form, p. 125.

Cited and applied in Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Wood. & M. 4, F. C. 13,785, as to copy of judgment; in McRae v. Stokes, 3 Ala. 403, 37 Am. Dec. 700, holding that attestation necessary is that prescribed for court where proceedings had; Pennel's Lessee v. Wayant, 2 Harr. 505, holding deeds within meaning of act of congress, prescribing method of authenticating records; Giles v. Shaw, Breese, 126, holding insufficient, certificate of judge, omitting to state that attestation of judgment is "in due form;" so also in Hutchins v. Gerrish, 52 N. H. 206, 13 Am. Rep. 20; Chase v. Caryl, 57 N. J. L. 554, 31 Atl. 1028, construing State statute requiring authentication of recording and cancellation of mortgages; Hatcher v. Rocheleau, 18 N. Y. 94, holding further that such certificate is conclusive of competency of copy as evidence; Snyder v. Wise, 10 Pa. St. 161, applying principle to judgment rendered in justice's court.

Foreign judgment of court of competent jurisdiction in an action in rem, is conclusive as to matters it purports to decide, pp, 142, 144.

This rule has been cited and applied in Tompkins v. Tompkins, 1 Story, 553, F. C. 14,091, to decree of Probate Court ordering sale of personal property; Bradstreet v. Insurance Co., 3 Sumn. 605, F. C. 1,793, to sentence of condemnation for illicit trading; Alabama, etc., Ry. Co. v. Jones, 1 Fed. Cas. 282, 7 Bank Reg. 171, to decree of District Court in bankruptcy proceedings; The Hendrik Hudson, 11 Fed. Cas. 1093, to decree of sale of vessel to satisfy bottomry bond;

Thoms v. Southard, 2 Dana, 482, 26 Am. Dec. 473, holding decree of admiralty in proceeding to enforce lien, conclusive as to title; Whitney v. Walsh, 1 Cush. 32, 48 Am. Dec. 590, holding decree of forfeiture conclusive as to legality of seizure; so also in Tracey v. Corse, 58 N. Y. 151; Williams v. Saunders, 5 Cold. 78, holding decree of register of wills, directing distribution of property, conclusive as to facts on which it is based; likewise in Brown v. Brown, 86 Tenn. 319, 7 S. W. 647, as to decree admitting will to probate. See also notes, 62 Am. Dec. 243, 75 Am. Dec. 724. Cited approvingly in Allen v. United States, Taney, 117, F. C. 240.

Distinguished in Burnham v. Webster, 1 Wood. & M. 178, F. C. 2,179 holding evidence admissible to show want of jurisdiction of such court; so also in The Trenton, 4 Fed. 659, 661; Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 465, 22 Am. Dec. 47, and Richardson v. Seevers, 84 Va. 267. Distinguished in Ashbrook v. Golden Gate, Newb. 306, F. C. 574, where action was at common law and against owners of vessel personally. Limited in Bank v. Hodges, 12 Ala. 122, holding that bill in equity by feme covert to have property settled to separate use is not such proceeding in rem, and decree is binding only on parties and privies. Distinguished in dissenting opinion, Fisher v. Fielding, 67 Conn. 128, 34 Atl. 724, majority holding judgment on pecuniary demand conclusive on merits; Brigham v. Fayerweather, 140 Mass. 413, 414; 5 N. E. 266, 267, holding decree admitting will to probate not conclusive as to testator's mental capacity; Thompson v. The Julius D. Morton, 8 Ohio St. 227, holding sale ordered by Admiralty Court conclusive only when made to bona fide purchaser.

Distinguished in Hamilton v. Brown, 161 U. S. 274, 40 L. 699, 16 S. Ct. 592, under statute providing for notice by publication in escheat proceedings. Limited in Daily v. Doe, 3 Fed. 912, 913, holding that want of notice will not avoid sale of court under decree of admiralty, but merely reopen proceedings.

Admiralty.— Seizure gives constructive notice to all parties, p. 144.

Cited and principle applied in Miller v. United States, 11 Wall. 325, 20 L. 151, holding that seizure of corporate stock may be made by service of notice on officers of corporation; The Ann, 5 Hughes, 297, 8 Fed. 927, as to seizure of vessel for violation of State statute; United States v. Mackoy, 2 Dill. 308, F. C. 15,696, holding lienors barred by failure to assert claims in proceedings for forfeiture of property seized for violation of revenue laws; Merrick v. Hutt, 15 Ark. 343, applying principle in case of attachment of land for nonpayment of taxes; note, 48 Am. Dec. 274, on point that proceedings in rem involving seizure of subject-matter constitute exception to general rule as to notice. Cited arguendo in Daily v. Doe, 3 Fed. Rep. 913, 917.

Distinguished in dissenting opinion, Miller v. United States, 11 Wall. 328, 20 L. 152 (see 11 Wall. 325, supra); The Henrietta, Newb. 291, F. C. 6,121, holding person not bound by decree of court if his claim was not assertible in such court. Denied in Verner v. Bosworth, 28 Kan. 673.

Admiralty.—All persons having interest in subject-matter are parties, p. 145.

Cited and applied in The Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wall. 52, 17 L. 612, holding decree conclusive as to all parties, if, after due notice, they fail to appear; Cushing v. Laird, 107 U. S. 79, 27 L. 395, 2 S. Ct. 204, holding that person conducting defense on behalf of parties interested is not estopped to set up, subsequently, his own equity in the property (see S. C. in lower court, 6 Ben. 461, F. C. 3,509). Cited generally, and without particular application, in Nations v. Johnson, 24 How. 205, 16 L. 632; Ray v. Noseworthy, 23 Wall. 136, 23 L. 118, 12 Bank. 9 Cr. 151–153, 3 L. 687, LEWIS v. McFARLAND.

Executor may maintain suit in foreign jurisdiction for lands devised to him by testator, p. 152.

Cited and principle applied in Slack v. Walcott, 3 Mason, 518, F. C. 12,932, holding that in order to bring bill for specific performance to convey land, executor need not prove will in jurisdiction where such action commenced; De Forest v. Thompson, 40 Fed. 377 (see S. C., 32 W. Va. 3, app.), sustaining right of executor to defend in action of ejectment; Wilson v. Tootle, 55 Fed. 217, applying principle to action by executor, as trustee, for wrongful death of testator; Apperson v. Bolton, 29 Ark. 435, 437, sustaining validity of sale in foreign jurisdiction by executor; Way v. Slaughter, 3 A. K. Marsh. 510, and May v. Hill, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 312, entertaining ejectment by foreign executor. Approved also in Taylor v. Benham, 5 How. 273, 12 L. 149, in discussing general subject.

Rule limited in Leavens v. Butler, 8 Port. 402, and Perkins v. Lewis, 41 Ala. 662, 663, 94 Am. Dec. 626, 627, holding that executor must sue as devisee; Crusoe v. Butler, 36 Miss. 171, 172, holding that will must be produced to show authority as executor; Cabanne v. Skinker, 56 Mo. 367, and Emmons v. Gordon, 140 Mo. 499, 62 Am. St. Rep. 740, 41 S. W. 1001, holding that will must be proved in such foreign jurisdiction.

Executor.—Authority to sue for personal estate of testator does not extend outside of jurisdiction of State where letters testamentary granted, p. 152.

Approved and principle applied in Mellus v. Thompson, 1 Cliff. 134, F. C. 9,405, holding that executor cannot be sued without jurisdiction of appointment, for assets received within such jurisdiction;

State v. Joyce, 48 Ind. 318, majority holding admissible in evidence, will of personal property probated in other State; Le Cesne v. Cottin, 2 Mart. (La.) (N. S.) 486, denying right of foreigner to admission as beneficiary heir; Pelletreau v. Rathbone, 1 N. J. Eq. 333, on point that probate of will in one State is of no effect in courts of another; Vaughn v. Barret, 5 Vt. 336, 26 Am. Dec. 307, denying authority of administrator appointed in one State, to discharge debt due testator from citizen of another State. The rule is also cited in general discussion, but without particular application to the point at issue, in Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. 571, 6 L. 163; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 32, F. C. 14,164; Clark v. Hornthal, 47 Miss. 490, 491; dissenting opinion, Becraft v. Lewis, 41 Mo. App. 556; Wills v. Cowper, 2 Ohio, 128.

Variance.— Plaintiff, in ejectment, may recover, although interest established at trial is less than that claimed in declaration, p. 153.

Rule applied in Grothans v. De Lopez, 57 Tex. 673, in action by tenant in common to recover undivided interest; Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 84, where plaintiff claimed whole tract and jury found only undivided interest. See also notes, 54 Am. Dec. 416, and 50 Am. St. Rep. 845.

9 Cr. 153–164, 3 L. 688, CLARK v. VAN RIEMSDYK.

Equity.— Verified answer of defendant can be overcome only by testimony of two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances, p. 160.

This rule has been applied in the following citing cases: Voorhees v. Bonesteel, 16 Wall. 30, 21 L. 271, denying affirmative relief on ground of fraud in assignment, where answer controverted by but one witness; Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 206, 25 L. 433, where suspicion of fraud alone, held insufficient to set aside deed; Bowden v. Johnson, 107 U. S. 262, 27 L. 390, 2 S. Ct. 255, holding answer overcome by testimony of one witness and admitted fact that defendant knew bank to be insolvent and transferred stock to escape liability; Delano v. Winsor, 1 Cliff. 505, F. C. 3,754, dismissing proceedings against trustee for breach of trust; Tobey v. Leonards, 2 Cliff. 51, F. C. 14,067, holding testimony of one witness insufficient to sustain bill for specific performance; Parker v. Phettleplace, 2 Cliff. 79, F. C. 10,746, denying sufficiency of one witness in action to set aside mortgage on ground of fraud; Badger v. Badger, 2 Cliff. 146, F. C. 718, dismissing bill charging fraud in settling probate accounts; Scammon v. Cole, 3 Cliff. 479, 5 Bank. Reg. 264, F. C. 12,432, where answer denying fraud in executing mortgage under bankrupt act, held not overcome by testimony of one witness; Hayward v. Bank, 4 Cliff. 296, F. C. 6,273, where allegations of fraud in bill supported only by testimony of complainant; Gilman v. Libbey, 4 Cliff. 459, F. C. 5,445, dismissing bill to set aside sale on ground of fraud; West v. Randall, 2 Mason, 205, F. C. 17,424, dismissing bill for account where only witnesses were complainant and one identified with him in interest; United States v. Parrott, 1 McAll. 302, 311, F. C. 15,998, applying rule in bill for injunction (see also same case, 1 McAll. 449, F. C. 15,999); Sadler v. Robinson, 2 Stew. 524, holding acquiescence in transfer of land to be circumstance which will, in addition to testimony of one witness, control answer denying assent to conveyance; Fenno v. Sayre, 3 Ala. 478, on point that answer directly responsive to bill is evidence in all cases; Cummins v. Harrell, 6 Ark. 315, applying rule in proceeding to annul bond on ground of fraud; Field v. Howell, 6 Ga. 431, where, in action to enjoin trespass, answer showed lease in defendant; Ruckersville Bank v. Hemphill, 7 Ga. 412, dismissing bill where cause submitted on bill and answer alone; Dodge v. Griswold, 12 N. H. 577, refusing to set aside conveyance for fraud where only one witness for complainant; Bellows v. Stone, 18 N. H. 479, dismissing bill for account where answer uncontroverted except by circumstances; Brown v. Bulkely, 14 N. J. Eq. 300, holding that complainant cannot impair effect of answer by impeaching defendant's reputation for veracity; Bent v. Smith, 22 N. J. Eq. 566, applying rule in proceeding to establish trust; Gibbs v. Guignard, 1 S. C. 377, applying rule to answer of trustee to bill for account; Burnley v. Cook, 13 Tex. 590, 65 Am. Dec. 82, dismissing bill for injunction; Taylor v. Moore, 2 Rand. 577, dismissing bill to set aside deed on ground of fraud; Moore v. Ullman, 80 Va. 310, sustaining bill to set aside deed where fraud proved by one witness and corroborating circumstances. The rule is approved in the following cases, discussing the general subject: Carpenter v. Insurance Co., 4 How. 218, 11 L. 946; Tobey v. Leonards, 2 Wall. 430, 17 L. 845; May v. Le Claire, 11 Wall. 233, 20 L. 54; United States v. Hodson, 26 Fed. Cas. 339; White v. Crew, 16 Ga. 423; Long v. White, 5 J. J. Marsh, 228; Warren v. Swett, 31 N. H. 339; Morris v. White, 36 N. J. Eq. 329; Maise v. Garner, 1 Mart. & Y. 385, 17 Am. Dec. 819; Autrey v. Cameron, 11 Tex. 114; Frank v. Lilienfield, 33 Gratt. 381.

Distinguished in Barraque v. Siter, 9 Ark. 547, 550, and Robinson v. Stewart, 10 N. Y. 195, holding that rule does not apply, where answer contains admissions inconsistent with previous positive denial.

Equity.— Where answer of defendant is made only upon information and belief, and is not verified, the general rule that two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances, are necessary to overcome it, does not apply, p. 160.

This limitation of the general rule has been applied in a number of citing cases: Union Bank v. Geary, 5 Pet. 111, 8 L. 65; Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. 171, 14 L. 99; Hickox v. Elliott, 11 Sawy. 641, 27 Fed. 841; Poor v. Carlton, 3 Sumn. 78, F. C. 11,272; Berry v. Sawyer, 19 Fed. 290; Mason v. Jones, 16 Fed. Cas. 1041; Dugan v. Gittings, 3 Gill, 158, 43 Am. Dec. 314; Neale v. Hagthorp, 3 Bland Ch. 568; Shackelford v. Brown, 72 Miss. 387, 17 So. 898; Gamble v. Johnson, 9 Mo. 628. See also Commonwealth v. Cullen, 13 Pa. St. 143, 53 Am. Dec. 458, where rule approved in general discussion.

Equity — Evidence.— Answer of one defendant is not evidence against co-defendant, p. 160.

Cited and applied in Lenox v. Natrebe, Hemp. 257, F. C. 8,246c, holding that infants cannot be prejudiced by misstatements of guardian in answer to bill for cancellation of mortgage; Collier v. Chapman, 2 Stew. 166, 167, holding inadmissible against co-defendant answer of another defendant tending to invalidate title made by latter; Moore v. Hubbard, 4 Ala. 192, as to answer in action against partnership for settlement of accounts; Robinson v. Sampson, 23 Me. 389, in proceeding to set aside mortgage on ground of fraud; Martin v. Martin, 13 Mo. 64, holding rights of heirs not prejudiced by faulty answer of administrator; Van Derveer v. Holcomb, 17 N. J. Eq. 553, holding in action to foreclose mortgage, answer of owner could not prejudice his co-defendant, the second mortgagee; Judd v. Seaver, 8 Paige Ch. 553, as to admission by joint maker of note, in proceedings for relief on ground of usury.

Rule approved in McElroy v. Ludlum, 32 N. J. Eq. 831, discussing general subject.

Distinguished in Barraque v. Siter, 9 Ark. 547, 550, and Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland Ch. 267, where defendants interested jointly as partners; Christie v. Bishop, 1 Barb. Ch. 116, holding heirs bound by admissions of testator implied from failure to answer; Pettit v. Jennings, 2 Rob. (Va.) 681, denying application of rule where one defendant claimed title through other.

Bankruptcy.— Discharge in bankruptcy will not protect debtor against debt contracted in foreign jurisdiction, p. 162.

Cited in Davidson v. Smith, 1 Biss. 349, F. C. 3,608, denying extra-territorial effect of State insolvency laws.

Agency.— Subsequent ratification of unauthorized act is equivalent to original authority, p. 161.

Cited and applied in Mason v. Crosby, 1 Wood. & M. 358, F. C. 9,234, holding that where agent guilty of fraud in sale of land, owners, by accepting purchase price, became parties to such fraud; Jones v. Atkinson, 68 Ala. 170, as to unauthorized sale of personal property, holding, further, subsequent ratification irrevocable; Byrne v. Doughty, 13 Ga. 53, holding that conduct of principal should be construed liberally in favor of agent; Mathews v. Gilliss, 1

Iowa, 254, applying principle where attorney in fact exceeded authority in selling land and principal demanded specific performance of contract; Davison v. Davenport, etc., Co., 24 Iowa, 424, where alleged principal received consideration, although contract made by agent in his own behalf; Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland Ch. 278, as to power of partner to bind copartners by contract for partnership purposes; Merrifield v. Parritt, 11 Cush. 597, holding principal estopped from denying authority of agent where he acquiesced in acts done under it; Grant v. Beard, 50 N. H. 133, holding that such ratification relates back to original transaction, and suit against party ratifying is not based upon act of ratification; Marshall v. Hann, 17 N. J. L. 431, ruling similarly where alleged principal failed to dissent within reasonable time after act done; Pentz v. Stanton, 10 Wend. 276, as to unauthorized act in drawing bill of exchange; followed in Moss v. Averell, 10 N. Y. 454, holding that where officer of corporation contracts on behalf of corporation, he is estopped, in suit brought against him as stockholder, to deny authority of corporation to so contract; Newton v. Bronson, 13 N. Y. 594, 67 Am. Dec. 93, as to ratification by executor of unauthorized sale of lands; McMahan v. McMahan, 13 Pa. St. 381, 53 Am. Dec. 484, as to subsequent ratification by coparcener of parol partition; Colwell v. Bank, 16 R. I. 290, 15 Atl. 81, as to power of partner to bind co-partners in contract for partnership purposes; Devendorf v. Oil Co., 17 W. Va. 170, where authorities are collected and discussed. Cited also in general discussion in the following cases: Haskell v. Cornish, 13 Cal. 48; Kenyon v. Williams, 19 Ind. 46; in Citizens' Bk. v. Millet, 44 S. W. 372, to point that agent subscribing contract, as such, is still bound if the wording imports a personal undertaking.

Distinguished in Delafield v. Illinois, 26 Wend. 226, holding that doctrine of estoppel cannot operate, as against State, on unauthorized contract of agent. Limited in Dodge v. Hopkins, 14 Wis. 639, holding that where person seeking advantage of ratification is one who ratified contract, consent of other party to such ratification must have been obtained.

9 Cr. 164–172, 3 L. 691, FINLEY v. WILLIAMS.

Public lands.— As between pre-emption rights, the prior improvement will hold the land as against a prior certificate, entry, survey and patent, p. 167.

Cited and applied in Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 86, 20 L. 487, setting aside patent issued to third party after original improvement by pre-emptioner (see also S. C. reported in 2 Neb. 490, app.); McAfee v. Keirn, 7 Smedes & M. 789, 45 Am. Dec. 333, sustaining pre-emption right under which all requirements have been complied with, as against older patent under which entry only has been made.

Boundaries.— Where monuments are relied upon to control courses and distances, they must be found as called for, p. 168.

Cited and applied in Pollard v. Shively, 5 Colo. 316, holding that where variation exists between monuments, and courses and distances in patent, patentee must keep up monuments sufficiently to give notice; so also in Patin v. Blaize, 19 La. 400, 401; Alshire v. Hulse, Wright, 171, 5 Ohio, 534, holding void for uncertainty a call for "a beech tree" in forest of such trees; McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 314, holding that where monuments called for possess but local notoriety, they must be proved by party asserting validity of entry.

9 Cr. 173–179, 3 L. 694, McIVER'S LESSEE v. WALKER.

Boundaries — Courses.— If nothing exists to control calls for courses and distances, land must be bounded by courses and distances of patent, according to magnetic meridian, p. 177.

Cited and applied in Wells v. Jackson, etc., Co., 47 N. H. 260, 90 Am. Dec. 580, construing term "due," as prefixed to designation of course; Brooks v. Tyler, 2 Vt. 350, applying rule where plaintiff in ejectment described land only by course and distance, and without monument except at point of beginning. And see note, 90 Am. Dec. 592, on general subject.

Boundaries.— Monuments designated in patent will control courses and distances, p. 178.

Cited and applied in Blake v. Doherty, 5 Wheat. 372, 5 L. 112, holding that such monuments may be proven by testimony not found in grant; Cleaveland v. Smith, 2 Story, 291, F. C. 2,874, where, in grant to town, natural object held to prevail over clearly-defined course, although lines thus formed were widely divergent; Guilmartin v. Wood, 76 Ala. 210, applying rule where land described as certain "lot," and holding parol evidence admissible to show location; Wise v. Burton, 73 Cal. 171, 14 Pac. 681, holding, further, that surveyors' field notes are admissible to show location of monument; Higley v. Bidwell, 9 Conn. 452, under facts similar to those in principal case; Alshire v. Hulse, 5 Ohio, 535, holding that proof that posts were set up at corners of land conveyed controls calls for distance; Urquehardt v. Burleson, 6 Tex. 511, correcting survey calling for wrong course; Racine v. J. Case, etc., Co., 56 Wis. 542, 14 N. W. 600, applying principle in determining location of city streets. Cited also in the following cases discussing the general subject, but without particular application to the point at issue: Croghan v. Nelson, 3 How. 193, 11 L. 557; Clements v. Pearce, 63 Ala. 292; dissenting opinion, People v. San Francisco, 75 Cal. 406, 17 Pac. 530; Daggett v. Wiley, 6 Fla. 506; Riley v. Griffin, 16 Ga. 147, 60 Am. Dec. 729. And see note, 40 Am. Dec. 110.

Distinguished in Claremont v. Carlton, 2 N. H. 372, holding parol evidence inadmissible to establish location of monument otherwise indeterminable; so also in Bowman v. Farmer, 8 N. H. 403. Limited in McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 315, holding that where calls are repugnant court will adopt those appearing to be consistent.

Boundaries.— If patent refer to plat annexed, resort may be had to it to correct repugnancies in description in patent, p. 179.

This rule is cited and applied in Brown v. Clements, 3 How. 672, 11 L. 778, where patent described land as "southwest quarter of fractional section 22;" United States v. Texas, 162 U. S. 37, 40 L. 879. 16 S. Ct. 733, referring to map annexed to treaty of 1819 with Spain, to determine boundary line of Texas; Knowles v. Nichols, 2 Curt. 574, F. C. 7,897, where rule applied in determining extent of right conveyed by grant from State, of common for purposes of taking seaweed; Chadwick v. Carson, 78 Ala. 120, allowing reference to former deed to determine bounds of land conveyed by mortgage; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 626, where map referred to in Mexican grant held to be part of grant, and to control uncertainties in description; Burk v. Baltimore, 77 Md. 472, 26 Atl. 869, holding that where ordinance providing for opening street refers to plat, such plat corrects inaccuracies in ordinance defining line of street; Coles v. Yorks, 36 Minn. 391, 31 N. W. 355, holding that where land described as being certain block, reference may be had to city maps to determine location; Wolfe v. Scarborough, 2 Ohio St. 368, referring to map, where deed described land by numbers of lots; Waterman v. Andrews, 14 R. I. 598, holding that reference in one deed to another "for more particular description" incorporates such description in former. Cited, arguendo, in Langdon v. New York, 93 N. Y. 147.

Distinguished in Martin v. King, 3 How. (Miss.) 146, holding map made under authority of United States land office inadmissible to vary prior Spanish grant.

Prize.— Where foreign vendor attaches condition that goods are not to be delivered until price paid, property remains in vendor, and is liable to capture as enemy's property, p. 189.

Rule applied, Blum v. The Caddo, 1 Woods, 65, F. C. 1,573, holding consignor to be merely agent of consignee for purposes of delivery to carrier, and denying former's right to sue carrier for loss of goods; Treadwell v. Anglo-American Packing Co., 13 Fed. 24, holding that where shipment is made under condition of payment before delivery, vendor is liable for any loss prior to such payment; Southern Express Co. v. Craft, 49 Miss. 496, 19 Am. Rep. 9, 10, sustaining right of consignor to sue carrier for loss of goods after former had indemnified consignee for such loss; Woolsey v. Bailey, 27 N. H. 219, holding that where shipper has general discretionary orders to ship goods, shipment is at his own risk, unless such shipment clearly designated to correspondent; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 577, holding that where factor purchases goods for principal, but with his own credit, property remains in him, and he may demand payment before delivery to principal. Set-off.— Debtor of United States cannot set-off claim for debt due him by United States, until such claim has been rejected by treasury department, p. 237.

This rule has been cited and the principle applied in Ware v. United States, 4 Wall. 629, 18 L. 392, where, in action against postmaster to recover moneys due United States, defendant claimed damages for wrongful discontinuance of office; United States v. Eckford, 6 Wall. 489, 18 L. 922, holding, however, that where such claim is properly presented and allowed, court has no jurisdiction to render judgment against United States for excess over latter's demand against defendant; Watkins v. United States, 9 Wall. 764, 19 L. 822, holding that such claim must be presented by items; Hall v. United States, 91 U. S. 562, 23 L. 447, as to claim of revenue officer for extra services, in action by United States for balance due on settlement of accounts; Yates v. United States, 90 Fed. 59, holding that books of department can be the only evidence of disallowance of claim; United States v. Peterson, 91 Fed. 855, holding set-off claimed for clerk's errors must, likewise, be presented to the treasury department; Mason v. Cooper, 19 Ga. 545, construing State statute to like effect; Moore v. Tate, 87 Tenn. 740, 10 Am. St. Rep. 721, 11 S. W. 938, construing strictly State statute regulating set-off in actions brought by State. Explained in Borden v. Houston, 2 Tex. 610, 612, denying right to set-off as against State, in absence of statute. The following cases cite the rule approvingly, but without particular application to the point at issue: United States v. Hawkins, 10 Pet. 132, 9 L. 372; Railroad Co. v. United States, 101 U. S. 549, 25 L. 1069; Robinson v. Bank, 18 Ga. 98.

Distinguished in Powers v. Bank, 18 Ga. 659, holding that where attorney has collected money due State, he may retain sufficient to satisfy claim due him from State for professional services.

Payment.— Comptroller of treasury may direct payment by marshal of money received on execution, p. 237.

Distinguished in Walker v. Chapman, 22 Ala. 128, denying right of comptroller to receive money levied upon, before institution of proceedings against debtor.

Official bond.— Sureties are not liable for money received before execution of, p. 239.

Cited and rule applied in Myers v. United States, 1 McLean, 497, F. C. 4,755, holding further, that such seizure as well as place of seizure must be alleged in libel; The Tug May, 6 Biss. 244, F. C. 9,330, under similar facts; The Washington, 4 Blatchf. 102, F. C. 17,221, dismissing libel for want of averment of seizure; The Idaho, 12 Sawy. 163, 29 Fed. 192, in proceedings for violation of navigation laws; The Silver Spring, 1 Sprague, 552, F. C. 12,858, holding that in libel for violation of revenue laws, seizure by collector must be alleged; In re Moore, 66 Fed. 950, as to seizure for violation of internal revenue acts. Approved in general discussion in United States v. The Snowdrop, 30 Fed. 80.

Distinguished in The Rio Grande, 23 Wall. 464, 23 L. 159, holding that error of court in restoring vessel does not divest Circuit Court of jurisdiction on appeal.

Seizure.—Abandonment of, and restoration to owner before libel, divests court of jurisdiction, p. 291.

Cited and rule applied in Hall v. Warren, 2 McLean, 333, F. C. 5,952, holding that court will decree abandonment where captor refuses to proceed against goods in court of competent jurisdiction.

Limited in The Young America, 30 Fed. 791, holding that such restoration to owner must be made with intent to abandon seizure. Distinguished in The Rio Grande, 23 Wall. 464, 23 L. 159, holding that error of court in decreeing restoration will not deprive Circuit Court of jurisdiction on appeal; United States v. Wines, 8 Blatchf. 482, F. C. 15,892, holding that forcible dispossession does not work abandonment.

9 Cr. 292–338, 3 L. 735, PAWLET v. CLARK.

Conflicting grants.— Jurisdiction of United States courts extends to disputes arising from conflicting grants to same land by different States, p. 323.

Rule applied in Colson v. Lewis, 2 Wheat. 378, 4 L. 266, to same state of facts.

Dedication to public or pious uses is valid, although there be no grantee in existence, p. 331.

This rule has been cited and the principle applied in the following citing cases: Beatty v. Kurtz, 2 Pet. 583, 7 L. 527, sustaining right of church society, organized subsequent to grant, to maintain equitable action against holder of legal title; Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 436, 437, 8 L. 455, as to dedication of land for use of city as public square; Irwin v. Dixion, 9 How. 31, 13 L. 34, where grant was of land for highway for use of public at large; Vincennes University v. Indiana, 14 How. 274, 14 L. 419, sustaining reservation from sale, by State, of land for use of college to be subsequently incorporated; Ould v. Washington Hospital, 95 U. S. 313, 24 L. 452, holding valid, devise for charitable uses, to trustees to be appointed by congress; Baring v. Erdman, 2 Fed. C. 449, holding irrevocable, grant to municipal corporation of funds for support of orphan asylum; Town of Milwaukee v. City of Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 102, holding that, although legislature may change corporate limits of town, it cannot at same time transfer land belonging to town, as such, to adjoining city whose boundaries are made to include part of former. See also note, 35 Am. St. Rep. 532, on general subject. Cited also in general discussion in Yarmouth v. North Yarmouth, 34 Me. 418, 56 Am. Dec. 670.

Distinguished in East Hartford v. Hartford Bridge Co., 10 How. 536, 13 L. 529, in case involving grant of franchise to municipal corporation; Rice v. Railroad Co., 1 Black, 373, 17 L. 151, asserting right of congress to revoke conditional grant to territory before vested rights acquired. Rule limited in Pearsall v. Railroad Co., 161 U. S. 661, 40 L. 843, 16 S. Ct. 708, holding that where charter authorizes, in general terms, acts unnecessary to object of grant, legislature may revoke such powers, unless vested rights acquired under them.

Common law of England is the law of the particular States so far as applicable to conditions, and not abrogated by statute, p. 333.

Cited and applied in Bains v. Schooner James and Catherine, 1 Bald. 553, F. C. 756. holding that admiralty jurisdiction is referred to in Federal Constitution as limited by common law of England; dissenting opinion, Ex parte Holman, 28 Iowa, 126, on point that habeas corpus, being a common-law writ, State courts may under it inquire into legality of imprisonment by order of Federal courts. Cited approvingly also in United States v. New Bedford Bridge Co., 1 Wood. & M. 448, F. C. 15,867.

Distinguished in In re Barry, 42 Fed. 120, 127, F. C. 1,059 (see same case, 136 U. S. 607, 617, note, 34 L. 507, 510); Gatton v. Railway Co., 95 Iowa, 117, 63 N. W. 591, holding that common law forms no part of Federal jurisprudence; Lisbon v. Lyman, 49 N. H. 582, denying application of rule where subject regulated by statute.

Miscellaneous citations.— Cited in Robinson v. Bank, 18 Ga. 98, and dissenting opinion, Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 140, but application doubtful. Cited also in Mormon Church v. United States, 136 U. S. 52, 59, 34 L. 494, 497, 10 S. Ct. 806, 809, on point that congress, in exercise of plenary power over territories, may revoke grants made by them.

9 Cr. 339–358, 3 L. 752, OTIS v. WATKINS.

Pleading.— If facts stated in special plea do not amount in law to justification, yet if issue be joined thereon, and facts proved as stated, it is error to instruct jury that facts so proved cannot sustain issue on part of defendant, p. 355.

Applied in Lonergan v. Fenlon, 15 Fed. Cas. 804, holding that answer in equity must prevail unless overcome by testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and attending circumstances. Cited generally in Logan v. Mathews, 6 Pa. St. 421.

Public officer, vested with discretionary powers, is not liable for abuse of such power if he acted within his jurisdiction and without malice or fraud, p. 356.

Cited to this point in Gould v. Hammond, McAll, 237, F. C. 5,638, as to act of collector in selling perishable goods, holding further that shortness of notice of sale affords no presumption of fraud; United States v. The Reindeer, 27 Fed. Cas. 768, as to act of officer seizing vessel under mistake of fact.

Public officer.— If public officer, vested with discretionary powers, exercise malice in performance of his duties, he is liable for resulting injury, p. 358.

Cited and applied in Bailey v. Berkey, 81 Fed. 741, holding assessor liable in damages for maliciously making excessive assessment.

9 Cr. 359–367, 3 L. 758, THE ALERTA v. BLAS MORAN.

Prize.— If capture be made by privateer illegally equipped in neutral country, it is duty of prize court of such country to restore property, if brought within its jurisdiction, to owner, p. 364.

This rule is cited approvingly in the following cases in discussing the general subject: The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat. 71, 4 L. 517; The Schooner Tilton, 5 Mason, 471, F. C. 14,054; Hallett v. Lamothe, 3 Murph. (N. C.) 297.

Distinguished in Juando (Stroughton) v. Taylor, 2 Paine, 670, 677, 681, F. C. 7,558, denying application of rule when capture made by foreign cruiser on high seas and prize not brought into American port.

Salvage will not be decreed for services from which wrecked vessel derived no advantage, p. 367.

This rule is applied in The Narragansett, Olcott, 392, F. C. 10,020, denying right of vessel to claim as salvor, where she rendered no assistance, although participating in search; Clarke v. The Dodge Healy, 4 Wash. 657, F. C. 2,849, denying claim of persons forcibly taking possession of vessel exposed to danger, against will of master; Byrne v. Johnson, 53 Fed. 842, 2 U. S. App. 520, holding that act of salvors, in unnecessarily proceeding to port where cargo will not sell to advantage, will operate to reduce amount of salvage.

9 Cr. 368–372, 3 L. 762, THE GROTIUS.

Prize.— In order to constitute a capture, some act should be done indicative of intention to seize and retain as prize, p. 370.

9 Cr. 372–374, 3 L. 763, GETTINGS v. BURCH.

Practice.— It is error to decide cause against answer of defendant, if answer has not been denied by replication, nor contradicted by evidence appearing in record, p. 374.

Cited in Sarchet v. The Sloop Davis, Crabbe, 193, F. C. 12,357, holding that dismissal, in order to be bar to second suit, must have been ordered on merits of cause. Approved in Parton v. Prang, 3 Cliff. 542, F. C. 10,784, in general discussion.

Miscellaneous citations.— Referred to in Scott v. Burch, 6 Harr. & J. 70, as instance of practice.

9 Cr. 374–387, 3 L. 764, UNITED STATES v. BRYAN AND WOODCOCK.

Payment — Priority of United States.— Act of congress, providing for, did not apply to debt previously contracted, p. 387.

Cited in State v. Harris, 2 Bailey L. 600, on point that right of State to priority of payment is not common-law right, and cannot exist in absence of statute.

9 Cr. 387, 388, 3 L. 768, THE BRIG CONCORD.

Duties.— Where goods are brought by superior force, or by inevitable necessity, into United States, they are not to be deemed so imported as to attach right to duties, p. 388.

This rule has been applied in Merritt v. One Package, 30 Fed.

197, 198, and Cargo ex Lady Essex, 39 Fed. 767, where vessel driven ashore by stress of weather; United States v. Celluloid, 82 Fed. 632, holding that goods will not be forfeited, where unlawfully brought into country by mere trespasser, and not by consent of owner.

Duties.— If goods seized for violation of revenue laws are restored to owner under order of court, and sold in country, they become retroactively liable to payment of duties, p. 388.

Cited in The Waterloo, 1 Blatchf. & H. 121, F. C. 17,257, applying rule where lower court ordered derelict goods sold and duties paid thereon; Followed in The Nereide, 1 Wheat. 178, 4 L. 65, and Prince v. United States, 2 Gall. 209, F. C. 11,425; Jackson v. United States, 4 Mason, 190, F. C. 7,149, ruling similarly where goods found derelict and imported voluntarily.

Miscellaneous citations.— Cited in Cross v. United States, 1 Gall. 31, F. C. 3,434, as illustrating distinction between proceedings in admiralty and at common law.

9 Cr. 388–455, 3 L. 769, THE NEREIDE.

Domicile.— Merchant having fixed residence and place of business, does not acquire foreign commercial character by occasional visit to another country, p. 413.

Cited and applied in Cadwalader v. Howell, 18 N. J. L. 144, holding that absence from residence does not deprive person of right to vote, if such absence be with intent to return.

International law.— Stipulation in treaty, that "neutral bottoms make neutral goods," does not include, by inference, rule that "enemies' bottoms make enemies' goods," p. 419.

Cited and applied in El Telegrafo, Newb. 386, F. C. 15,049, holding that where neutral has acquired domicile in enemy's country, his goods will be deemed enemy's goods. See also note, 2 Wheat. 244, 248, 4 L. 230, 231, on general subject of rights of neutrals.

Evidence.— A witness ought never to swear to inferences, without stating the train of reasoning by which his mind has been led to them, pp. 416, 417.

This language is quoted in State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 691, 28 S. E. 821, in discussing, generally, the subject of opinions as evidence.

Neutral goods may be shipped on board belligerent armed vessel, and will not be affected if owner gives no aid to such vessel in combat, p. 425.

Affirmed in The Atlanta, 3 Wheat. 415, 419, 4 L. 423, 424, a case involving similar facts.

Blockade, breach of.— Sailing with intent to break blockade, constitutes cause for confiscation, p. 440.

Applied in United States v. Packages, 27 Fed. Cas. 286, holding mere loading on vessel with intent to ship to blockaded port, cause for forfeiture of goods.

Miscellaneous citations.— Cited in In re Aubrey, 26 Fed. 851, on point that comity to be extended to foreign governments depends upon congress, and not upon the judiciary; also in The Parkhill, 18 Fed. Cas. 1197, but application doubtful.

9 Cr. 456–502, 3 L. 791, PRATT v. LAW.

Streets.— Grantee of land bounded by street or alley, is entitled to right of way over it, as appurtenant to grant, p. 491.

Cited and applied in Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 434, 435, 17 Am. St. Rep. 682, 683, 10 S. E. 690, holding conveyance of such street void, if it impairs grantee's right of way.

Contract, part performance.— Where vendor is unable to fully perform contract for sale of lands, equity will confirm conveyance of part already made and decree repayment of proportionate part of purchase money with interest, p. 494.

This rule is cited and applied in Warner v. Daniels, 1 Wood. & M. 113, 114, F. C. 17,181, holding that equity will relieve as to part of contract, although rescinding as to other part on ground of fraud; Palmer v. Gould, 144 N. Y. 675, 39 N. E. 380, holding that where defendant contracts to convey land, to part of which he has not title, equity will order conveyance to extent of interest. The rule is cited approvingly in general discussion in Veazie v. Willlams, 8 How. 160, 161, 12 L. 1029, 1030; Foster v. Swasey, 2 Wood. & M. 221, F. C. 4,984; Kirksey v. Mitchell, 8 Ala. 411.

Specific performance will not be decreed, when impossible or unreasonable, p. 494.

Cited and applied in Taylor v. Langworth, 14 Pet. 175, 10 L. 406, holding that such remedy may be barred by lapse of time; Garnett v. Macon, 2 Brock. 247, F. C. 5,245, applying rule where contract unreasonable when made; Langworth v. Taylor, 1 McLean, 401, F. C. 8,490 (see 14 Pet. 175, 10 L. 406, supra); McKay v. Carrington, 1 McLean, 65, F. C. 8,841, denying specific performance, because of laches of plaintiff; Aday v. Echols, 18 Ala. 357, 52 Am. Dec. 227, holding that contract must be proved as alleged in bill; dissenting opinion, Rogers v. Saunders, 16 Me. 104, majority decreeing specific performance where complainant, because of laches, barred from remedy at law; McAusland v. Pundt, 1 Neb. 252, 93 Am. Dec. 371, refusing decree where complainant guilty of negligence in performance of his part of contract; Hadlock v. Williams, 10 Vt. 572, where defendant had no title to land, contracted to be conveyed;

Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call (Va.), 372, holding that in order to decree specific performance at instance of vendor, his title must be unquestionable; Boaten v. Scheffer, 21 Gratt. 495, denying decree where complainant failed to perform on his part.

Specific performance.— Although bill for, fails, court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction, may give compensation to complainant in quantum damnificatus, p. 494.

This rule is cited and applied in Kelly v. Allen, 34 Ala. 669, in proceedings for injunction to restrain action at law on note, and allowing damages for fraud in executing note; Powell v. Higley, 90 Ala. 109, 7 So. 441, where bill failed, but compensation decreed for improvements made on land; Whitsett v. Kershaw, 4 Colo. 432, on point that equity may render decree for complainant under prayer for general relief, although prayer for specific relief denied; Woodman v. Freeman, 25 Me. 547, 555, awarding damages in case of fraud where no complete remedy at law; Rutherford v. Williams, 42 Mo. 37, in proceedings for accounting, decreeing as damages, defendant's profits as trustee; Van Allen v. Railroad Co., 144 N. Y. 180, 38 N. E. 998, allowing damages for breach of contract, where complainant in good faith prayed for specific performance, not knowing of defendant's inability to perform; Nagle v. Newton, 22 Gratt. 820, under facts similar to principal case; Mason v. Bridge Co., 17 W. Va. 422, in proceedings for injunction, awarding damages for injury received during continuance of wrongful acts. The rule is approved, in general discussion, in the following cases: Veazie v. Williams, 8 How. 160; Magic, etc., Co. v. Elm City Co., 13 Blatchf. 158, F. C. 8,949; Rider v. Gray, 10 Md. 300, 69 Am. Dec. 139; Mitchell v. Sheppard, 13 Tex. 490.

Distinguished in Blanchard v. Railroad Co., 31 Mich. 59, 18 Am. Rep. 155, denying application of rule, where there was no means of computing damages.

Attachment.— Equitable interests are liable to, in Maryland, by statute, p. 496.

Cited and rule applied in Coombs v. Jordan, 3 Bland. Ch. 319, 22 Am. Dec. 266, sustaining attachment of equitable interest in land; May v. Buckhannon, etc., Co., 70 Md. 450, 17 Atl. 275, holding, however, that mere issuing of writ of attachment, does not create lien on such equitable interest. Cited approvingly in Dowdy v. Blake, 50 Ark. 211, 7 Am. St. Rep. 90, 6 S. W. 898. Explained in Sawyer v. Morte, 3 Cr. C. C. 332, 333, F. C. 12,401, and Van Ness v. Hyatt, 5 Cr. C. C. 146, F. C. 16,867.

Denied in Platt v. Oliver, 2 McLean, 298, F. C. 11,115, applying common-law rules.

Subrogation.— One who has paid amount due on mortgage of land in which he had certain interest, may hold land as if mortgage still subsisted, until reimbursed by mortgagor, p. 499.

Cited and rule applied in Wilson v. Kimball, 27 N. H. 307, holding that such payment may operate as assignment of mortgage, although understood between parties to be discharge; Aiken v. Gale, 37 N. H. 505, and Bank v. Ackerman, 70 Tex. 321, 8 S. W. 47, holding further, that such payment creates lien on land covered by mortgage.

Distinguished in Robinson v. Leavitt, 7 N. H. 101, where party giving bond for payment of mortgage had no interest in land.

Miscellaneous citations.— Cited also in Brent v. Smith, 5 Cr. C. C. 673, F. C. 1,841, but application doubtful.

ABANDONMENT—5.

It is not necessary, in an action of covenant on a policy, that the declaration should aver that the plaintiff had abandoned to the underwriters.
Hodgson v. The Marine Ins. Co., (100) 48

ABANDONMENT—6.

1. The agent, who makes insurance for his principal, has authority to abandon without a formal letter of attorney.
Cheasapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, (268) 220
2. The informality of a deed of cession is unimportant, because, if the abandonment be unexceptionable, the property vests immediately in the underwriters, and the deed is not essential to the rights of either party. Id. (Ib.) 220
3. If the abandonment be legal, it puts the underwriters completely in the place of the assured, and the agent of the assured becomes the agent of the underwriters. Id. (Ib.) 220
4. A special verdict is defective which does not find whether the abandonment was in reasonable time. Id. (Ib.) 220
5. What is reasonable time of abandonment is a question compounded of fact and law, which must be found by a jury under the direction of a court.
Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, (269) 220
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden, (338) 242
6. The right to abandon may be kept in suspense by mutual consent.
Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., (274) 222

ABANDONMENT—7.

1. Upon a policy on a cargo the underwriters are not liable for freight, whether there be an abandonment or not. Caze and Richaud v. Baltimore Ins. Co., (358) 370
2. The question whether the abandonment were made in due time, is not a question of fact to be exclusively left to a jury, but to be decided by them under the direction of the court.
Livingston v. Mar'd. Ins. Co., (506) 421

ABANDONMENT—8.

If a cargo consists partly of memorandum articles, no abandonment, for mere deterioration in value during the voyage, can be valid unless the damage, on the non-memorandum articles, exceed a moiety of the value of the whole cargo including the memorandum articles.
Marcadier v. Ches. Ins. Co., (39) 481

ABATEMENT—7.

1. A plaintiff who has declared jointly against two defendants, as being in custody, when, in fact, only one of the defendants was taken on the capias, cannot abate his own action against the party not taken, unless authorized so to do by the return of the process against that party.
Barton v. Petit and Bayard, (194) 313
2. If the marshal of Virginia return that the defendant is no inhabitant of the District of Virginia, the suit shall abate as to such defendant.
Id. (Ib.) 313
3. The plaintiff in Virginia is not bound to declare until all the defendants have appeared, or the suit be abated as to such as have not appeared.
Id. (Ib.) 313

ABATEMENT—8.

1. See Bankrupt. (84) 496
2. If there be several tenants claiming several parcels of land by distinct titles, they cannot lawfully be joined in one writ of right; and if they be, they may plead in abatement of the writ.
Green v. Liter, (229) 545
3. If the demandant demand against any tenant more land than he holds, he may plead non-tenure as to the parcel not holden; but the writ shall abate only as to the parcel whereof non-tenure is pleaded and admitted, or proved.
Id. (Ib.) 545
4. Under the act of Kentucky to amend process in chancery and common law, the party may recover although he prove only part of the claim in his declaration; but it does not enable him to join parties in an action who could not be joined at the common law. Id. (Ib.) 545
5. Notwithstanding the act of Virginia of 1786, reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right, the tenant shall still have the full benefit of the ordinary pleas in abatement.
Id. (Ib.) 545
6. If tenants, claiming different parcels of land by distinct titles, omit to plead that matter in abatement, and join the mise, it is an admission that they are joint tenants of the whole; and the verdict, if for the demandant for any parcel of the land, may be general that he hath more mere right to hold the same than the tenants; and if of any parcel for the tenants that they have more mere right to hold the same than the demandant.
Id. (Ib.) 545

ABEYANCE—9.

Land, at common law, may be granted to pious uses before there is a grantee in existence competent to take it, and in the meantime the fee will be in abeyance. Town of Pawlet v. Clark, (293) 736

ACCIDENT—6.

To an action of debt for the penalty of an embargo bond, it is a good plea, under the act of Congress of the 12th of March, 1808 (s. 3), that the party was prevented from relanding the goods in the United States, by unavoidable accident.
Durousseau v. United States, (308) 232

ACCOMMODATION—5.

1. An accommodation endorser is liable to an action by the holder of a note made negotiable at the bank of Alexandria, although the maker has not been sued nor proved insolvent.
Yeaton v. The Bank of Alexandria, (49) 33
2. It is no objection to the liability of an endorser that he endorsed to accommodate the maker.
Id. (50) 34

ACCOUNT—5.

1. The exception in the statute of limitations, in favor of merchants' accounts, extends to all accounts current which concern the trade of merchandise. Mandeville et al. v. Wilson, (15) 23
2. It applies as well to actions of assumpsit as to actions of account. Id. (Ib.) 23
3. An account closed is not an account stated.
Id. (Ib.) 23

4. It is not necessary that any of the items should have been charged within the 5 years, nor that the declaration should aver the money to be due upon an open account between merchants. Id. (Ib.) 23

ACCOUNT—7.

1. An account current, sent by a foreign merchant to a merchant in this country and not objected to for two years, is deemed an account stated, and throws the burden of proof upon him who received and kept it without objection.
Freeland v. Heron et al., (147) 297
2. A final account settled with the Orphan's Court, by an administrator, is not conclusive evidence in his favor upon the issue of devastavit vel non. Beatty v. State of Maryland, (281) 343
3. A debtor of the United States is not entitled to credit for money received by an agent of an officer of the United States, whose office becomes extinct before the money is received by the agent.
United States v. Patterson, (575) 444

ACCOUNTS PUBLIC—9.

1. The comptroller of the treasury has a right to direct the marshal to whom he shall pay money received upon execution, and a payment according to such direction is good; and it seems he may avail himself of it, upon the trial, without having submitted it, as a claim, to the accounting officers of the treasury. U. S. v. Giles and others, (213) 709
2. No debtor of the United States can, at the trial set-off a claim for a debt due to him by the United States unless such claim shall have been submitted to the accounting officers of the treasury and by them rejected, except in the cases provided for by the statute.
Id. (Ib.) 709

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS—5.

See Deeds, 1. (22) 25

ACT OF CONGRESS—7.

1. The revival of an act of Congress may depend upon a future contingent event, to be made known by proclamation. The Aurora, (382) 378
Schooner Anne v. United States, (570) 442
2. When an act of Congress is revived, it is revived in that form and with that effect which it had at the moment when it expired. Id. (382) 378

ADJUSTMENT—8.

See Insurance, (55) 486

ADMINISTRATOR—6.

In Virginia, if the defendant die after interlocutory judgment and a writ of inquiry awarded, his administrator, upon scire facias, can only plead what his intestate could have pleaded.
M'Knight v. Craig's Administrators, (183) 193

ADMINISTRATOR—7.

See Account, 2, (281) 343

ADMINISTRATION—8.

So long as a qualified executor is capable of exercising the authority with which he has been invested by the testator, that authority cannot be conferred, either with or without limitation, by the Court of Ordinary, or any other person; and if, during such capability of the executor, the ordinary grant administration, either absolute or temporary, to another person, that grant is absolutely void. Griffith v. Frazier. (9) 471

ADMIRALTY—5.

1. The continental court of appeals in prize causes, had the power to revise and correct the sentences of the state courts of admiralty.
United States v. Judge Peters, (115) 53
2. In admiralty cases, an appeal suspends the sentence altogether; and the cause is to be heard in the Appellate Court as if no sentence had been pronounced. Yeaton et al. v. United States, (281) 101
3. If the law, under which the sentence of condemnation was pronounced, expire after sentence in the court below, and before final sentence in the Appellate Court, no sentence of condemnation can be pronounced, unless some special provision be made for that purpose, by statute. Id. (Ib.) 101
4. If errors appear upon the face of the report of auditors, it is not necessary to except.
Himely v. Rose, (313) 111
5. If the property ordered to be restored, be sold, interest is not to be paid. Id. (Ib.) 99
6. See Jurisdiction, 1, 17. (373) 99

ADMIRALTY—6.

1. In an action upon a policy on property warranted neutral, "proof of which to be required in the United States only," a sentence of condemnation in a foreign court of admiralty, upon the ground of breach of blockade, is not conclusive evidence of a violation of the warranty.
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Woods, (29) 143
2. The British orders in council of the 11th of November, 1807, did not prohibit a direct voyage from the United States to a colony of France.
King v. Delaware Ins. Co., (71) 155
3. A vessel having violated a law of the United States cannot be seized for such violation after the law has expired, unless some special provision be made therefor by statute.
United States v. Ship Helen, (203) 199
4. In order to prove the condemnation of a vessel, it is only necessary to produce the libel and sentence.
Marine Ins. Co. of Alexandria v. Hodgson. (206) 200
5. No sentence of condemnation can be affirmed if the law, under which the forfeiture accrued, has expired, although a condemnation and sale may have taken place, and the money paid over to the United States before the expiration of the law. This court, in reversing the sentence, will not order the money to be repaid, but will award restitution of the property, as if no sale had been made.
Schooner Rachel v. United States, (329) 239

ADMIRALTY—7.

1. In cases of admiralty jurisdiction, new evidence will be admitted in this court; and for that purpose a commission may issue.
Brig James Wells v. United States, (22) 256
Brig Clarissa Claiborne v. United States, (107) 284
2. The evidence of that necessity which will excuse a violation of an embargo law, must be very clear and positive. Id. (22) 256
3. Cases of seizure, upon waters navigable from the sea by vessels of more than 10 tons burthen, for breach of the laws of the United States, are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and are to be tried without a jury.
Whelan v. United States, (112) 286
4. The letter of Mr. Merry of the 12th of April, 1804, extended, to the island of Curracoa, the order of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, of the 5th of January, 1804, respecting the blockade of Martinique and Guadaloupe.
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Wood, (402) 385
5. A sentence of a foreign tribunal, condemning neutral property under an edict unjust in itself, contrary to the law of nations, and in violation of neutral rights; and which has been so declared by the legislative and executive departments of the government of the United States; changes the property of the thing condemned.
Williams v. Armroyd, (423) 392
6. A sale by the authority of the captors, before sentence of condemnation, is affirmed by such sentence as is good ab initio. Id. (Ib.) 392
7. A French tribunal at Guadaloupe had jurisdiction of property seized on the high seas for breach of the Milan decree, and carried into the Dutch part of the island of St. Martins, and there sold, by order of the Dutch governor of St. Martins, before condemnation and without any authority from the French tribunal at Guadaloupe. Id. (Ib.) 392
8. The American owner cannot reclaim, in the courts of this country, his property which has been seized and condemned in a French court under the Milan decree. Id. (Ib.) 392
9. An information, or libel for a forfeiture, must be particular and certain in all the material circumstances which constitute the offense.
Brig Caroline v. United States, (496) 417
Schr. Hoppet v. United States, (389) 380
Schr. Anne v. United States, (570) 442
10. An informal libel, or information in rem, may be amended by leave of the court. Id. (496) 417
Schr. Anne v. United States, (570) 442
Schr. Hoppet v. United States, (389) 380
11. In a count in a libel upon the 50th section of the collection law of March 2d, 1799; for unlading goods without a permit, it is not necessary to state the time and place of importation, nor the vessel in which it was made; but it is sufficient to allege that they were unknown to the attorney of the United States.

Locke v. United States, (339) 364
12. "Probable cause" means less than evidence which would justify condemnation. It imports a seizure made under circumstances which warrant suspicion. Id. (Ib.) 364
12. A vessel of the United States captured, condemned, sold, and purchased by her former master, a citizen of the United States, who obtained a Danish burgher's brief, and who cleared out of a port of the United States as a Dane, is a foreign vessel within the 5th section of the act of 9th January, 1808, supplementary to the embargo act; although she was really owned by a citizen of the United States. Schooner Good Catharine v. United States, (349) 367
14. Under the non-intercourse law a vessel, in March, 1811, had no right to come into the waters of the United States to enquire whether she might land her cargo.
Brig Penobscot v. United States, (356) 369
15. In a prosecution against a vessel for violating a law of the United States it is not necessary to adduce positive testimony of the identity of the vessel. Schooner Jane v. United States, (363) 372
16. The non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809, was, by force of the act of May 1st, 1810, and the President's proclamation of November, 2, 1810, revived on the 2d of February, 1811.
The Aurora v. United States, (382) 378
Schr. Anne v. United States, (570) 442
17. In a libel it is not necessary to negative any fact which constitutes the defense of the claimant.
Id. (383) 378
18. Wines, the produce of France, imported into the United States before the non-intercourse act, re-exported to a Danish island, there sold to a merchant of that place, and thence exported to New Orleans during the operation of that act of Congress, were liable to forfeiture under that law.
Schooner Hoppet v. United States, (389) 380
19. An information in the admiralty for a forfeiture must contain a substantial statement of the offense. A general refercuce to the provisions of the statute is not sufficient. If the information be defective in that respect, the defect is not cured by evidence of the facts omitted to be averred in the information. The decree must be secundum allegata, as well as secundum probata.
Schooner Hoppet v. United States, (Ib.) 380
20. By the 11th section of the act of 25th of April, 1808, vol. 9, p. 150, the collector had no right to detain a vesel and cargo after her arrival at her port of destination, under a suspicion that she intended to violate the embargo; and such detention could not be justified by instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, nor by the confirmation of the President. Otis v. Bacon, (590) 448
21. See embargo, 5, (113) 286

ADMIRALTY—8.

1. The penalty of the 50th section of the collection law of 2d of March, 1799, which requires a permit for the landing of goods imported, applies to goods the importation of which is prohibited by law. Harford v. United States, (109) 504
2. British property found in the United States on land, at the commencement of hostilities with Great Britain, cannot be condemned as enemy's property without a legislative act, authorizing its confiscation. The act of the legislature, declaring war, is not such an act.
Brown v. United States, (110) 504
3. Timber floated into a salt-water creek, where the tide ebbs and flows, leaving the ends of the timber resting on the mud at low water, and prevented, by booms, from floating away at high-water, is to be considered as landed.
Id. (Ib.) 504
4. After a declaration of war, an American citizen cannot lawfully send a vessel to the enemy's country to bring away his property.
The Rapid, (155) 520
5. A vessel, owned by citizens of the United States, on her voyage from Naples to the United States hears of the declaration of war between the United States and Great Britain, and, having a British license to carry her cargo to Great Britain, changes her course for that country; is captured by the British, libeled and acquitted upon her license; sells her cargo, purchases a return cargo, sails for the United States, and is captured by an American cruiser; good prize.
The Alexander, (169) 524
6. It is a good capture although only a prize-master be put on board.
Id. (Ib.) 524
7. Tho sailing, on a voyage, under the license and passport of protection of the enemy, in furtherance of his views or interests, constitutes such an act of illegality as subjects the ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war. The Julia, (181) 528
The Aurora, (203) 536
The Hiram, (444) 619
8. The acceptance and use of an enemy's license on a voyage to a neutral port, prosecuted in furtherance of the enemy's avowed objects, is illegal, and subjects vessel and cargo to confiscation.
The Aurora, (203) 536
9. It is not necessary, in order to subject the property to condemnation for sailing under an enemy's license, that the person granting the license should be duly authorized to grant it, provided the person receiving it takes it with the expectation that it will protect his property from the enemy. Id. (Ib.) 536
10. The case of a vessel and cargo, belonging to a citizen of one belligerent nation, captured on the high seas by a cruiser of the other belligerent, given to a neutral, and by him brought into a port and libeled in a court of his own country, between which and the nation to which the vessel originally belonged war breaks out before final adjudication, is a case of salvage; one moiety adjudged to the libelants and the other moiety to remain subject to the future order of the court below; and to be restored to the original owner after the termination of the war, unless legislative provision should previously be made for the confiscation of enemy's property found in the country at the declaration of war. The act of bringing in the cargo, although consisting of articles the importation of which was prohibited by law, was not, under such circumstances, a cause for forfeiture of the property. The Adventure, (221) 542
11. If a citizen of the United States establish his domicile in a foreign country, between which and the United States hostilities afterwards break out, any property shipped by such citizen before knowledge of the war, and captured by an American cruiser after the declaration of war, is good prize.
The Venus, (253) 553
12. Upon a shipment of goods to be sold on joint account of the shipper and consignee, or of the shipper alone, at the option of the consiguee, the right of the property does not vest in the consignee until he has made his election.
Id. (Ib.) 553
13. If two partners own jointly a commercial house in New York, and one of them obtain an American register for a ship, by swearing that he, together with his partner, of the city of New York, merchants, are the only owners of the vessel, when in fact his partner was domiciled in England, the vessel is liable to forfeiture under the act of Congress of December 31st, 1792, Laws United States, vol. 2, p. 133. Id. (Ib.) 333
14. Goods purchased by British merchants before the war between the United States and Great Britain, in pursuance of orders from American citizens, and shipped to the agent of the British merchants in the United States (who was also an American citizen) "on account and risk of an "American citizen," (no circumstances of fraud or unfairness appearing in the transaction) were vested in the American citizens at the time of shipment, and were not liable to condemnation, although the vessel sailed from England after the declaration of war was known there. But if goods be purchased as above, although the accompanying invoices, bills of lading and letters be addressed to the American citizens for whom the purchases were made, and all concur to show the property to be in them, yet if these documents be enclosed in a letter from the shippers to their agent in the United States, directing him not to deliver the goods in a certain event, nor until he should have received payment in cash, the property in the goods continued in the shipper at the time of capture, and they were liable to condemnation. Goods, by the same ship, purchased as above, and consigned to the agent of the consignors, (being an American citizen) in whose name the bill of lading is made out, but the bills of parcels and invoice in the name of the American merchants for whom the purchases were made; the shipment also being expressed to be on their account, although the goods are spoken of in the letter of the consignors as British property; vested in the American merchants at the time of shipment; and were not liable to condemnation. The circumstance that the goods continued, during the whole voyage, at the risk of the shippers is immaterial.

The Merrimack, (317) 575

15. A British subject, naturalized in the United States, went to Great Britain in a time of peace for the purpose of trade, but with the intention to return to the United States. He continued in Great Britain a year after knowledge of the war between Great Britain and the United States, for the purpose of winding up his business; but engaged in no new commercial transactions with the enemy, and actually returned to the United States in a little more than a year after knowledge of the war; yet he was considered as an enemy and his goods were condemned.
The Frances. Thompson's claim, (335) 581

16. Goods, appearing by the ship's papers to be a consignment from alien enemies to American merchants, were condemned in toto, although further proof was offered that American merchants were jointly interested, and that they had a lien upon the goods in consequence of advances made by them. Further proof on those points refused.
Id. (Ib.) 581

17. Where the affidavits produced on the order for further proof are positive, although their credibility be impaired by the non-production of letters mentioned therein, yet a second order for further proof will be allowed in the Appellate Court.
The Frances. Graham's claim, (348) 585

18. Goods shipped by a British merchant to an American house, (partly in conformity with orders, and partly without orders) who had an option to accept or reject the whole invoice in a limited time, remain the property of the shippers until the election be made to accept them. The Frances. Dunham and Randolph's claim, (354) 587

19. An intention of a consignor of goods to vest the right of property in the consignee is not sufficient to effect such a change of property until the goods are received by the consignee, or some evidence is given of his agreement to take them on his own account; until that time, the goods are at the risk of the shippers; and if they are enemies, the goods, if captured, are good prize. The result is the same, although the consignee be the agent of a third person who had directed him to order the goods, unless it appear that he did actually order them. The Frances. French's claim, (359) 589

20. The commercial domicile of a merchant at the time of the capture of his goods determines the character of those goods, hostile or neutral.
The Frances. Gillespie's claim, (363) 590

21. Property engaged in an illicit intercourse with the enemy is to be condemned to the captors —not to the United States. A municipal forfeiture under the laws of the United States is absorbed in the more general operation of the law of war. The prize act of 26th June, 1812, operates as a grant from the United States to the captors, of all property rightfully captured by commissioned privateers, as prize of war. The Sally, (382) 597

22. Further proof, inconsistent with that already in the case, will not be admitted.
The Euphrates, (385) 598

23. The forfeiture of goods, for violation of the non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809, takes place upon the commission of the offense and avoids a subsequent sale to an innocent purchaser, although there may have been a regular permit for landing the goods, and although the duties may have been paid. United States v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, (398) 602

24. A forfeiture under the 3d section of the act of 28th June, 1809, ch. 9, will overreach a bona fide sale to a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the offense. United States v. Brig Mars, (417) 609

25. No lien upon enemy's property, by way of pledge for the payment of purchase money, or otherwise, is sufficient to defeat the rights of the captors, in a prize court, unless in very peculiar cases where the lien is imposed by a general law of the mercantile world, independent of any contract between the parties.
The Frances. Irvin's claim, (418) 609

26. Where goods are sent upon the account and risk of the shipper, the delivery to the master is a delivery to him as agent of the shipper, not of the consignee; and it is competent to the consignor at any time before actual delivery to the consignee, to countermand it, and thus to prevent the consignee's lien from attaching.
Id. (Ib.) 609

27. Under the 8th section of the prize act of June 26th, 1812, the President had authority to issue the instructions of the 28th of August, 1812.
The Thomas Gibbons, (421) 610

28. The commissions of the privateers of the United States may be qualified and restrained by the instructions of the President.
Id. (Ib.) 610

29. A shipment made, even after a knowledge of the war, is to be considered as having been made in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, if made within so early a period thereafter as would leave a reasonable presumption that the knowledge of that repeal would produce a suspension of hostilities on the part of the United States.
Id. (Ib.) 610

30. By the mere act of illicit intercourse the property of a citizen is not devested ipso facto; it is only liable to be condemned as enemy property, or as adhering to the enemy, if rightfully captured during the voyage. Id. (Ib.) 610

31. The President's instructions of 28th of August, 1812, were meant to protect all British merchandise on board an American ship, without any exception on account of British proprietary interest.
Id. (Ib.) 610

32. A vessel sailing to an enemy's country after knowledge of the war, and taken bringing from that country a cargo, consisting chiefly of enemy goods, is liable to confiscation as prize of war.
The St. Lawrence, (434) 615

33. Suppression of papers where it appears to have been intentional and fraudulent, and attended with other suspicious circumstances, is good cause for refusing further proof. But where the suppression appears to be owing to accident or mistake, and no other suspicious circumstances appear in the case, further proof may be allowed.
Id. (Ib.) 615

34. Trading with the enemy is not excused by the necessity of obtaining funds to pay the expenses of the ship; nor by the opinion of an American minister, expressed to the master, that by undertaking the voyage he would violate no law of the United States. The Joseph, (451) 621

35. If an American vessel be captured on a circuitous voyage to the United States; in the former part of which voyage she had been guilty of conduct subjecting her to confiscation, although at the time of capture she is committing no illegal act, she must be condemned. Id. (Ib.) 621

36. Where the termini of a voyage are already fixed, the continuity of such voyage cannot be broken by a voluntary deviation of the master for the purpose of carrying on an intermediate trade.
Id. (Ib.) 621

37. A capture as prize of war may lawfully be made, within the territorial limits of the United States at any place below low water-mark.
Id. (Ib.) 621

38. Further proof will be allowed on the part of the captors as to the fact of capture.
The Grotius, (456) 623

ADMIRALTY—9.

1. See Embargo, 2, (55) 654

2. If a vessel be captured by a superior force, and a prize-master and small force be put on board, it is not the duty of the master and crew of the captured vessel to attempt to rescue her; for they may thereby expose the vessel to condemnation although otherwise innocent.
Brig Short Staple v. United States, (56) 655

3. See Non-Intercourse, 1, (102) 670

4. If a merchant vessel of the United States be seized by the naval force of the United States within the territorial jurisdiction of a foreign friendly power, for a violation of the laws of the United States, it is an offense against that power which must be adjusted between the two governments. This court can take no cognizance of it. The law does not connect that trespass with the subsequent seizure by the civil authority under the process of the District Court so as to annul the proceedings of that court against the vessel.
Ship Richmond v. United States, (102) 670

5. See Duties, 1, 2, (104) 671

6. If, upon the breaking out of a war with this country our citizens have a right to withdraw their property from the country of the enemy, it must be done within a reasonable time. Eleven months after the declaration of war is too late.
The St. Lawrence, (120) 676

7. The condemnation of a vessel as enemy's property, for want of a claim, cannot prejudice a claim for her cargo; but it is still competent for the claimant of the cargo to controvert the fact that the vessel was enemy's property, so far as that fact could prejudice his claim. The Mary, (126) 678

8. One claimant cannot be prejudiced by the contumacy of another. Id. (Ib.) 678

9. The holder of a bottomry bond cannot claim in a court of prize. Id. (Ib.) 678

10. The President's instructions (to privateers) of the 28th of August, 1812, protected an American vessel sailing from England, in August 1812, in consequence of the repeal of the British orders in council, and compelled by dangers of the seas to put into Ireland, where she was necessarily detained until April 1813, when she sailed again for the United States under the protection of a British license. The continuity of the voyage was not broken. Id. (Ib.) 678

11. See Non-Intercourse, 2, (181) 698

12. If a British merchant purchase with his own funds two cargoes of goods in consequence of, but not in exact conformity with, the orders of an American house, and ship them to America, giving the American house an option, within 24 hours after receipt of his letter to take or reject both cargoes; and if they give notice within the time that they will take one cargo but will consider as to the other, this puts it in the power of the British merchant either to cast the whole upon the American house, or to resume the property and make them accountable for that which came to their hands. The right of property in the cargo not accepted, does not, in transitu, vest in the American house, but remains in the British subject, and is liable to condemnation, he being an enemy.
The Frances, (183) 698

13. The produce of an enemy's colony is to be considered as hostile property so long as it belongs to the owner of the soil, whatever may be his national character in other respects, or whatever may be his place of residence.
30 hhds. Sugar v. Boyle, (191) 701

14. An island, in the temporary occupation of the enemy, is to be considered as an enemy's colony.
Id. (Ib.) 701

15. In deciding a question of the law of nations, this court will respect the decisions of foreign courts. Id. (Ib) 701

16. If the documentary evidence of the neutrality of the property be contradicted by the circumstances of the case, the court will not give time for further proof unless there be a probability that those circumstances can be satisfactorily explained. Cargo of the ship Hazard, (205) 706

17. See Freight, pro rata, (209) 707

18. This court will not allow a new claim to be interposed here, but will remand the cause to the Circuit Court, where it may be presented.
The Societe, (210) 707

19. See Salvage, 1, 2, (245) 720

20. A test affidavit ought to state that the property, at the time of shipment, and also at the time of capture, did belong, and will, if restored, belong to the claimant; but an irregularity in this respect is not fatal. A test affidavit, by an agent, is not sufficient, if the principal be within the country and within a reasonable distance from the court. But if test affidavits, liable to such objections, have been acquiesced in by the parties in the courts below, the objections will not prevail in this court.
Schooner Adeline, (245) 720

21. The property of persons domiciled in France (whether they be Americans, Frenchmen, or foreigners) is good prize, if recaptured after being 24 hours in possession of the enemy, that being the rule adopted in the French tribunals.
Id. (Ib.) 720

22. Further proof will be allowed by this court where the national character and proprietary interest of goods recaptured do not distinctly appear. Id. (Ib.) 720

23. Property unclaimed will be decreed as good prize. Id. (Ib) 720

24. If a seizure, by a collector, for the violation of the revenue laws of United States, be voluntarily abandoned, and the property be restored before the libel or information be filed and allowed, the District Court has not jurisdiction of the cause.
The brig Ann, (289) 734

25. The district courts of the United States (being neutral) have jurisdiction to restore to the original Spanish owner (in amity with the United States) his property captured by a French vessel whose force has been increased in the United States if the prize be brought infra præsidia.
The brig Alerta, (359) 758

26. In order to constitute a capture, some act should be done indicative of an intention to seize and retain as prize. It is sufficient if such intention is fairly to be inferred from the conduct of the captor. The Grotius, (368) 762

27. See Duties, 4, (387) 768

28. The stipulation in a treaty "that free ships "shall make free goods," does not imply the converse proposition, that enemy ships shall make enemy goods. The Nereide, (389) 769

29. The treaty with Spain does not contain, either expressly or by implication, a stipulation that enemy ships shall make enemy goods.
Id. (Ib.(769

30. The principle of retaliation, or reciprocity, is no rule of decision in the judicial tribunals of the United States. Id. (Ib.) 769

31. A neutral may lawfully employ an armed belligerent vessel to transport his goods, and such goods do not lose their neutral character by the armament, nor by the resistance made by such vessel, provided the neutral do not aid in such armament or resistance, although he charter the whole vessel, and be on board at the time of such resistance. Id. (Ib.) 769

AD QUOD DAMNUM—6.

1. An appeal lies to the Supreme Court, from an order of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, quashing an inquisition in the nature of a writ of ad quod damnum.
Custiss v. Georgetown and Alexandria Co., (233) 209

2. The Circuit Court for the District of Columbia has no jurisdiction, upon motion to quash an inquisition taken under the act, "to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's Causeway to Alexandria."
Custiss v. Georgetown and Alexandria Co., (233) 209

AGENT—6.

1. An agent who makes insurance for his principal has authority to abandon without a formal letter of attorney.

2. The United States are not bound by the declaration of their agent, founded upon a mistake of fact, unless it clearly appear that the agent was acting within the scope of his authority, and was empowered in his capacity of agent to make such declaration. Lee v. Munroe et al., (366) 373

3. If the plaintiff, by orders from the defendants, purchase goods for them and draw on them for the amount, they are bound to accept and pay his bills. If they do not, he may recover the amount thereof (and damages and costs, if he has paid the same) upon a count for money paid, laid out and expended, and the bills of exchange may be given in evidence on that count. If, after protest of the bills, the plaintiff sell the goods without orders, it shall not prejudice his right of action, although he render no account of sales to the defendants.
Riggs v. Lindsay, (500) 419

AGENT—9.

A test affidavit made by an agent is not sufficient to support a claim if the principal be in the country and within a reasonable distance from the court.

ALIEN—6.

1. A certificate by a competent court that an alien has taken the oath prescribed by the act respecting naturalization, raises a presumption that the court was satisfied as to the moral character of the alien, and of his attachment to the principles of the constitution of the United States, &c. Campbell v. Gordon, (176) 190
2. The oath of naturalization, when taken, confers the rights of a citizen. Id. (Ib.) 190
3. It is not necessary that there should be an order of court admitting him to become a citizen. Id. (Ib.) 191
4. The children of persons duly naturalized before the 14th of April, 1802, being under age at the time of the naturalization of their parent, were, if dwelling in the United States, on the 14th of April, 1802, to be considered as citizens of the United States. Id. (Ib.) 191

2. The answer of one defendant is evidence against other defendants claiming through him. Id. (Ib.) 136
3. The answer of a defendant, who is substantially a plaintiff, is not evidence against the other defendants. Id. (Ib.) 136

ANSWER—7.

1. An answer in chancery, responsive to the bill, is evidence for the defendant. Russel v. Clark, (70) 271
2. The defendant, to an attachment in chancery in Virginia, may plead the statute of limitations without answer. Wilson v. Koontz, (202) 315

ANSWER—9.

1. See Equity, 6, 7, (154) 688
2. A denial, in the answer of a defendant in chancery, that his testator gave authority to draw a bill of exchange, is not such an answer to an averment of such authority as will deprive the complainant of his remedy, unless the defendant also deny the subsequent assent of his testator to the drawing of such bill. *Clark's Executors v. 1. Under the bankrupt law of the United States, a joint debt may be set off against the separate claim of the assignee of one of the partners; but such set-off could not have been made at law, independently of the bankrupt law.
Tucker v. Oxley, (34) 29
2. A joint debt may be proved under a separate commission, and a full dividend received. It is equity alone which can restrain the joint creditor from receiving his full dividend until the joint effects are exhausted. Id. (35) 29
3. In distributing the effects of a bankrupt in this country, the United States are entitled to a preference, although the debt was contracted by a foreigner in a foreign country, and although the United States should have proved their debt under the commission of bankruptcy, and should have voted for an assignee. Harrison v. Sterry, (289) 104

4. Under a separate commission of bankruptcy against one partner, only his share of the joint effects passes. Id. (290) 104

5. The bankrupt law of a foreign country cannot operate a legal transfer of property in this country. Id. (Ib.) 104

BANKRUPT—8.

2. A vessel sailing ignorantly to a blockaded port is not liable to capture under the law of nations.
Id. (Ib.) 117

BLOCKADE—6.

1. In an action upon a policy on property warranted neutral, "proof of which to be required in the United States only," a sentence of condemnation in a foreign court of admiralty, upon the ground of breach of blockade, is not conclusive evidence of a violation of the warranty.
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Woods, (29) 143

2. Quære, whether breach of blockade by a vessel not warranted neutral would discharge the underwriters. Id. (Ib.) 143

3. If a vessel sail to a port within the policy, with intent to go to a port not within the policy, in case the former should be blockaded, this is not a deviation. Id. (Ib.) 143

4. A vessel might lawfully sail for a port in the West Indies, known to be blockaded, until she was warned off, according to the British orders of April, 1804.

BOND—5.

A bond cannot be delivered to one of the obligees as an escrow. Moss v. Riddle, (351) 123

BOND—6.

1. A bond, in an action upon which it would be necessary to assign breaches, and call in a jury to assess damages, is not assignable under the statute of Virginia. Lewis v. Harwood, (82) 160

2. If a vessel be driven by stress of weather to the West Indies, and the cargo be there detained by the government of the place, this is such a casualty as comes within the exception of "dangers of the seas," in the condition of an embargo bond. United States v. Hall, (171) 189

3. A bond, executed in pursuance of articles of agreement, may, in equity, be restrained by those articles. Finley v. Lynn, (238) 211

BOND—7.

1. Semb: It is a good defense, to an action upon an embargo bond, that it was given for more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, and that the master was constrained to execute it by the refusal of a clearance.
United States v. Gordon, (287) 347

2. If the original judgment be reversed, the reversal of the depeudent judgment on the "forthcoming bond" follows of course; but a special certiorari is necessary to bring up the execution upon which the bond was given so as to show the connection between the two judgments.
Barton v. Petit and Bayard. (288) 347

3. When a collector of revenue has given two bonds for his official conduct at different periods and with different sureties, a promise by a supervisor to apply his payments exclusively to the discharge of the first bond, although some of the payments were for money collected aud paid after the second bond was given, does not bind the United States, and does not amount to an application of the payments to the first bond.
United States v. January and Patterson, (572) 443

BOND—9.

1. A bond taken by virtue of the 1st section of the embargo law of Jan. 9, 1808, is not void although taken, by consent of parties, after the vessel had sailed. Speake v. United States, (28) 645

2. The obligors are estopped to deny that the penalty of such a bond is double the true value of the vessel and cargo.
Id. (Ib.) 645

3. The name of an obligor may be erased from a bond and that of a new obligor inserted, by consent of all the parties, without making the bond void. Such consent may be proved by parole evidence, and it is immaterial whether the consent be given before or after the execution of the deed.
Id. (Ib.) 645

4. Semb: That if the condition of a bond be to pay $1,700, or the duties which may be ascertained to be due upon certain goods imported, it is not in the option of the obligor to discharge the bond by payment of the $1,700; and that an obligee may recover even against the sureties, in an action at law upon the bond, more than the penalty.
Arnold v. United States, (105) 671

5. The sureties upon a marshal's bond are not liable for money received by the marshal upon execution before the date of the bond, although it remain in his hands after the date.
United States v. Giles and others, (213) 709

6. Quære, whether the sureties in a marshal's bond are liable for money received by him, after his removal from office, upon an execution which remained in his hands at the time of such removal.

CHARTER PARTY—8.

Where the general owner of a ship retains the possession, command and navigation of the same, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight for the voyage, the charter-party is to be considered as a mere affreightment sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership; but the general owner is to be considered as owner for the voyage, and, if he be master of the vessel, he cannot commit barratry. Marcardier v. Ches. Ins. Co., (40) 481

CHEROKEES—9.

In the treaty of the 25th of October, 1805, with the Cherokees, the reservation of three miles square for a garrison, lies below the mouth of the Highwassee, where the United States have placed the garrison. Meigs v. M'Clung's lessee, (11) 639

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—9.

1. The religious establishment of England was adopted by the colony of Virginia, together with the common law upon that subject, as far as it was applicable to the circumstances of the colony.
Terrett v. Taylor, (43) 650
2. The freehold of the church lands is in the parson. Id. (Ib.) 650
3. The act of Virginia of 1776, confirming to the church its rights to lands, was not inconsistent with the constitution or bill of rights of Virginia; nor did the acts of 1784, ch. 88, and 1785, ch. 37, infringe any of the rights intended to be secured under the constitution, either civil, political or religious.
Id. (Ib.) 650
4. The acts of Virginia of 1798, ch. 9, and 1801, ch. 5, so far as they go to divest the Episcopal Church of the property acquired previous to the revolution by purchase or donation, are unconstitutional and inoperative. Id. (Ib.) 650
5. The act of Virginia of 1798, ch. 9, merely repeals the statutes passed respecting the church since the revolution; and left in full operation of all the statutes previously enacted, so far as they are not inconsistent with the present constitution.
Id. (Ib.) 650
6. Church wardens are not a corporation for holding lands. Id. (Ib.) 650
7. Church lands cannot be sold without the joint consent of the parson (if there be one) and the vestry. Id. (Ib.) 650
8. If a grant be made of a tract of land in New Hampshire, in equal shares, to 63 persons, to be divided amongst them into 68 equal shares, with a specific appropriation of 5 shares, one of which is declared to be "for a glebe for the Church of England as by law established," that share is not holden in trust by the grantees, nor is it a condition annexed to their rights or shares.
Town of Pawlet v. Clark, (292) 735
9. The Church of England is not a body corporate, and cannot receive a grant eo nomine.
Id. (Ib.) 736
10. A grant to the church of such a place is good at common law and rests the fee in the parson and his successors. If such a grant be made by the crown it cannot be resumed by the crown at its pleasure. Id. (Ib.) 736
11. Land at common law may be granted to pious uses before there is a grantee in existence competent to take it, and in the meantime the fee will be in abeyance. Such a grant cannot be resumed at the pleasure of the crown.
Id. (Ib.) 736
12. The common law, so far as it related to the erection of churches of the Episcopal persuasion of England, the right to present or collate to such churches, and the corporate capacity of the persons thereof to take in succession, was recognized and adopted in New Hampshire.
It belonged exclusively to the crown to erect the church in each town that should be entitled to take the glebe; and upon such erection, to collate through the governor, a parson to the benefice.
A voluntary society of Episcopalians within a town, unauthorized by the crown, could not entitle themselves to the glebe.
Where no church was duly erected by the crown, the glebe remained as an hereditas jacens; and the state, which succeeded to the rights of the crown, might, with the assent of the town, alien or incumber it; or might erect an Episcopalian Church therein, and collate, either directly, or through the vote of the town indirectly, its parson, who would thereby become seized of the glebe jure ecclesiæ and be a corporation capable of transmitting the inheritance. Id. (Ib.) 736
13. By the revolution the state of Vermont succeeded to all the rights of the crown, to the unappropriated, as well as appropriated glebes; and by the statute of Vermont of the 30th October, 1794, the respective towns became entitled to the property of the glebes therein situated.
Id. (Ib.) 736
14. No Episcopal church in Vermont can be entitled to the glebe unless it was duly erected by the crown before the revolution, or by the state since.
Id. (Ib.) 736

CITATION—5.

1. If the defendant below, who was a feme sole, intermarries, after the judgment, and before the service of the writ of error, the service of the citation upon the husband is sufficient.

Where computation of time is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act is done is to be included. Arnold v. United States, (104) 671

CONCEALMENT—6.

1. The effect of a misrepresentation or concealment upon a policy, depends upon its materiality to the risk, which must be decided by a jury under the direction of a court.
Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co. (274) 222
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden, (338) 242
2. If a vessel take on board papers which increase the risk of capture, and if it be not the regular usage of the trade insured to take such papers, the non-disclosure of the fact that they would be on board will vacate the policy.
Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co. (274) 222

CONCEALMENT OF PAPERS—7.

See Insurance, 12, 13, (506) 421

CONFISCATION—6.

1. A writ of error lies to the highest court of a state in a case where the question is whether a confiscation under the law of the state was complete before the treaty of peace with Great Britain.
Smith v. Maryland, (286) 225
2. By the confiscating acts of Maryland the equitable interests of British subjects were confiscated without office found, or entry or other act done, although such equitable interests were not discovered until long after the peace. Id. (Ib.) 226

CONSIDERATION—5.

1. In a suit against the endorser of a promissory note, who endorsed to give credit to the maker, the consideration moving from the endorsee to the maker, upon the credit of the endorser, is a good consideration to support the assumpsit against the endorser.
Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, (49) 33
2. To constitute a consideration, it is not necessary that a benefit should accrue to the promisor; it is sufficient that something valuable flows from the promisee, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction. Violett v. Patton, (142) 61
3. Under the statute of frauds of Virginia it is not necessary that the consideration should be expressed in writing. That statute only requires the promise to be in writing. Id. (Ib.) 61
4. The endorsement of a promissory note is prima facie evidence of a consideration.
Riddle v. Mandeville, (322) 114

CONSIDERATION—7.

1. See assumpsit, 1, (273) 340
2. Although the consideration of a promissory note fail, by reason of the failure of the payee to perform his part of the agreement upon which it was given, yet if a new agreement, as a substitute for the old one, be entered into between the original parties to the note, this failure of the original consideration creates no equity in favor of the maker of the note against the indorsee, even in Virginia. Young v. Grundy, (548) 435

CONSIDERATION—9.

1. In a patent, the obliteration of the consideration does not make void the grant.
Polk's lessee v. Wendell, (87) 665
2. Quære, whether a subsequent incumbrancer can compel a prior incumbrancer to disclose the consideration which he gave for the notes of the debtor upon which his incumbrance was founded.

CONSTITUTION—6.

See Contract, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, (87) 162

CONSTITUTION—7.

An act of the legislature of a state, declaring that certain lands which should be purchased for the Indians should not thereafter be subject to any tax, constituted a contract which could not, after the adoption of the constitution of the United States, be rescinded by a subsequent legislative act; such rescinding act being void under the constitution of the United States.
State of New Jersey v. Wilson, (164) 303

CONSTITUTION OF VIRGINIA—9.

See Church of England, 3, 4, 5, (43) 650

CONSTRUCTION—9.

In cases depending upon the statutes of a state, the settled construction of those statutes, by the state courts, is to be respected.
Polk's lessee v. Wendell, (87) 665

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—5.

A long and uninterrupted practice under a statute is good evidence of its construction.

CONTRACT—6.

1. When a law is in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot devest those rights.
Fletcher v. Peck, (87) 162
2. A party to a contract cannot pronounce its own deed invalid, although that party be a sovereign state. Id. (Ib.) 162
3. A grant is a contract executed. Id. (Ib.) 162
4. A law, annulling conveyances, is unconstitutional, because it is a law impairing the obligation of contracts, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States. Id. (Ib.) 162
5. The court will not declare a law to be unconstitutional unless the opposition between the constitution and the law be clear and plain.

COSTS—6.

1. The court below, upon a mandate on reversal of its judgment, may award execution for the costs of the appellant in that court.
Riddle v. Mandeville, (86) 161
2. In all cases of reversal, if this court direct the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff in error, the court below will, of course, enter the judgment with the costs of that court.
M'Knight v. Craig, (184) 193

COSTS—7.

1. A copy of the transcript of the record obtained from the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States is not a part of the taxable costs of suit to be recovered by one party against the other; but the party who requests the copy must pay the clerk for it. Caldwell v. Jackson, (276) 341
2. See Fees, 1, (276) 341

COUNSELORS—7.

1. Two counselors only shall be heard on each side of any cause, whatever be the number of points or parties. General Rule, (1) 249
2. If the counsel do not furnish the court with a statement of the points of the case, the appeal will be dismissed.

COVENANT—6.

1. If the breach of covenant assigned be, that the state had no authority to sell and dispose of the land, it is not a good plea in bar to say that the governor was legally empowered to sell and convey the premises; although the facts stated in the plea as inducement are sufficient to justify a direct negative of the breach assigned.
Fletcher v. Peck, (87) 162

2. It is not necessary that the breach of the covenant should be assigned in the very words of the covenant. It is sufficient if it show a substantial breach. Id. (Ib.) 162

3. In an action of covenant on a policy under seal, all special matter of defense must be pleaded. Under the plea of covenants performed the defendant cannot give evidence which goes to vacate the policy.
Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, (206) 200

CREDIT, LETTER OF—7.

1. The construction of a letter of credit or guaranty must be the same in a court of equity as in a court of law. Russell v. Clark, (69) 271

2. To charge one person with the debt of another, the undertaking must be clear and explicit.
Id. (Ib.) 271

3. It is the duty of him who gives credit to another, upon the responsibility or undertaking of a third person, immediately to give notice to the latter of the extent of his engagements. Id. (Ib.) 271

4. A fraudulent recommendation will subject the person giving it to the damages sustained by the person trusting to it. Id. (Ib.) 271

5. A misrepresentation of the solidity of a mercantile house made, under a mistake of the fact, without any interest or fraudulent intention, will not sustain an action, although the plaintiff may have sustained damage by reason of such misrepresentation. Id. (Ib.) 271

6. A merchant who indorses the bills of another upon the faith of a guaranty of a third, cannot (upon the insolvency of the principal debtor and of the guaranty) resort to a trust fund created by the principal debtor for the indemnity of the guaranty for the amount which the guaranty should pay. But a person for whose benefit a trust is created, who is to be the ultimate receiver of the money, may sustain a suit in equity to have it paid directly to himself. Id. (Ib.) 271

7. When the guaranty is insolvent, a court of equity will not decree the money (raised for his indemnity) to be paid to him without security that the debt to the principal creditor shall be satisfied.

DOWER—7.

1. Courts of Chancery have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, in cases of dower, especially where partition, discovery, or account is prayed; and in cases of sale where the parties are willing that a sum in gross should be given in lieu of dower.
Herbert v. Wren, (370) 374
2. If a devise of land, in Virginia, to the widow, appear, from circumstances, to be in lieu of dower, she must make her election, and cannot take both.
Id. (Ib.) 374
3. If a wife join her husband in a lease for years, she is still entitled to dower in the rent.
Id. (Ib.) 374
4. A court of chancery cannot allow a part of the purchase money in lieu of dower, when the land is sold, unless by consent of all parties interested.

DUTIES—5.

1. See Copper, (284) 102
2. The law punishes the attempt, not the intention, to defraud the revenue by false invoices.
United States v. Riddle, (311) 110
3. A doubt respecting the construction of a law may be good ground for seizure, and authorize a certificate of probable cause. Id. (Ib.) 110
4. Duties upon goods imported do not accrue until their arrival at the port of entry.
United States v. Vowell, (368) 128
5. The duty upon salt, which ceased with the 31st of December, 1807, was not chargeable upon a cargo which arrived within the collection district before that day, but did not arrive at the port of entry until the 1st of January, 1808. Id. (Ib.) 128

DUTIES—8.

See Admiralty, 23, (398) 602

DUTIES—9.

1. The double duties imposed by the act of July 1, 1812, accrued upon goods which arived within a collection district on that day.
Arnold v. United States, (104) 671
2. To constitute an importation so as to attach the right to duties it is necessary, not only that there should be an arrival within the limits of the United States and of a collection district, but also within the limits of some port of entry.
Id. (Ib.) 671
3. Semb. that if the condition of the bond be to pay 1,700 dollars, or the duties which may be ascertained to be due upon certain goods imported, it is not in the option of the obligor to discharge the bond by payment of the 1,700 dollars, but the United States may recover, in an action at law upon that bond against the sureties, the whole amount of the duties on those goods, although the duties amount to more than the penalty of the bond.

Id. (104) 671
5. If captured goods claimed by a neutral owner, be, by consent, sold under an order of the court, and afterwards by the final sentence of the court, the proceeds are ordered to be restored to such owner, the amount of the duties due to the United States upon the importation of the goods must be paid.
But if the goods had been specifically restored, and withdrawn from the country, they would have been exempt from duties.

EMBARGO—6.

1. See Bond, 2. Accident, 1, (171, 307) 189, 232
2. It was no offense against the embargo law to take goods out of one vessel and put them into another, in the port of Baltimore, unless done with intent to export them.
Schooner Juliana v. United States, (327) 238

EMBARGO—7.

1. The evidence of that necessity which will excuse a violation of the embargo laws, must be very clear and positive.
Brig James Wells, (22) 256
2. The 3d section of the act of January 9, 1808, which prohibited the transshipment of goods, did not include the case of a vessel lading in port by means of river craft, &c.
Schooner Paulina, (52) 266
3. The 2d section of the act of 25th April, 1808, did not require a permit to lade any vessel; nor authorize the forfeiture and condemnation of the vessel or cargo for lading without the inspection of a revenue officer; the only penalty for such lading being the denial of a clearance. Id. (Ib.) 266
4. The departure of a vessel from the wharf of a port, and proceeding a mile and a half therefrom, with intent to go to sea, is not a departure from the port, within the meaniug of the 3d section of the supplementary embargo act of January 9th, 1808, if the vessel had not actually gone out of the port before seizure. The sloop Active, (100) 282
5. A vessel which has proceeded to a foreign port, contrary to the embargo act of January 9, 1808, is liable to be seized upon her return, although that act gives a penalty of double her value in case she should not be seized.
The brig Eliza, (113) 286
6. Upon an indictment for putting goods on board a carriage, with intent to transport them out of the United States contrary to the act of January 9, 1809, the punishment of which offense is a fine of four times the value of the goods, it is not necessary that the jury should find the value of the goods. *United States v. 3. If a collector justify the detention of a vessel under the 11th sec. of the embargo law of April 25, 1808 (vol. 9, p. 150), he need not show that his opinion was correct, nor that he used reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining the facts upon which his opinion was formed. It is sufficient that he honestly entertained the opinion upon which he acted. Otis v. Watkins, (339) 752
4. Quære, whether under that act the collector was bound to transmit to the President a statement of the facts upon which he formed his opinion, that the vessel intended to violate the embargo laws. Whether he was bound in law to use reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining the facts thus to be laid before the President; and whether he had a right under that act, to remove a vessel from one harbor to another, as well as to detain her.
Id. (Ib.) 752

ENDORSEMENT—5.

1. A blank endorsement on a blank piece of paper, with intent to give a person credit, is, in effect, a letter of credit; and if a promissory note be afterwards written on the paper, the endorser cannot object that the note was written after the endorsement.
Violett v. Patton, (142) 61
2. Before resort can be had to the endorser of a promissory note in Virginia, the maker must be sued, if solvent; but his insolvency renders a suit against him unnecessary.
Id. (Ib.) 61
3. In Virginia a remote endorser of a promissory note is liable in equity, but not at law.
Riddle v. Mandeville, (322) 114
4. An endorser has the same defense in equity against a remote as an immediate endorsee.
Id. (Ib.) 114
5. An endorser, sued in equity, has a right to insist that the other endorsers be made parties.
Id. (Ib.) 114
6. In Virginia, the holder of a promissory note with a blank endorsement has a right to fill it up to himself. Id. (Ib.) 114
7. The endorsement of a promissory note is prima facie evidence of a full consideration.
Id. (Ib.) 114
8. See Bank of Alexandria, 2, (49) 33
9. Quære, whether the undertaking of the endorser of a note to a bank in Virginia be not different from that of an ordinary endorser.
Yeaton v. The Bank of Alexandria, (Ib.) 33
10. See Accommodation, 1, 2, (Ib.) 33
11. The endorsor of a promissory note, who endorsed to give credit to the note, and who is counter-secured by property pledged, is not liable upon the note, nor in an action for money had and received, unless the plaintiff show that the maker is insolvent, or that he has brought suit which has proved fruitless. It is not sufficient to show that the maker is out of the reach of the process of the court. Dulany v. Hodgkin, (333) 117

EQUITY—5.

1. It is equity alone which can restrain a joint creditor from receiving his full dividend out of the separate effects of one of the partners until the joint effects are exhausted.
Tucker v. Oxley, (34) 29
2. See Jurisdiction, 10, 12. (191) 75
3. See Virginia, (234) 88
4. The first survey, under a military land warrant in Virginia, gives the prior equity.
Taylor v. Brown, (Ib.) 88
5. A subsequent locator of land in Virginia, without notice of the prior location, cannot protect himself by obtaining the elder patent.
Id. (Ib.) 88
6. In Virginia, the patent relates to the inception of title, and therefore, in a court of equity, the person who has first appropriated the land has the best title. Id. (Ib.) 88
7. The equity of the prior locator extends to the surplus land surveyed, as well as to the quantity mentioned in the warrant. Id. (Ib.) 88
8. In equity, time may be dispensed with if it be not of the essence of the contract.
Hepburn v. Auld, (262) 96
9. A vendor of land may compel a specific performance, if he can make a good title at the time of decree, although he had not a good title at the time, when by the terms of the contract the land ought to have been conveyed.
Id. (Ib.) 96
10. A court of equity will not compel a specific performance unless the vendor can make a good title to all the land contracted for.
Id. (Ib.) 96
11. See Jurisdiction, 12, (288) 103
12. See Endorsement, 3, 4, 5, (322) 114
13. Equity will make that party immediately liable who is ultimately liable at law.

14. See Kentucky, 6, (192) 76

EQUITY—6.

1. See Auditor, 1, 2, (8) 136
2. A court of equity may itself ascertain the facts, if the evidence enables it to do so, or may refer the question to a jury, or to auditors.
Field v. Holland, (Ib.) 136
3. After an issue ordered, a court of equity may proceed to a final decree without trying the issue, or setting aside the order. Id. (Ib.) 136
4. See Chancery, 2, 3, 4, (148) 181
5. See Evidence, 2, 3, 4, 6, (8, 51) 136, 149
6. If neither the debtor nor creditor has made the application of the payments, the court will apply them to the debts for which the security is most precarious. Field v. Holland, (8) 136
7. No writ of error or appeal lies to an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction.
Young v. Grundy, (51) 149
8. A bond executed in pursuance of articles of agreement may in equity be restrained by those articles. Finley v. Lynn, (238) 211
9. A complainant in equity may have relief even against the admissions of his bill. Id. (Ib.) 211

EQUITY—7.

1. He who has equal equity may acquire the legal estate, if he can, so as to protect his equity.
Fitzsimmons v. Ogden, (2) 249
2. A mortgage of land, made by one who has a legal and equitable title to a moiety of the property which the mortgage purports to convey, passes only his legal right, although he had a power, from the person who held the residue of the legal but not of the equitable estate in the land, to sell and convey his right also; the mortgageor not having affected to convey any part of it under his power from the other person, although his deed purported to mortgage the whole; and the equitable title not being in the person who gave the power. Shirras v. Caig and Mitchell, (34) 260
3. See Credit, letter of, 1, 6, 7, (69) 271
4. See Discovery, 1, (Ib.) 271
5. See Arbitration, 1, (171) 305
6. If A advance money to B, and B thereupon convey land to trustees in trust to convey the same to A in fee, in case B should fail to repay the money and interest on a certain day; and if B fail to pay the money on the day limited, and there upon the trustees convey the land to A, B has no equity of redemption.
Conway v. Alexander, (218) 321
7. Upon an action on a valued policy, if a misrepresentation of the age and tonnage of the vessel, whereby the underwriters were induced to agree to a high valuation, be a defense; it is at law, and not in equity.
Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, (332) 362
8. If an equitable title be merged in a grant, the party has no relief in equity, although the grant be void, because contrary to law.
Preston v. Tremble, (354) 369
9. See Agent, 2, (366) 373
10. See Dower, 1, 2, 3, 4, (370) 374
11. See Consideration, 2, (548) 435
12. The Circuit Court of Tennessee, as a court of equity, cannot award a writ of hab. facias possessionem to enforce its decree.
Wallen v. Williams, (602) 452

EQUITY—8.

1. If the case be clear, a court of equity will interpose to quiet the title.
Alexander v. Pendleton, (462) 624
2. See Purchaser, 2, 3, (Ib.) 624
3. See Specific performance, (471) 627

EQUITY—9.

1. A bill in equity to enjoin a judgment at law is not to be considered as an original bill, and therefore it is not necessary in a court of limited jurisdiction to make other parties, if the introduction of those parties should create a doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court.
Simms v. Guthrie, (19) 642
2. A complainant in equity cannot obtain a decree for more than he asked in his bill.
Id. (Ib.) 642
3. If the execution of an important exhibit of the complainant be not admitted by the defendant in his answer, who calls upon the complainant to make full proof thereof in the court below; this court will not presume that any other proof was made than appears in the transcript of the record.
Drummond v. Magruder, (122) 677
4. A copy of a deed from a clerk of the court, without the certificate of the presiding judge, that the attestation of the clerk is in due form, cannot be received as evidence in a suit in equity.
Id. (Ib.) 677
5. If this court reverse a decree upon a technical objection to evidence (probably not made in the court below), it will not dismiss the bill absolutely, but remand the cause to the court below for further proceedings. Id. (Ib.) 677
6. The answer of one defendant in chancery as not evidence against his co-defendant; nor his deposition, although he had been discharged under the act of assembly of Rhode Island (of 1757) from all debts and contracts prior to the date of the discharge; and although the debt in suit was a debt contracted prior to such discharge; the debt having been contracted in a foreign country.
Clark v. Van Riemsdyk, (153) 688
7. An answer in chancery, although positive, and directly responsive to an allegation to the bill, may be outweighed by circumstances, especially if it be respecting a fact which, in the nature of things, cannot be within the personal knowledge of the defendant. Id. (Ib.) 688
8. A denial of previous authority, without a denial of subsequent assent, is not such an answer as will deprive the complainant of his remedy; for a subsequent assent is equivalent to an original authority. Id. (Ib.) 688
9. In Kentucky, courts of law will not look beyond the patent, but courts of equity will; and will give validity to the elder entry against the elder patent.
Finley v. Williams, (164) 691

10. It is error to decide a cause against the answer of the defendant, if the answer be not denied by a replication, nor contradicted by evidence.
Gettings v. Burch, (372) 763
11. In a case where it would be difficult to ascertain the injury resulting from the breach of contract, or the sum in damages which would be a compensation for such injury, a court of equity will not themselves ascertain the injury, nor the damages, nor direct an issue quantum damnificatus.
Pratt v. Law & Campbell, (457) 792
12. Where a contract for the sale of land has been in part executed by the vendor who is unable to convey all the land, a court of equity will decree repayment of a proportionate part of the purchase money with interest.
Id. (Ib.) 792
13. If three persons mortgage their joint property to indemnify the drawer of bills of exchange for their accommodation, in case of protest; and if each of the mortgageors agree to take up a third part of the bills upon their return under protest, and if two of them neglect to take up their two-thirds, whereby the other mortgageor is compelled to take up the whole of the bills, in consequence of which he requests the drawer not to release the mortgage, but to hold it for his benefit, a lien in equity is thereby created upon the mortgaged premises to the amount of two-thirds of the bills, in favor of that mortgageor who took up the whole.
Id. (Ib.) 792
14. Quære, whether a subsequent incumbrancer can compel a prior incumbrancer to disclose the consideration which he gave for the notes of the debtor upon which his incumbrance was founded.
Id. (Ib.) 792
15. An equity of redemption in Maryland was liable to attachment before the Maryland act of 1810, ch. 60. Id. (Ib.) 792

3. See Damages, (13) 22
4. It is not error to suffer the parties to amend their pleadings.
Mandeville v. Wilson, (15) 23
5. An erroneous judgment of a competent court is not void.
Kempe v. Kennedy, (173) 70
6. It is no ground for a writ of error that the court below refused a new trial, moved for on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence.
Marine Ins. Co. v. Young, (187) 74
7. It is no ground for a writ of error that the judge below refused to re-instate a cause after nonsuit. United States v. Evans, (280) 101
8. A writ of error will be dismissed if neither party appears when the cause is called.
Radford v. Craig, (289) 104

ERROR—6.

1. No writ of error or appeal lies to an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction.
Young v. Grundy, (51) 149
2. See Costs, 1, 2. (86, 183) 161, 193
3. Error does not lie to the refusal of the court below to give leave to amend, or to grant a new trial, or to continue a cause.
Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, (206) 200
4. Amendments may be allowed by the court below, after judgment upon demurrer affirmed in this court. Id. (Ib.) 200
5. What would have been fatal in arrest of judgment is fatal upon a writ of error.

Smith v. Maryland, (286) 225

ERROR—7.

1. No writ of error lies to carry to the Supreme Court of the United States a suit which has been carried by writ of error from the District Court to the Circuit Court.
United States v. Goodwin, (108) 284
United States v. Gordon, (287) 347
2. The refusal of the court below to re-instate a cause which has been legally dismissed is no ground for a writ of error.
Welch v. Mandeville, (152) 299
3. A writ of error, issued in September, may bear teste of the February term preceding, and may be returnable to the next February term, notwithstanding the intervention of the August term between the teste and return of the writ.
Blackwell v. Patton, (277) 342
4. The Supreme Court of the United States will not quash an execution issued by the court below to enforce its decree, pending the writ of error, if the writ of error be not a supersedeas to the decree.
Wallen v. Williams, (278) 342
5. A writ of error does lie to an order of the court below to stay the proceedings finally upon suggestion of the attorney for the United States, in a case to which the United States are not parties. But this court will award a mandamus nisi, in the nature of a procedendo.
Livingston v. Dorgenois, (577) 444

ERROR—9.

1. It is not necessary that the transcript of the record should contain the names of the jurors.
Owens v. Hannay, (180) 697
2. See alien enemy, (Ib.) 697
3. If the facts stated in a plea do not amount to a justification in law, yet, if issue be joined thereon, and if the facts be proved as stated, it is error in the judge to instruct the jury that the facts so proved did not, in law, maintain the issue on the part of the defendant.

4. Copies of the proceedings in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Jamaica are admissible in evidence when certified under the seal of the court by the deputy-registrar, who is certified by the judge of the court, who is certified by a notary public.
Yeaton v. Fry, (335) 118
5. Depositions, taken under a commission issued at the instance of the defendant, may be read in evidence by the plaintiff, although the plaintiff had not notice of the time and place of taking the same.
Id. (Ib.) 118
6. See Payment, 11. Endorsement, 7, (322) 114

EVIDENCE—6.

1. The right to freedom, under the act of Maryland which prohibits the bringing of slaves into that state, is not acquired by the neglect of the master "to prove to the satisfaction of the naval officer, or collector of the tax, that such slave had resided three years in the United States," although such proof be required by the act.
Scott v. Ben, (3) 135

2. The answer of a defendant in chancery is evidence against the plaintiff, although it be doubtful whether a decree can be made against such defendant. Field v. Holland, (8) 136

3. The answer of one defendant in chancery is evidence against other defendants claiming through him. Id. (Ib.) 136

4. The plaintiff cannot avail himself of the answer of a defendant who is substantially a plaintiff; it is not evidence against a co-defeudant. Id. (Ib.) 136

5. In an action upon a policy on property warranted neutral, "proof of which to be required in the United States only," a sentence of condemnation in a foreign court of admiralty, upon the ground of breach of blockade, is not conclusive evidence of a violation of the warranty. Maryland Ins. Co. v. Woods, (29) 143

6. If an answer in chancery neither denies nor admits the allegations of the bill, they must be proved on the final hearing; but upon the question of dissolution of an injunction they are to be taken as true. Young v. Grundy, (51) 149

7. Under the plea of covenants performed, the defendant cannot give evidence which goes to vacate the policy. Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, (206) 200

8. In order to prove the condemnation of a vessel it is only necessary to produce the libel and sentence. It is a useless practice to read the proceedings at length. The depositions stated in such proceedings are not evidence in an action upon the policy of insurance. Id. (Ib.) 200

9. In an action upon a valued policy it is not competent for the underwriters to give parol evidence that the real value of the subject insured is different from that stated in the policy. Id. (Ib.) 200

10. A complainant in equity may have relief even against the admissions in his bill. Finley v. Lynn, (238) 211

11. If foreign laws are not proved to have been made in writing as public edicts, they may be proved by parol. Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co. (274) 222

12. A bill of lading is not conclusive evidence of property. Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden, (338) 242

EVIDENCE—7.

1. See Admiralty, 1, 2, (22) 256

2. An answer in chancery, responsive to the bill, is evidence for the defendant. Russel v. Clark, (69) 271

Brig Clarissa Claiborne, (107) 284
See Account, 1, 2, (147, 281) 297, 343

5. The mere possession of a promissory note, by an indorsee who had indorsed it to another, is not sufficient evidence of his right of action against his indorser, without a re-assignment or receipt from the last indorsee Welch v. Lindo, (159) 301

6. An indorsement "without recourse" is not evidence of money had and received by the indorser to the use of the indorsee. Id. (Ib.) 301

7. A recital in a deed is good evidence to take a case out of the statute of limitations. King v. Riddle, (168) 304

8. The principal obligor in a bond is not a competent witness for the surety, in an action on the bond; the principal being liable to the surety for costs, in case the judgment should be against him. Riddle v. Moss, (206) 317

9. When issue is taken upon the neglect of the postmaster himself, it is not competent to give in evidence the neglect of his assistant. Dunlop v. Monroe, (242) 329

10. Parol evidence is not competent to prove that one set of written instructions superseded another set of written instructions. Id. (Ib.) 329

11. A verdict and judgment that the mother was born free, is not conclusive evidence of the freedom of her children, unless between the same parties or privies. Wood v. Davis, (271) 339

12. Hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact which is, in its nature, susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge. Claims to freedom in Maryland are not exempt from that general rule. Mima Queen v. Hepburn, (290) 348

13. Upon general counts a special agreement executed may be given in evidence. Bank of Columbia v. Patterson, (299) 351

14. In a case of warranty and indemnity a judgment against the person to be indemnified, if fairly obtained, especially if obtained on notice to the warrantor, is admissible evidence in a suit against him on his contract of indemnity. Clark v. Carrington, (308) 354

15. Probable cause means less than prima facie evidence. Locke v. United States, (339) 364

16. In a prosecution against a vessel for violating a law of the United States it is not necessary to adduce positive testimony of the identity of the vessel. The schooner Jane, (363) 372

17. A paper purporting to be a record certified by the clerk to be "truly taken from the record of proceedings" of his court, with the proper certificate of the chief judge, &c., is admissible evidence. Ferguson v. Harwood, (408) 386

18. But if the paper purport to be a mere transcript of minutes extracted from the docket of the court it is not evidence. Id. (Ib.) 387

19. It need not appear by the record of naturalization that all the requisites, prescribed by law for the admission of aliens to the rights of citizenship, have been complied with. Stark v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., (420) 391

20. Semb: That the judgment of the court admitting the alien to become a citizen, is conclusive that all the prerequisites have been complied with, or that parol proof may be received in aid of the record. Id. (Ib.) 391

21. See North Carolina, (471) 408

22. An exemplification of a judgment of another state, properly authenticated, is conclusive evidence of the debt; consequently nil debet is not a good plea to an action of debt upon such a judgment. Mills v. Duryee, (481) 411

23. Bills of exchange taken up by the drawer, with damages and costs of protest, are admissible evidence in an action for money paid, laid out and expended by the plaintiff, against the drawee of the bills who are bound to honor them. Riggs v. Lindsay, (500) 419

24. The usage of trade may be proved by parol, although such usage originated in a law or edict of the government of the country. Livingston v. Md. Ins. Co., (506) 421

25. The record of a former judgment between the same parties, upon the same cause of action, may be given in evidence upon non assumpsit. Young v. Black, (565) 440

26. See Demurrer, 1, 2, 3. Id. (Ib.) 440

EVIDENCE—8.

It is a fatal objection to a deposition, taken under the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789, that it was opened out of court. Beale v. Thompson and Maris, (70) 491

EVIDENCE—9.

1. A material alteration of a bond may be made by consent of all parties, without making the bond void, and such consent may be proved by parol evidence. Speake v. United States, (28) 645

2. A being sole owner of a bill of exchange, indorses it in blank, and delivers it to B to deliver to C for collection, and when collected to place it to the credit of A and B in account; C collects the amount, but refuses to place it to the credit of A and B, who settle their account with C and pay him the balance; A afterwards sues C for the amount received upon the bill; B is a competent witness for A. Tabor v. Perrott & Lee, (39) 649

EXECUTOR—8.

1. See Administration, (9) 471
2. If a judgment be rendered against one as executor, who is not executor, it does not bind the estate of the testator, and an execution upon such a judgment could not legally be levied upon such estate. Griffith v. Frazier, (Ib.) 471
3. By the law of South Carolina administration durante absentia testatoris cannot be granted after probate of the will and letters testamentary granted. Id. (Ib.) 471
4. See Bankrupt, 1, 2, (85) 496
5. If an executor do not cause himself to be made party to a suit brought in the life-time, and in the name of the testator, and pending at his death, it is to be considered as a voluntary abandonment of the action, so as to exclude the executor from the benefit of the equity of the exceptions to the statute of limitations.

FORFEITURE—6.

No sentence of condemnation can be affirmed if the law under which the forfeiture accrued has expired, although a condemnation and sale may have taken place and the money paid over to the United States before the expiration of the law. This court, in reversing the sentence, will not order the money to be repaid, but will award restitution of the property as if no sale had been made.

3. If the owner of a slave permit her to remain in the possession of A for four years; and A then, without the assent of the owner, delivers her to B, who keeps her four years more, the possession of B cannot be so connected with the possession of A as to make it a fraudulent loan, within the act of assembly of Virginia, in regard to B's creditors.
Auld v. Norwood, (361) 126
4. A magistrate who has received from an insolvent debtor a deed of trust, fraudulent in law as to creditors, is incompetent to sit as a magistrate in the discharge of the debtor under the insolvent law of Virginia; and the discharge so obtained is not a discharge in due course of law.
Slacum v. Simms, (363) 126

FRAUD—7.

1. On a question of fraud the remedy at law is complete. Russel v. Clark, (69) 271

3. A promise to pay a sum of money as a compensation to the plaintiff for the injury done him by the misconduct of the defendant in obtaining a patent in his own name for land which he ought to have patented in the name of the plaintiff, and in preventing the plaintiff from obtaining a patent in his own name, and in consideration of the defendant's having procured the patent to be issued to himself, is a contract for the sale of land, within the statute of frauds, and must be in writing.
Hughes v. Moore, (176) 307

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—5.

The English statute of frauds requires the agreement to pay the debt of another to be in writing; but the statute of frauds in Virginia requires only the promise to be in writing.

FREIGHT—7.

The underwriters upon a cargo are not liable for freight pro rata itineris, to the owner of the vessel who is also owner of the cargo insured, in a case where the vessel and cargo were captured, the cargo abandoned to the underwriters as a total loss and by them accepted, the loss paid, the cargo condemned, restored upon appeal, and the proceeds of the cargo paid over to the underwriters. Freight pro rata itineris is not due unless the owner of the cargo voluntarily agree to receive it at a place short of its ultimate destination.
Caze and Richaud v. Balt. Ins. Co., (358) 370

FREIGHT—9.

If a neutral vessel be captured on her outward voyage from England to Amelia Island, carrying a hostile cargo, which is condemned, and if by the charter-party the outward cargo is to be carried free of freight, but the homeward cargo is to pay at a certain rate, to be ascertained by the nature of the cargo, yet the court will decree freight, pro rata itineris of the outward cargo, to be assessed upon the principles of a quantum meruit.

INSURANCE—5.

1. See Citizen, 1, 2, (57, 61) 36, 38
2. A general policy, insuring every person having an interest, and containiug no warranty of neutrality, covers belligerent as well as neutral property.
Hodgson v. Marine Ins. Co. Alex., (100) 48
3. It is no defense for the underwriters, that payment of the premium is enjoined by a court of chancery. Id. (Ib.) 48
4. A misrepresentation, not averred to be material, is no bar to an action on the policy.
Id. (Ib.) 48
5. A misrepresentatiou, to have that effect, must be material to the risk of the voyage.
Id. (Ib.) 48
6. It is not necessary, in an action of covenant on a policy, that the declaration should aver that the plaintiff had abandoned to the underwriters.
Id. (Ib.) 48
7. If the insurance be against all risks, "blockaded ports and Hispaniola excepted," a vessel, sailing ignorantly for a blockaded port, is covered by the policy; the exception is not of the port, but of the risk of capture for breaking the blockade.
Yeaton v. Fry, (335) 117
8. A vessel, sailing ignorantly for a blockaded port, is not liable to capture, under the law of nations. Id. (Ib.) 118

INSURANCE—6.

1. In an action upon a policy on property warranted neutral, "proof of which to be required in the United States only," a sentence of condemnation in a foreign court of admiralty, upon the ground of breach of blockade, is not conclusive evidence of the violation of the warranty.
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Woods, (29) 143
2. Quære, whether breach of blockade by a vessel not warranted neutral would discharge the underwriters. Id. (Ib.) 143
3. If a vessel sail to a port within the policy, with intent to go to a port uot within the policy, in case the former should be blockaded, this is not a deviation. Id. (Ib.) 143
4. A vessel might lawfully sail for a port in the West Indies, known to be blockaded, until she was warned off, according to the British orders in council of April, 1804. She was not bound to make inquiry elsewhere than of the blockading force.
Id. (Ib.) 143
5. The questions whether the voyage be broken up, and whether the captain was justified in returning, are questions of law, and the finding thereupon by a jury is not to be regarded by the court.
King v. Delaware Ins. Co., (71) 155
6. The British orders in council of the 11th of November, 1807, did not prohibit a direct voyage from the United States to a colony of France.
Id. (Ib.) 155
7. If from fear, founded on misrepresentation, the voyage be broken up, the underwriters are not liable. Id. (Ib.) 155
8. The insurance upon buildings in Alexandria did not cease by the separation of Alexandria from Virginia, although the society could only insure houses in Virginia.
Korn v. Mutual Ass. Society, (192) 195
9. The obligation of the insured to contribute does not cease in consequence of his forfeiture of his own insurance by his own neglect.
Id. (Ib.) 195
10. All the members of the society are bound by the act of the majority. Id. (Ib.) 195
11. No member of the society can devest himself of his obligations as such, but according to the rules of the society.
Korn v. Mutual Ass. Society, (192) 195
12. The additional premium upon a revaluation under the rules of the society, is only upon the excess. Atkinson v. Mutual Ass. Society, (202) 199
13. In an action of covenant on a policy under seal, all special matter of defense must be pleaded.
Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, (206) 200
14. Under the plea of covenants performed, the defendant cannot give evidence which goes to vacate the policy. Id. (Ib.) 200
15. In order to prove the condemnation of a vessel it is only necessary to produce the libel and sentence. Id. (Ib.) 200
16. The depositions stated in the proceedings of the Court of Admiralty are not evidence in an action upon the policy. Id. (Ib.) 200
17. In an action upon a valued policy, it is not competent for the underwriters to give parol evidence that the real value of the subject insured is different from that stated in the policy.
Id. (Ib.) 200
18. The agent who makes insuranee for his principal has authority to abandon without a formal letter of attorney.
Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, (268) 220
19. The informality of a deed of cession is unimportant, because, if the abandonment be unexceptionable, the property vests immediately in the underwriters, and the deed is not essential to the right of either party. Id. (Ib.) 220
20. If the abandonment be legal, it puts the underwriters completely in the place of the assured, and the agent of the assured becomes the agent of the underwriters. Id. (Ib.) 220
21. A special verdict is defective which does not find whether the abandonment was in reasonable time. Id. (Ib.) 220
22. What is reasonable time of abandonment, is a question compounded of fact and law, which must be found by a jury, under the direction of the court. Id. (Ib.) 220
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden, (338) 242
23. If the interest of one joint owner of a cargo be insured, and if that interest be neutral, it is no breach of the warranty of neutrality, if the other joint owner, whose interest is not insured, be a belligerent.
Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., (274) 222
24. The assured are not understood to warrant that the whole cargo is neutral, but that the interest insured is neutral. Id. (Ib.) 222
25. The effect of a misrepresentation or concealment upon a policy, depends upon its materiality to the risk, which must be decided by a jury, under the direction of a court. Id. (Ib.) 222
Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden, (338) 242
26. The right to abandon may be kept in suspense by mutual consent.
Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., (274) 222
27. If a vessel take on board papers which increase the risk of capture, and if it be not the regular usage of the trade insured to take such papers, the non-disclosure of the fact that they would be on board will vacate the policy. Id. (Ib.) 222

INSURANCE—7.

1. The discharge of underwriters from their liability, in case of taking on board an additional cargo not authorized by the policy, depends, not on any supposed increase of risk, but wholly on the departure of the insured from the contract of insurance. The consequences of such a violation of the contract are immaterial to its legal effect, as it is, per se, a discharge of the underwriters; and the law attaches no importance to the degree, in cases of voluntary deviation. Necessity alone can sanction a deviation in any case; and that deviation must be strictly commensurate with the vis major producing it. Md. Ins. Co. v. Le Roy, (26) 257
2. A policy of insurance on a vessel "at and from" an island, protects her in sailing from port to port of the island to take in a cargo.
Dickey v. Balt. Ins. Co., (327) 360
3. See Equity, 7, (332) 362
4. See Freight, (358) 370
5. See Alexandria, (396) 383
6. There cannot be a total loss of a cargo consisting of memorandum articles of only one species, such as hides. Nor are the underwriters liable for salvage upon such articles, under the clause which authorizes the insured to labor and travel for the preservation of the cargo, unless, perhaps, in a case where the salvage may have prevented an actual total loss of the cargo.

Biays v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., (415) 389
7. The length of time a vessel may wait to take in her cargo, without discharging the underwriters, does not depend on the usage of the trade.
Oliver v. Md. Ins. Co., (487) 414
8. The danger which will justify a vessel in remaining in port a long time, without discharging the underwriters, must be obvious, immediate, directly applied to the interruption of the voyage, and imminent; not distant, contingent and indefinite. Id. (Ib.) 414
9. If, according to the usage of the trade, a vessel be permitted to go from one port to another to collect her cargo, and she unnecessarily exhaust, at one port, the whole time allowed by the usage of the trade to complete her cargo, she cannot go to the other port without being guilty of such a deviation as will avoid the policy. Id (Ib.) 414
10. What is a reasonable apprehension of danger, is a question of law to be decided by the court. (Quære?) Id. (Ib.) 414
11. To constitute a representation (in making insurance) there should be an affirmation or denial of some fact; or an allegation which would plainly lead the mind to the same conclusion.
Livingston v. Md. Ins. Co., (506) 421
12. If, by the usage of the trade insured, it be necessary that certain papers should be on board, the concealment of those papers cannot affect the plaintiff's right to recover upon the policy.
Id. (Ib.) 421
13. In general, concealment of papers amounts to a breach of warranty. Id. (Ib.) 421
14. See Domicile, 1, 2, (Ib.) 421
15. If the letter, submitted to the underwriters, ordering the insurance, refer to another letter previously laid before them, which letter contained information that the vessel had permission to trade to the Spanish colonies, the underwriters are bound to notice that fact, and to know that the vessel will take all the papers necessary to make the voyage legal. Id. (Ib.) 421
16. The usage of trade may be proved by parol, although such usage originated in a law, or edict of the government of the country. Id. (Ib.) 421
17. The question whether abandonment were made in due time, is not a question of fact to be exclusively left to the jury, but to be decided by them under the direction of the court.
Id. (Ib.) 421
18. No acts, justifiable by the usage of the trade, and done by the plaintiffs to avoid confiscation under the laws of Spain, can avoid the policy.
Id. (Ib.) 421
19. If the plaintiffs do any act which increases the risk of capture and detention, according to the common practice of the belligerent, it may avoid the policy. It is not necessary that the risk, thus increased, should be the risk of rightful capture according to the law of nations. Id. (Ib.) 421

INSURANCE—8.

1. Where a technical total loss is sought to be maintained upon the mere ground of deterioration of the cargo, at an intermediate port, to a moiety of its value, all deterioration of memorandum articles must be excluded from the estimate. Therefore, in a cargo of a mixed character, no abandonment, for a mere deterioration in value during the voyage, can be valid, unless the damage on the non-memorandum articles exceed a moiety of the whole cargo including the memorandum articles.
Marcardier v. Ches. Ins. Co., (39) 481
2. Where the general owner of a ship retains the possession, command and navigation of the same, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight for the voyage, the charter-party is to be considered as a mere affreightment sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership. In such case the general owner is also owner for the voyage; and if he be the master of the vessel he is incapable of committing barratry. Id. (Ib.) 481
3. When a cargo is insured by divers policies, in some of which the rate of exchange is fixed at which the prime cost of the cargo shall be valued; in ascertaining the amount of the interest of the insured, upon settlement of those policies in which the rate of exchange is fixed, the whole cargo is to be valued at that rate of exchange without regard to the rate of exchange by which the value may have been ascertained in the other policies.
Pleasants v. Md. Ins. Co., (56) 486
4. If a policy insures against "unlawful arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes," &c., the qualification "unlawful" extends, in its operation, as well to "restraints and detainments" as to "arrests;" and, in such case, a detainment by a force lawfully blockading a port, is not a peril insured against by a policy containing a warranty of neutrality. M'Call v. Marine Ins. Co., (59) 487
5. A policy on goods to be safely landed at Leghorn is discharged by landing them at the lazaretto; that being the usage of the trade.

Black*, (565) 440

JOINT OWNERS—8.

1. If two joint owners of merchandize consign it to a merchant for sale, and inform him that each owns one moiety; and if they give separate and variant instructions, each for his own moiety, one of the consignors alone may maintain a separate action against the consignee for a violation of his separate instructions. *Hall v. JURISDICTION—5.

1. A writ of error does not lie from the Supreme Court of the United States to the District Court of the United States for the District of Maine.
United States v. Weeks, (1) 19
2. In an action of trover, if the judgment below be in favor of the defendant, the value of the matter in dispute upon the writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States is the sum claimed as damages in the declaration.
Cooke v. Woodrow, (13) 22
3. A corporation aggregate cannot litigate in the courts of the United States, unless in consequence of the character of the individuals who compose the body politic; which character must appear by proper averments upon the record.
Hope Ins. Co. v. Boardman, (57) 36
4. A corporation aggregate composed of citizens of one state may sue a citizen of another state in the Circuit Court of the United States.
Bank of the United States v. Deveaux, (61) 38
5. The legislature of a state cannot annul the judgments, nor determine the jurisdiction, of the courts of the United States.
United States v. Judge Peters, (115) 53
6. The continental Court of Appeals, in prize causes, had power to revise and correct the sentences of the state courts of admiralty.
Id. (Ib.) 53
7. Although the claims of a state may be ultimately affected by the decision of a cause, yet if the state be not necessarily a defendant, the courts of the United States are bound to exercise jurisdiction. Id. (Ib.) 53
8. The Inferior Court of Common Pleas for the county of Hunterdon, in the state of New Jersey, in May, 1779, had a general jurisdiction in all cases of inquisition for treason, and its judgment, although erroneous, was not void, inasmuch as the court had jurisdiction of the cause.
Kempe's Lessee v. Kennedy, (173) 70
9. The courts of the United States are all of limited jurisdiction; and their proceedings are erroneous if the jurisdiction be not shown upon them.
Id. (Ib.) 70
10. In Kentucky it is a good ground of equitable jurisdiction, that the defendant has obtained a prior patent for land to which the complainant had the better right, under the statute respecting lands; and in exercising that jurisdiction the court will decide in conformity with the settled principles of a court of chancery.
Bodley v. Taylor, (191) 75
11. Time will be given to procure affidavits as to the value of the matter in dispute, so as to ascertain the jurisdiction.
Rush v. Parker, (287) 103
12. The Circuit Court has jurisdiction in a suit in equity to stay proceedings upon a judgment at law between the same parties, although the subpœna be served upon the defendant out of the district in which the court sits.
Logan v. Patrick, (288) 103
13. Although the plaintiff be described in the proceedings as an alien, yet the defendant must be expressly stated to be a citizen of some one of the states; otherwise the courts of the United States have not jurisdiction of the case.
Hodgson v. Bowerbank, (303) 108
14. The trial of seizures under the act of the 18th of February, 1793, "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," is to be in the judicial district in which the seizure was made; without regard to the district where the forfeiture accrued. Keene v. United States, (304) 108
15. See British Treaty, (344) 120
16. An appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Maine, in a case of admiralty jurisdiction, does not lie directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, but to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.
Sloop Sally v. United States, (372) 129
17. In all cases in which the District Court of Maine acts as a district court, the appeal is to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.
Id. (Ib.) 129

JURISDICTION—6.

1. A suit in chancery, by one who has the prior equity against him who has the eldest patent, is in its nature local; and if it be a mere question of title, must be tried in the district where the land lies. Massie v. Watts, (148) 181
2. But if it be a case of contract, or trust, or fraud, it is to be tried in the district where the defendant may be found. Id. (Ib.) 181
3. An appeal lies to the Supreme Court from an order of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, quashing an inquisition in the nature of a writ of ad quod damnum.
Custiss v. Alexandria and Georgetown Co., (233) 209
4. The Circuit Court of the District of Columbia has no jurisdiction, upon motion, to quash an inquisition taken under the act "to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causey to Alexandria." Id. (Ib.) 209
5. The jurisdiction of the court below cannot be questioned after the cause is sent back by mandate. Skillern v. May, (267) 220
6. The jurisdiction of the French courts, as to seizures, is not confined to seizures made within two leagues of the cost.
Hudson v. Guestier, (281) 224
7. A seizure beyond the limits of the territorial jurisdiction, for breach of a municipal regulation, is warranted by the law of nations. Id. (Ib.) 224
8. A writ of error lies to the highest court of a state in a case where the question is whether the confiscation of British property was complete before the British treaty.
Smith v. Maryland, (286) 225
9. The appellate powers of the Supreme Court of the United States are given by the constitution; but they are limited and regulated by the judicial act, and other acts passed by Congress on the subject. Durousseau v. The United States, (307) 232
10. This court has appellate jurisdiction of decisions in the district courts of Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee and Orleans, even in causes properly cognizable by the district courts of the United States.
Id. (Ib.) 232
11. A general assignee of the effects of an insolvent cannot sue in the federal courts if his assignor could not have sued in those courts.
Sere v. Pitot, (332) 240
12. The citizens of the territory of Orleans may sue and be sued in the District Court of that territory, in the same cases in which a citizen of Kentucky may sue and be sued in the court of Kentucky.
Id. (Ib.) 240

JURISDICTION—7.

1. The courts of the United States have no common law jurisdiction in cases of libel against the government of the United States. But they have the power to fine for contempts, to imprison for contumacy, and to enforce the observance of their orders, &c. United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, (32) 259

2. See Discovery, 1, (69) 271

3. See Dower, 1, (370) 374

4. The Supreme Court of the United States has not jurisdiction by writ of error, in a civil cause which has been carried up from the District Court to the Circuit Court by writ of error.
United States v. Goodwin, (108) 284
United States v. Gordon, (287) 347

5. See Admiralty, 2, (112) 286

6. A public vessel of war of a foreign sovereign at peace with the United States coming into our ports, and demeaning herself in a friendly manner, is exempt from the jurisdiction of the country.
Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon, (116) 287

7. Upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, this court has no jurisdiction, if the sum awarded be less than 100 dollars, although a greater sum may have been originally claimed. Wise v. Col. Turnpike Co., (276) 341

8. A state court has no jurisdiction to enjoin a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States.
M'Kim v. Voorhies, (279) 342

9. A French tribunal at Guadaloupe had jurisdiction of property seized on the high seas for breach of the Milan decree, and carried into the Dutch part of the island of St. Martins, and there sold by order of the Dutch governor of St. Martins, before condemnation, without any authority from the French tribunal at Guadaloupe.
Williams v. Armroyd, (423) 392

10. See Mandamus, (504) 420

11. The Circuit Court of Tennessee, as a court of equity, cannot award a writ of habere facias possessionem. Wallen v. Williams, (602) 452

JURISDICTION—8.

1. The acts of a tribunal upon a subject not within its jurisdiction are void.
Griffith v. Frazier, (9) 471

2. The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction in writs of right where the property demanded exceeds 500 dollars in value; and if upon the trial the demandant recover less, he is not to be allowed his costs; but, at the discretion of the court, may be adjudged to pay costs.
Green v. Liter, (229) 545

3. See Appeal, 1, (251) 553

JURISDICTION—9.

1. See Equity, 1, (19) 642

2. See Admiralty, 4, 18, 24, 25.

3. This court has jurisdiction where one party claims land under a grant from the state of New Hampshire, and the other under a grant from the state of Vermont, although, at the time of the first grant, Vermont was part of New Hampshire.
Town of Pawlet v. Clark, (292) 735

JUROR—7.

1. After a juror is sworn no exception can be taken to him on account of his being an inhabitant of another county.
Mima Queen v. Hepburn, (290) 348

2. If a juror be challenged for favor, and, upon examination before the triers, he declare that if the evidence should be equal he would give a verdict in favor of that party upon whom the burden of proof lies, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, ought to reject him, although the bias should not be so strong as to render it positively improper to allow him to be sworn.

JUSTIFICATION—9.

See Error, 3, (339) 752

KENTUCKY—5.

1. See Jurisdiction, 10. (191) 75

2. Entries of land in Kentucky must have that reasonable certainty which would enable a subsequent locator, by the exercise of a due degree of judgment and diligence, to locate his own lands on the adjacent residuum.
Bedley v. Taylor, (Ib.) 75

3. Distance upon a road to be computed by the meanders, and not by a straight line.
Id. (Ib.) 75

4. If the entry be of a settlement and pre-emption right on the east side of a road, the 400 acres allowed for the settlement right must be surveyed entirely on the east side of the road, and in the form of a square. Id. (Ib.) 75

5. The call for the settlement right is sufficiently certain, but the call for the pre-emption right is too vague, and must be rejected. Id. (Ib.) 75

6. A defendant in equity who has obtained a patent for land not included in his entry, but covered by the complainants' entry, will be decreed to convey it to the complainants; but the complainants will not be required to convey to the defendant the land which they have obtained a patent for, which was covered by the defendant's entry, but which, by mistake, he omitted to survey. Id. (Ib.) 75

KENTUCKY—6.

1. See Chancery, 2, (148) 181

2. If, by any reasonable construction of an entry of a warrant to survey land, it can be supported, the court will support it. Id. (Ib.) 181

3. When a given quantity of land is to be laid off on a given base, it shall be included within four lines forming a square, as nearly as may be, unless that form be repugnant to the entry.
Id. (Ib.) 181

4. If the calls of an entry do not fully describe the land, but furnish enough to enable the court to complete the location by the application of certain principles, they will complete it.
Id. (Ib.) 181

5. If a location have certain material calls sufficient to support it, and to describe the land, other calls less material and incompatible with the essential calls of the entry, may be discarded.
Id. (Ib.) 181

6. The rectangular figure is to be preserved if possible. Id. (Ib.) 181

LANDING OF GOODS—8.

See Admiralty, 3, (110) 504

LAND—7.

1. The title to land can be acquired and lost only in the manner described by the law of the place where such land is situated.
United States v. Crosby, (115) 287

2. See Arbitration, 2, (171) 305

6. See North Carolina, (471) 408

7. See Alien, 1, Fairfax, (603) 453

LAND—9.

1. The land law of Virginia, which gives a right of pre-emption to those who had marked and improved land before the year 1778, refers that right to the time when the improvement was made, and to the time of the passage of the act; and not to the time when the claim for such pre-emption was made before the commissioners.
Simms v. Guthrie, (19) 642

2. If an entry be made by the assignee of a pre-emption right, it will be good although the name of the assignor be not mentioned in the entry, if the entry refer to the warrant, and if it mention an improvement, provided the place be described with sufficient certainty in other respects.
Id. (Ib.) 642

3. The act of North Carolina, 1789, c. 2, opening the land-office, did not prohibit a person from making several different entries, amounting in the whole to more than 5,000 acres, nor from purchasing the rights acquired by others by entries; nor from uniting several entries in one survey and patent; and such union of several entries is allowed by the act of 1784, ch. 19.
Polk's lessee v. Wendell, (87) 665
4. In a patent, the obliteration of the consideration does not make void the grant.
Id. (Ib.) 665
5. A patent justifies a presumption that all the previous requisites of the law have been complied with. Id. (Ib.) 665
6. A patent is void at law if the state had no title, or if the officer, who issued the patent, had no authority so to do. Id. (Ib.) 665
7. In North Carolina the want of an entry nullifies a patent. Id. (Ib.) 665
8. After the cession of land by North Carolina to the United States, the former had no right to grant those lands to any other grantee, who had not an incipient title before the session. The question, whether such incipient title existed, is therefore open at law. Id. (Ib.) 665
9. It is not necessary that an execution of a will in Virginia, devising to the executor land in Kentucky, should take out letters testamentary in Kentucky, to enable him to maintain an ejectment for the land in Kentucky.
Doe, lessee of Lewis, v. M'Farland, (151) 687
10. If a plaintiff in ejectment claim in his declaration, the whole tract, a deed showing that he has only an undivided interest in the tract may be given in evidence. Id. (Ib.) 687
11. In Kentucky the courts of law will not look beyond the patent, but courts of equity will; and will give validity to the elder entry against an elder patent. Finley v. Williams, (164) 691
12. Between pre-emption rights, the prior improvement will hold the land against a prior certificate, entry, survey and patent.
Id. (Ib.) 691
13. It is not essential to the dignity of an entry upon a pre-emption warrant, that the entry should, in terms, call for the improvement, although it must in fact include the improvement.
Id. (Ib.) 691
14. An entry calling for "the big blue lick," will not support a survey and patent for land at the upper blue lick; the lower blue lick being generally called "the big blue lick;" although there may be other calls in the entry which seem to designate the upper blue lick as the place intended.
Id. (Ib.) 691
15. If there be nothing in the patent to control the call for course and distance, the land must be bounded by the courses and distances of the patent according to the magnetic meridian.
M'Iver's lessee v. Walker, (173) 694
16. Course and distance must yield to a call for natural objects,
Id. (Ib.) 694
17. All lands are supposed to have been actually surveyed, and the intention of the grant is to convey the land according to the actual survey.
Id. (Ib.) 694
18. If a patent refer to a plat annexed, and if in that plat a water-course be laid down as running through the land, the tract must be so surveyed as to include the water-course, and to conform, as near as may be, to the plat, although the lines thus run do not correspond with the courses and distances mentioned in the patent, and although neither the certificate of survey nor the patent calls for that water-course.
Id. (Ib.) 694
19. Quære, whether parol evidence can be given that the surveyor intended to express the courses according to the true, and not according to the magnetic, meridian.
Id. (Ib.) 694
20. This court has jurisdiction where one party claims land under a grant from the state of New Hampshire, and the other under a grant from the state of Vermont, although, at the time of the first grant, Vermont was part of New Hampshire.
Town of Pawlet v. Clark, (292) 735
21. A grant of a tract of land in equal shares to 63 persons, to be divided among them in 68 equal shares with a specific appropriation of 5 shares, conveys only a sixty-eighth part to each person. If one of the shares be declared to be "for a glebe for the Church of England as by law established," that share is not holden in trust by the grantees, nor is it a condition annexed to their rights or shares.
Id. (292) 735
22. A legislative grant cannot be repealed.
Id. (Ib.) 736
Terrett v. Taylor, (43) 650
23. See Church of England,
24. See Washington City, 1, (456) 791
25. Where a contract for the sale of land has been in part executed by a conveyance of part of the land, and the vendor is unable to convey the residue, a court of equity will decree the repayment of a proportionate part of the purchase money with interest. Pratt v. Law & Campbell, (456) 792
26. See Equity, 13, (Ib.) 792
27. An equity of redemption of real estate in Maryland was liable to attachment, before the act of 1810, ch. 60.

LANDS—5.

1. See Deeds, 1, 2, 3, 4. (22, 154) 25, 64
2. Lands included in the Zaneville district in the state of Ohio, by the act of the 3d of March, 1803, could not, after that date, be sold at the Marietta land-office. Matthews v. Zane, (92) 46
3. See Kentucky, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. (191) 75
4. See Evidence, 3. (262) 96
5. See Equity, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. (Ib.) 96
6. The certificate of survey is sufficient evidence that the warrant was in the hands of the surveyor.
Taylor v. Brown, (234) 88
7. That clause of the land law of Virginia which requires the survey to be recorded within two months after it was made, is merely directory to the surveyor; and his neglect to record it does not invalidate the survey. Id. (Ib.) 88
8. It is not necessary that the deputy-surveyor who made the survey, should make out the plat and certify it. It may be done from his notes by the principal surveyor. Id. (Ib.) 88
9. A survey is not void because it includes more land than was directed to be surveyed by the warrant. Id. (Ib.) 88
10. The locator of a warrant, under the law of Virginia, undertakes, himself, to find waste and unappropriated land, and his patent issues upon his own information to the government, and at his own risk. He cannot be considered as a purchaser without notice. Id. (Ib.) 88
11. The equity of the prior locator extends to the surplus land surveyed, as well as to the quantity mentioned in the warrant. Id. (Ib.) 88

2. The court will not declare a law to be unconstitutional unless the opposition between the constitution and the law be clear and plain.
Fletcher v. Peck, (87) 162
3. In a contest between two individuals, claiming under an act of a legislature, the court cannot inquire into the motives which actuated the members of that legislature. If the legislature might constitutionally pass such an act; if the act be clothed with all the requisite forms of a law, a court, sitting as a court of law, cannot sustain a suit between individuals founded on the allegation that the act is a nullity, in consequence of the impure motives which influenced certain members of the legislature which passed the law.
Id. (Ib.) 162

4. When a law is, in its nature, a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot devest those rights.
Fletcher v. Peck, (87) 162
5. A law, annulling conveyances, is unconstitutional, because it is a law impairing the obligation of contracts, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States. Id. (Ib.) 162
6. A vessel having violated a law of the United States cannot be seized for such violation after the law has expired unless some special provision be made therefor by statute.
United States v. Ship Helen, (203) 199
7. If foreign laws be not proved to be in writing, as public edicts, they may be proved by parol.
Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., (274) 222
8. No sentence of condemnation can be affirmed if the law under which the forfeiture accrued has expired, although a condemnation and sale may have taken place, and the money paid over to the United States before the expiration of the law.

1. In a count in a libel upon the 50th section of the collection law of March 2d, 1799, for unlading goods without a permit, it is not necessary to state the time and place of importation, nor the vessel in which it was made, but it is sufficient to allege that they were unknown to the attorney of the United States. Locke v. United States, (339) 364
2. In a libel it is not necessary to negative any fact which constitutes the defense of the claimant.
Brig Aurora, (383) 378
3 An information in the admiralty for a forfeiture must contain a substantial statement of the offense. A general reference to the provisions of the statute is not sufficient. If the information be defective in that respect, the defect is not cured by evidence of the facts omitted to be averred in the information. The decree must be secundum allegata, as well as secundum probata.
Schooner Hoppet v. United States, (389) 380
4. A libel for a forfeiture must be particular and certain in all the material circumstances which constitute the offense. Brig Caroline, (496) 417

3. The defendant to an attachment in chancery, in Virginia may plead the statute of limitations without answer. Wilson v. Koontz, (202) 315
4. A defendant who removes from one county to another in Virginia is not thereby prevented from pleading the statute of limitations, unless the plaintiff has been, by such removal, actually defeated, or obstructed in bringing or maintaining his action. Id. (Ib.) 315
5. The exception in the Maryland statute of limitations in favor of "such accounts as concerns the "trade or merchandise between merchant and "merchant, their factors and servants which are "not residents within this province," applies to dealings between a merchant creditor residing out of Maryland and a debtor residing in Maryland. And in order to take the case out of the exception, it is not sufficient to aver that the creditor returned to, came, and was within the state of Maryland after the cause of action accrued, and more than 3 years before bringing the suit.
Bond v. Jay, (350) 367

LIMITATIONS—8.

1. An acknowledgment of the original justice of the claim is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations; the acknowledgment must go to the fact that it is still due.
Clementson v. Williams, (72) 491
2. The statute of limitations is entitled to the same respect as other statutes, and ought not to be explained away. Id. (Ib.) 491

MANDAMUS—5.

A mandamus will go to a district judge to cause his sentence to be executed, although a state legislature should declare that sentence void.
United States v. Judge Peters, (115) 53

MANDAMUS—7.

1. The power of the circuit courts of the United States to issue the writ of mandamus is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction.
M'Intire v. Wood, (504) 420
2. If the court below order the proceedings to be finally staid upon suggestion of the attorney for the United States in a case to which the United States are not a party, this court will order a mandamus nisi, in the nature of a procedendo.

MARSHAL—9.

1. If a debtor, committed to a state jail under process from the courts of the United States, escape, the marshal is not liable.
Randolph v. Donaldson, (76) 662
2. If a marshal, before the date of his official bond, receive, upon an execution, money due to the United States with orders from the comptroller to pay it into the bank of the United States, which he neglects to do, the sureties in his official bond, executed afterwards, are not liable therefor upon the bond, although the money remain in the marshal's hands after the execution of the bond.
United States v. Giles and others, (212) 708
3. The comptroller of the treasury has a right to direct the marshal to whom he shall pay money received upon execution; and a payment, according to such directions, is good; and it seems he may avail himself of it upon the trial without having submitted it as a claim to the accounting officers of the treasury. Id. (Ib.) 708
4. Quære, whether the sureties in a marshal's bond, conditioned for the faithful executiou of his duty "during his continuance in the said office," are liable for money received by him, after his removal from office, upon an execution which remained in his hands at the time of such removal?

WASHINGTON CITY—9.

1. In the sales of lots in the city of Washington, the lots are not chargeable for their proportion of the internal alley laid out for the common benefit of those lots, although the practice so to charge them has been heretofore universally acquiesced in by purchasers; and if a purchaser has acquiesced in that practice, and has received a conveyance accordingly without objection, yet he does not thereby acquire a fee-simple in such proportion of the alley, and may in equity recover back the purchase money which he has paid therefor. Pratt v. Law & Campbell, (456) 791
2. If a purchaser of city lots stipulates to build, within a limited time, a house on every third lot purchased, or in that proportion, and receives conveyances for the greater part of the lots, he is not bound to build in proportion to the lots conveyed, unless the whole number be conveyed. Id. (Ib.) 791

WRIT OF RIGHT—8.

1. The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction in writs of right, where the property demanded exceeds $500 in value; and if, upon the trial, the demandant recover less, he is not to be allowed his costs; but, at the discretion of the court, may be adjudged to pay costs.
Green v. Liter, (229) 545

2. At common law a writ of right will not lie except against the tenant of the freehold demanded.
Id. (Ib.) 545

3. If there are several tenants, claiming several parcels of land by distinct titles, they cannot lawfully be joined in one writ; and if they are, they may plead in abatement.
Id. (Ib.) 545

4. If the demandant demand against any tenant more land than he holds, he may plead non-tenure as to the parcel not holden; but the writ shall abate only as to the parcel whereof non-tenure is pleaded and admitted or proved.
Id. (Ib.) 545

5. Under the act of Kentucky to amend process in chancery and common law, the party may recover, although he prove only part of the claim in his declaration; but it does not enable him to join parties in an action who could not be joined at the common law. Id. (Ib.) 545

6. The act of Virginia of 1786, reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right, did not vary the rights or legal predicament of the parties, as they existed at the common law. It did not, therefore, change the nature and effect of the pleadings; and, notwithstanding that act, the tenant shall have the full benefit of the ordinary pleas in abatement. The clause in the act which provides that the tenant, at the trial, may, on the general issue, give in evidence any matter which might have been specially pleaded, is confined to matters in bar. Id. (Ib.) 545

7. Under the act of Virginia of 1786 the tenant may, at his election, plead any special matter in bar, in a writ of right, or give it in evidence on the misc joined. Id. (Ib.) 545

8. The act of Virginia of 1786 did not change the nature of the enquiry as to the titles of the parties to a writ of right. Id. (Ib.) 545

9. In order to support a writ of right, it is not necessary to prove an actual entry under title, or actual taking of esplees. A constructive seizin in deed is sufficient. Id. (Ib.) 545

10. Under the land law of Virginia the whole legal estate and seizin of the commonwealth pass to the patentee upon the issuing of his patent.
Id. (Ib.) 545

11. A conveyance of wild or vacant lands gives a constructive seizin thereof in deed to the grantee, and attaches to him all the legal remedies incident to the estate; a fortiori, this principle applies to a patent. Id. (Ib.) 545

12. In Kentucky the patent is the completion of the legal title; and it is the legal title only that can come in controversy in a writ of right.
Id. (Ib.) 545

13. A better subsisting title in a third person is no defense in a writ of right.
Id. (Ib.) 545

14. If tenants claiming different parcels of land by distinct titles, omit to plead that matter in abatement, and join the mise, it is an admission that they are joint tenants of the whole; and the verdict, if for the demandant for any parcel of the land, may be general that he hath more mere right to hold the same than the tenants; and if of any parcel for the tenants, that they have more mere right to hold the same than the demandant.
Id. (Id.) 545

15. If a man enter into lands, having title, his seizin is not bound by his actual occupancy, but is held to be co-extensive with his title. But if a man enter without title, his seizin is confined to his possession by metes and bounds.
Id. (Id.) 545

16. An entry into a parcel which is vacant will not give seizin of a parcel which is in an adverse seizin; but an entry into the last parcel in the name of the whole will enure as an entry into the vacant parcel. Id. (Ib.) 545

17. By a conveyance taking effect under the statute of uses, the bargainee has a complete seizin in deed, without actual entry or livery of seizin.
Id. (Ib.) 545

ZANEVILLE—5.

The lands included within the Zaneville district, by the act of the 3d of March, 1803, could not, after that date, be sold at the Marietta land-office.
